Sir, there are some things which the President forgot to state. He forgot to state that this was a usurping government. Did he not know that fact? The honorable Senator from Illinois, in his speech, which we all remember, excused the President, or attempted to excuse him, for not knowing and understanding what was the absolute meaning and intent of the organic act of Kansas, or a certain portion of it, on the ground that he was absent from the country at the time of its passage. He was absent from the country at the time the events happened of which I have spoken. Does any gentleman here undertake to deny that the first Legislature was forced on the people of Kansas by a foreign invasion? The proof is in the record. It is in the record taken by the House of Representatives. Was not the President familiar with that? Ought he not, as a statesman, to have been familiar with that? Can he give any excuse for not knowing it? Is it enough for the President of the United States to come into office, and say he does not know some of the leading facts which have taken place within a very short period before his election and inauguration? No, sir, it is no excuse; and the President of the United States ought not to, and shall not, avail himself of it before the people of the country. He does not know the other facts which I have stated with reference to the disclaimer of the people who framed the Topeka constitution from the beginning, of any intention to subvert by force the established government of that Territory.

His next allegation is a very singular one, and it calls for more particular notice. He avers that the sense of the people was taken on the question of whether they would have a convention or not; and he holds them accountable, therefore, for not voting on that question. Mark you, he is now communicating information to Congress; this is one of the items which he communicates, that the sense of the people of Kansas was taken on the question of a convention! What opportunity did they have to express their sense? Could they express their sense on a convention under the force of a test oath that was applied to them? Is it not matter of notoriety; is it not upon the book; is it not matter of record, that, coupled with the right to vote on the question of calling a convention, was prescribed an oath to be taken by every person who should offer himself as a voter on that occasion? What was that oath? It was stated by the Senator from Missouri the other day. It was an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; to support the organic act of the Territory; and, beyond that, to support the fugitive slave law. Now, sir, who in any country—I will not say in any free country, but who in any country—ever before heard of a test oath made a prerequisite to the right to vote? I have heard of an oath administered at the polls to show a person's qualification; that he comes under the description of persons who are allowed to vote; but I believe this is the first time, in the history of any country where the people are allowed to exercise the right of suffrage at all, in which an oath has been prescribed by way of test to support certain measures of Government and certain laws, as a prerequisite to the right of suffrage.

Is it not well known, does not the whole country understand, that, throughout the free States, there is the greatest abhorrence of the fugitive slave law; that in many of those States that act has been held to be unconstitutional; that a large portion of the people not only consider it unconstitutional, but a much larger portion consider it oppressive and unjust, and derogatory to their rights? Is not that well understood? And yet, when people from the free States, with these feelings and impressions, present themselves in Kansas, and show that they are qualified, under the organic act of Kansas and the laws of the Territory, to exercise the right of suffrage as persons, they find that the so-called Legislature which ordered the calling of a convention have prescribed that no man shall vote, if challenged, unless he takes an oath to support that very law, which they knew perfectly well could not be taken without a violation of the conscience and the honor of those who presented themselves.

Is this taking the sense of the people of Kansas? Is this the mode in which the President would allow the people of Kansas to express fairly their views on the point, whether a convention should be called or not? This was the only mode presented to the people of Kansas, and this is held out by the President to the people of the country as sufficient to entitle them fairly to express their own sense on the subject thus submitted to them. That is information communicated to the country! I pray Senators who hear me, as they are already familiar with it, and those who are hereafter to consider it, to remember the fact that he states for our information, that the act passed for the election of delegates was fair in its provisions. Why does he not take the testimony of Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton on that subject? What fairness was there in it? It provided for a census and apportionment. As has been stated, in that census and apportionment one half the people of the Territory were excluded.

Mr. COLLAMER. That objection applies not to the law, but to the execution of the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that. He states, however, that they had a fair opportunity to act. I am speaking of the result, and inquiring whether there was any such fair opportunity as to entitle him to consider the people of Kansas bound by the result which followed? I may have expressed myself incorrectly, and I am obliged to my friend for suggesting that this evil was not in the law. The law may have been fair on the outside. That is the argument; all these laws have been fair, and a fair opportunity has been presented! My question is with reference to the opportunity; what kind of opportunity was presented to the people of Kansas to settle that question? Although a census and apportionment were provided for, it is perfectly notorious—and we have testimony by which the President is bound, because it is the testimony of his own officials, of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton; we have their testimony to the fact—that one half the Territory of Kansas was entirely neglected and unprovided for. I will not say one half the people, because, perhaps, the counties thus omitted might not have been so populous as the rest; but the President undertakes to say, sneeringly, that it is no objection that a few scattered people in the remote counties did not vote. Sir, it has been shown that a very large and important portion of the Territory was not included in the census; and we know, moreover, as a fact which cannot be contradicted, and has not been, that even in the counties where the census was taken, a large number of the people were omitted; they were not registered; there was comparatively a very small number registered; in fact, not one half the people of the Territory. That matter was so conducted as not to present to the majority of the people of the Territory an opportunity of being heard on the election of delegates; and yet the President undertakes to say to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, and to the world, in this manifesto which he has put forth, that there was a fair opportunity presented for the people of that Territory to select delegates of their own peculiar shades of opinion to carry out their own will and desire! It is a very curious kind of information he communicates. I stated that, in many respects, he had forgotten facts notorious, and in other things he had stated as facts things notoriously untrue; and I think I am borne out by the record in the assertions I have thus made. Why should he speak of the comparatively few voters omitted? Did he know how many there were? Has there been any census taken of those voters in the Territory? Not at all. Whence does he derive his information? It is a statement without book; an assertion without authority; an allegation without proof. What right has he to come before the country and thus make an assertion which is not upheld by any evidence from any quarter?

He makes another allegation, which is well worthy the serious notice of the country. It is in a very few words, and I will read it:

"The question of slavery was submitted to an election of the people of Kansas, on the 21st of December last, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution. Here, again, a fair opportunity was presented to the adherents of the Topeka constitution, if they were the majority, to decide this exciting question 'in their own way,' and thus restore peace to the distracted Territory; but they again refused to exercise their right of popular sovereignty, and again suffered the election to pass by default."

Fair opportunity to decide the question of slavery! Why, sir, the President makes this allegation on the whole facts before him; with the constitutions before him, which were submitted to the people. Calmly and deliberately, in an argument presented to the people of this country, he comes before them and says, in his official character, as communicating information relative to the state of the Union, that the question of slavery was fairly submitted to the people of Kansas on the 21st of December. Did not the President know that it was but a choice between two slave constitutions—two constitutions, both of which recognized and established slavery in that Territory? The facts are familiar to all of us in the Senate. I hope they are equally familiar to the country. One of those constitutions authorized slavery in the ordinary form, providing that slaves might be brought into the Territory and held there, but it allowed the people to change that constitution and that provision; the other prohibited the introduction of slaves into the Territory, but it provided for the perpetuity of the slavery that already existed there. Those there were to remain slaves, and their children were to remain slaves to the remotest ages, and the people were prohibited from changing that provision at all.

Is it not the height of assumption—I will not use a stronger word with reference to the President of the United States—to put upon paper and send here, and before the country, the broad assertion that the question of slavery was submitted to the people of Kansas? Sir, that question never has been submitted to the people of Kansas. Nothing has been submitted to that people but a choice between two slave constitutions; and, for my life, I am unable to tell which was the worst of the two. Will any gentleman undertake to demonstrate to me the contrary? Is there any possibility of disputing the assertion, and did he not know it? Had he not read those constitutions? Had not his attention been called to them? Does he never read a newspaper? Is he not aware of what is transpiring before the country every day, and is admitted as a fact before and by the people of the country? It is a matter of astonishment to me that a man occupying that eminent position, speaking to the country in a State paper, speaking in the face of papers which are to go upon the record, and by which his truth, or his neglect of it, may be adjudged, could hazard his fame on an assertion so utterly destitute of foundation, so entirely opposed to fact, as this assertion.

He follows it up by the remark that they had a fair opportunity to settle the question of slavery. They could only vote, not to reject both these constitutions, or one or the other, but they could vote to choose between the two, provided they would previously take an oath that they would support the constitution which might have the majority of the votes. A man opposed to slavery, believing it to be wrong, believing it to be unwise, believing it to be a curse to the people among whom it exists, is presented with two constitutions, and told that he may vote on one of them provided he will take an oath to support that which he believes in his secret soul to be wicked, and at any rate he believes to be disastrous to the community in which it is established; and this is submitted on the word of the President, on these facts, as a presentation fairly of the question of slavery to them, not only with reference to the question presented, but to the mode in which they were to act upon and determine it. I think it requires a wonderful degree of courage in any man, especially a man holding the position which the President of the United States holds, to make an assertion thus unfounded in fact.

But, sir, he offers us some remedies; he offers the people of Kansas remedies. He tells us that, after all, if they do not like this constitution, there is no difficulty in getting rid of it; that is to say, that the constitution may be changed. Does he not know, do we not know, is there a man among us who does not understand, that when that constitution is once fastened on the people of Kansas, it is next to impossible to get rid of it for a series of years, although a majority may exist against it, except by violence? What have we witnessed?

We have seen the votes of two thousand five hundred people—for Secretary Stanton says that is about the number—or, at most, three thousand people in favor of slavery outweigh and override the votes of ten thousand, or twelve thousand, or fifteen thousand people; I do not know how many, but four, or five, or six times as many. We have seen this result over and over again produced by the act of their officials. How easy is it for unscrupulous men to control the polls, having the authority which has been exercised by those men there heretofore, and is exercised now? If Mr. John Calhoun and his associates can get majorities as he has obtained them recently, how easy will it be for them, when in possession of all the forms of law of which the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] has spoken, and in possession of the Government, to control it still?

Let us look at the operation of it for a moment. A Legislature is to be elected. The judges of the election have control of the polls; the individuals desirous of producing a certain result have control of the election; they record the votes; they return the votes; they may make any number of them as they have made any number of them. What chance is there, then, to obtain a Legislature who will submit the question of a change of the constitution to the people? And if it is submitted to the people, with the same men having control of the polls who have had it before, or men actuated by the same principles, what opportunity presents itself for a fair vote of the people on it? The only remedy is revolution; and the President knew it when he suggested the idea of changing the constitution as a remedy. The only remedy is the last resort to arms and physical force; and what chance would the people of Kansas have then? The Governor or the Legislature calls on the Chief Magistrate of the nation and states to him that there is domestic insurrection in Kansas. The troops of the United States, of which my friend from New York is so ready to vote an increase, are under the control of the President, and on his requisition are marched to Kansas for the purpose of suppressing that insurrection. What is the result? What opportunity, I ask again, would the people of Kansas have under those circumstances to rid themselves, by a change of their constitution, of that which had been thus forced upon them? None.

But the President makes another very singular suggestion, one which shows his great regard for law and his great knowledge of the principles of law. He suggests one remedy they will have; that after they have come into the Union as a State, they will then have the power to punish those who have committed these frauds. It is very much like shutting the stable door after the steed is stolen, if you can do it; but this is the first time I have ever heard it suggested by the Chief Magistrate of the nation that an ex post facto law could be passed and persons punished for committing frauds for which there was no punishment at the time they were committed. What, sir, here are frauds committed in the Territory of Kansas, and the President tells us that it is very easy to get along with them because, after you are admitted as a State, you may punish the persons who have committed these frauds! I should like to know of my honorable friend from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] with all his acuteness and knowledge of legal and constitutional principles, in what mode he would set about to do it? If you could do it, it would afford but a very poor satisfaction, after the whole evil for which the frauds were committed had been consummated.

The whole argument of the President is founded on the idea that all the proceedings in Kansas have been legal on the one side and illegal on the other. I propose to examine that position. If you read the message of the President carefully, you will see that that is the outline of the whole. It was the argument of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] the other day, that there was legality on the one side and illegality on the other; and that having these two to choose between, of course he must sustain that which was legal. How does the President undertake to establish it? In the first place, he asserts that the organic law establishing the Territory was in itself an enabling act. I suppose that I might as well leave this point to the examination of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] He will deal with it, I have no doubt, when the time comes; but I think he must have been as much surprised as I was when he found the President asserting, in plain and unmistakable language, that there was no need of an enabling act from Congress, because the Kansas organic law itself provided one. The idea is new. I never heard it suggested until it was hinted at by the honorable Senator from Missouri on a previous occasion, and he did not seem to make much of it; but the President has taken it up. I should like to know of any Senator here whether the idea, as thus presented, is not one that comes upon him by surprise from the authority from which it emanates on this occasion.

Now, I wish to read this clause of the message for another purpose, because there is something remarkable about it:

"That this law recognized the right of the people of the Territory, without any enabling act from Congress, to form a State constitution, is too clear for argument. For Congress: 'to leave the people of the Territory perfectly free,' in framing their constitution, 'to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States,' and then to say that they should not be permitted to proceed and frame a constitution in their own way without an express authority from Congress, appears to be almost a contradiction in terms."

Be it remarked that in order to establish this position, the President is obliged to interpolate words into that clause of the organic act which are not found in it originally. Those words are: "in framing their constitution." There are no such words in the act. Undoubtedly, if that clause had provided that the people might, in framing their constitution, have arranged their institutions to suit themselves, the idea might be supported; but the words are not in the original provision. He assumes that they are. He makes that interpretation, and then draws his own inference from that interpretation thus introduced into the organic act.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I will, in that connection, show that the author of the Kansas bill puts precisely the same interpretation on it which the President does. In the report made to Congress on the 12th of March, 1856, by the Senator from Illinois, I find this language:

"Is not the organization of a Territory eminently necessary and proper as a means of enabling the people thereof to form and mold their local and domestic institutions, and establish a State government under the authority of the constitution, preparatory to its admission into the Union?"

I read from page 4 of the report, in which it is stated to be eminently proper and necessary for two purposes; first, to enable them to regulate and mold their institutions to suit themselves; and, second, to form a constitution preparatory to their admission into the Union. If the author of the bill put that interpretation on it in a report made to Congress, I see no great harm in the President putting the same construction on it. I think it was the true interpretation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It makes no difference to me what construction the Senator from Illinois put on that act at any time. I do not, however, agree with the Senator from Mississippi, that the language he has read carries any such idea with it; but I shall leave it to the Senator from Illinois, if he chooses, to settle that question with the Senator from Mississippi, and with the President. What I have to do is to comment on what the President says. I say that it is a new idea, never before suggested in my hearing, (and I believe I have heard this controversy from the beginning,) that the organic law was to be construed as an enabling act, until it comes authoritatively, for the first time, from the President of the United States.

I do not blame him in one sense; it was necessary to his argument; without it, that argument fails; but in another sense I do blame him for it, and that is this: in undertaking to quote the language of a clause in a law of Congress, I think he should not interpolate words into it which are not there, and hold out the idea that those words actually exist, or are clearly and distinctly implied, when there is nothing in the act itself to authorize anything of that description. Let me read this act. It has been read some thousands of times before, but perhaps it cannot be read too often—I mean this clause:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof?"—

Here the President inserts "in framing their constitution," but "in framing their constitution" is not there.

—"perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

It is very plain that it was not intended that that should be an enabling act; because, if it had been so intended, it would have been so specifically stated. The words, "in framing their constitution," would have been inserted. At any rate, some particular portion of that act would have been found, in which the authority was specifically given to the people of Kansas to frame a constitution under it, and under that constitution to ask admission into the Union; but nothing of that kind is found. Is it possible, can anybody believe, that the Congress of the United States in framing a law to organize a Territory, and intending by that law to confer on the people of the Territory the power to frame a constitution, and under that constitution to come into the Union, would have left it to be inferred from language which, in fact, conveys no such idea? The idea is preposterous. Again, we all know that nothing of the kind was ever held out in any debate that took place on that occasion. Nobody supposed that under that organic act there was authority conferred to frame a State constitution preparatory to admission into the Union. There is nothing in the terms of the provision which I have read, nothing in the terms of the act anywhere, which could lead to the conclusion that any such authority was either given or intended to be given in any manner whatever.

I should like to ask any man, and the President of the United States particularly, who contends that this is an enabling act, of what benefit in that clause are the words "subject only to the Constitution of the United States," if the clause was intended to say and only to say to the people of the Territory of Kansas, "you are at liberty, when you frame a constitution preparatory for admission into the Union, if you choose, to frame your domestic institutions in your own way?" Of what benefit, let me ask anybody, is it, to add at the end of the sentence "provided you do not in any manner contravene the provisions of the Constitution of the United States?" Must not the State constitution when framed come before us? Must it not be presented to us for our action, and if there is a provision in it contrary to the Constitution of the United States, have we not power to reject it? The very fact that the words "subject only to the Constitution of the United States," are left in the act, goes to prove most conclusively beyond all dispute, that the object was not to confer on the people of Kansas that authority when they were forming their constitution, but to confer on them that authority to be exercised while they were a Territory, and with reference to their territorial institutions alone. The people of a Territory may very well be thus limited while they remain a Territory. While they are acting under their organic law framing institutions to regulate themselves at that time; confining themselves to that, it may be very good sense to say that while you are thus a Territory you shall frame no institutions that are contrary to the Constitution of the United States; but if it was conferring on them the authority to form a constitution, of what use is it to say—are not the words thrown away as perfectly inoperative—"subject to the Constitution of the United States?" that is, you may make a constitution, but it must be such a constitution as does not contravene the Constitution of the United States. That very clause shows that it was not intended as an enabling act.

It was not considered to be an enabling act. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Georgia, if he considered it an enabling act, why he so soon afterwards introduced a bill into this body, which was passed by the Senate, to enable the people of Kansas to form a State constitution? Was that construction put on it at the celebrated meeting at the house of the Senator from Illinois, when that enabling act was agreed upon to be reported to Congress, and to be carried through Congress, if possible? Was it supposed that the organic act itself contained an enabling act, rendering that unnecessary, and that under it the people of the Territory of Kansas might go forward and form a State constitution preparatory to being admitted into the Union? It was not the construction placed on it by the Democratic party, by the friends of the bill, and the honorable Senator from Georgia thinks the friends of the bill are those who alone are competent to understand and construe it, and that nobody else can understand it properly. I point his attention, therefore, to his own construction, and I ask him if he considered that clause of the organic act on which I have been commenting, and on which the President commented, and into which he interpolated the words of which I have spoken, as an enabling act authorizing the people of Kansas to frame a State constitution?

Mr. TOOMBS. I will answer the question with pleasure. I did not then, do not now, and never have so considered it. Nor do I consider an enabling act necessary. I think it oftentimes a convenient mode. I act with or without it, according to the circumstances of the case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very happy to get that admission from the Senator from Georgia. It is made with his customary frankness and clearness. Having admitted it, I propose to ask him another question; if it was not an enabling act, where does he get the legality of all these proceedings of the Legislature of Kansas? If they had no authority conferred on them by Congress to call a convention for the purpose of framing a constitution preparatory to the admission of that Territory into the Union as a State, where does the legality of their action come from?

Mr. TOOMBS. The Territorial Legislature.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What authority had they? They had no such authority conferred on them. They might call a convention to petition; they could not make it binding. Unless Congress confers the authority on a particular Legislature to do that very act, what authority has that Legislature more than another? What can they do but petition? What can they do but recommend? The authority is not given them; they must derive it from somebody. True, they have power to legislate; but this is not a proper subject of legislation unless the authority is conferred on them to make it binding. My answer to the whole of the President's argument on that point, and to the argument of the Senator from Georgia on that point, is, that if this is not an enabling act, which the Senator from Georgia admits it is not, then there is no more legality in the act of the Legislature of Kansas, in calling a convention, than there is in the act of the people of Kansas calling the Topeka convention. They can do it in the one form or the other, provided they do it peaceably; and yet, on that the whole argument is predicated. The President, or the person who drew this message, whoever he may have been, saw the difficulty. It was a part of his object to show and to convince the country that here was legality on one side and illegality on the other; and therefore he interpolates the words of which I have spoken into this provision of the organic law, and says, after that interpolation, that the organic law is itself an enabling act. If correct in that, he is correct in his conclusion. The Senator from Georgia says he is not correct in it. I agree with the Senator from Georgia, and therefore, as I think, the conclusion does not follow. There is no legality in it; that is to say, there is no binding legality.

What right had the Legislature to act conclusively on that subject? to say "we appoint a place of meeting at such a time; the people of Kansas may come and vote at such a time; and we prescribe a test oath to those who may choose to vote on the question of calling a convention?" Who gave them authority to make that test oath, and apply it to the people of Kansas? Where did they get it? It is precisely as much rebellion as was the formation of the Topeka constitution, against the constituted government, although done by the Legislature. This Legislature having no such authority conferred on them, not having the right to call a convention given them by the original organic law, undertake to say that at such a day, and such an hour of the day, the people of Kansas shall vote on the question of whether a convention shall be called to make a constitution, and only such persons as take a particular kind of oath shall be allowed to vote. Where did they get the authority to make any such rule? From the organic law? No, says the Senator from Georgia; no, say I, and no must every man say who is not at liberty to do as the President has, and that is to interpolate into that clause the words "in framing their constitution," and thus to make out the argument. The whole foundation of his argument fails, and therefore his allegation, that here has been legality on one side and illegality on the other, fails. I aver that the Topeka constitution is as legal as that, as legal in its form, as legal in its inception, as legal in all the steps that have been taken with regard to it, in every particular, as much within the purview of the power of the people under that clause in the organic law, as the action of the Legislature.

I deny the legality of the first Legislature as I stated; and I deny, too, the assertion of the honorable Senator from Georgia, that it has ever been admitted or recognized by Congress. I say it has never been recognized in any shape or form. The Senator appealed to the fact that at the last session of Congress, in the general appropriation bill, we made a provision for the payment of the Legislature of Kansas. Congress, at the previous session, refused to make that appropriation. When we made it at the last session of Congress, it applied only to a future Legislature. It applied to the one now in existence. It could not go into operation until the beginning of the fiscal year, last July, going forward to next July. The first Legislature had become defunct; it had ceased to perform its functions; a new one was to be elected, and that fact being known, Congress made provision for its payment—not for the last one; that has not been made to this day; and under a law of Congress which the chairman of the Committee on Finance well understands, the President cannot apply money thus appropriated for the service of the current year, from last July until the next July, to the payment of a preceding debt for a Legislature whose term of office had expired.

But admitting the legality of the Legislature, usurping though it was, and admitting also that it had been recognized by Congress, nothing follows except that its action was advisory. So was the action of the Topeka Legislature. The people were not bound by one more than the other; one was not more rebellious than the other; one had as much force as the other, because the substratum, the authority from Congress to the Legislature to call a convention and prescribe rules for that convention was wanting.

If I am right in this position, the only question that remains is, does it fairly represent the people of Kansas? Does the vote taken under these circumstances at that particular period of time, represent the will of the people of Kansas, fairly expressed? I have commented on that. It is a question of fact, and it is a question of fact for us to settle; and we are not precluded by the assertion that here is legality on one side and illegality on the other. Have the people of Kansas, by any act of theirs, under any circumstances, at any time, manifested clearly to the Congress of the United States, their desire that the Lecompton constitution should be accepted, and that they should come into the Union as a State under it? That is the question submitted to us as the tribunal to decide it. What have we against it? What have we to reply? To what facts can we appeal as an answer to any allegation that it was so? We have in the first place the admitted unfairness and dishonesty of the whole proceedings from the beginning. I have adverted to them, and they are matter of history. If it was supposed that they would fairly represent the will of the people of Kansas (and it was designed they should) why not submit the whole constitution fairly to them? Why present to them two slave constitutions, and bid them take their choice between those two? Why accompany those two with an oath to support one or the other, both being abhorrent to a large portion of the people of Kansas? Why place the question in that form? If it was the will of the people, if they had any idea that a majority of the people of Kansas would sustain it, why not submit the question fairly to the people of Kansas without any of those restrictions? It is not a sufficient answer to satisfy my mind, to say that all legal forms have been complied with. Why was it not done?

Another answer is made in the thunder tones of the last vote of the people of Kansas, when, the question being submitted to them by the Legislature now existing in that Territory, they threw a majority of over ten thousand votes against that constitution? Is that no answer? Shall we not receive it as proof?

The honorable Senator from Georgia, on this particular matter, said, in answer to the inquiry which I now make why the present Legislature might not repeal the convention law, or might not order a new vote to be taken on the constitution, to ascertain what is the will of the people of Kansas, that its power was exhausted. What power was exhausted? Where do they get any power on the subject? He admits that they had no power from the Congress of the United States. There was no enabling act; no power to frame a constitution had been conferred on them from any quarter whatever; and yet he says the power was exhausted. The power that they assumed was exhausted; but, if it is in the power of a legal Legislature of Kansas to call a convention, and have the action of the people on a portion of the constitution, is it not in the power of another Legislature of the same Territory of Kansas to call a meeting of the people, in due form, to pass upon another question connected with the same subject, and the whole subject? If he had shown us where the power was derived from, if he had shown that the Congress of the United States had ever conferred any power on the Legislature of Kansas to act on that question, it would be one thing; but denying that, and admitting that no such authority was conferred, he yet says, in answer to a question put by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] their power was exhausted. I should like to have him, or some other Senator, show me, and show the country, whence was the derivation of this power; and to answer the question decisively, if they had none conferred on them, how they could exhaust that which they had not themselves? and why the existing Legislature has not the same right and authority to put the question to the people of Kansas that the previous Legislature had?

The President and the honorable Senator from Georgia agree on one point, and that is, as to who are the people; and I agree with them. The people, in the language of this law, and as we understand it with reference to suffrage, are those people who are legally qualified to vote. Such questions, I also agree with them, are not to be settled in mass meeting and without form, but are to be settled in due form by those who have the authority to exercise the right of suffrage. But this statement which was argued at such length, and which nobody would ever think of denying, avoids the true question at issue. The question at issue is, whether a fair opportunity has been accorded to this very people to exercise the right of suffrage on this question; and that the President and the Senator from Georgia, who undertakes to defend the message, have not discussed at so much length. They assume it; they take it for granted; we deny it. What is the argument to sustain it? Simply that, in ascertaining the will of the people, in the form prescribed, at the time prescribed with reference to the Lecompton constitution, all the forms of law prescribed by the Legislature have been complied with. I dislike, exceedingly, to hear as the sole answer to such allegations, that the thing was formally done.

The honorable Senator from Georgia is an eminent lawyer, and he knows that that is no answer in courts of law. It is no answer to an allegation of fraud to say that the forms have been complied with; and, as a matter of history, we know that there is no more dangerous mode of attacking the liberties of a people than under the forms of law. It has been well remarked that, for hundreds of years, Rome was a tyranny, exercising at the same time the forms of republican institutions. Tyrants always keep up the forms as long as they are able when they are defrauding the people of their rights, because in that manner they are able to prevent, perhaps, that outbreak which would arise from a resort to absolute physical force. Charles the First lost his head for tyrannizing under the forms of law; James, his son, lost his throne for the same reason; and our ancestors wrested this country from Great Britain for attempting to tyrannize over us under the forms of law. Yet this is the only answer that is made—"here is a legal form." The Legislature thus forced on the people of Kansas assumed to appoint a time for a convention to provide a mode of voting; and that convention assumed to make a constitution. They assumed to put it to the people; they prescribed their own forms; and followed out their own manner of doing it; and now, when we come forward and say that from the beginning to the end they designed to defraud, and did defraud, the people of Kansas, the answer is, "We cannot go into that subject, for it was all done under legal form." My reply is a very simple one: that fraud vitiates everything.

What were these forms? Let us enumerate them in distinct order, so that they may be understood by the people. A Legislature was forced on the people of Kansas in due form by a Missouri invasion. Does the honorable Senator from Missouri (I do not see him in his seat) want proof of that? The proof is found in the records of the committee of the House of Representatives that investigated the subject. Nobody has undertaken to deny it. The Legislature acted without legal right, as I have demonstrated, but in due form, in appointing a convention, but they prescribed a test oath, which rendered it unavailing. My honorable friend from Vermont, who sits beside me, [Mr. COLLAMER,] informs me that I am mistaken on that point, and he says the test oath had been repealed. A portion of it might have been repealed, but the whole of it was not.

Mr. COLLAMER. That portion requiring an oath to support the fugitive slave law had been repealed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was part of the test oath. That may have rendered it less odious; but still the objection lies to the principle that no Government in the world, such as ours, acting under a republican form, has a right to establish any test oath at all, with reference to the exercise of the right of suffrage, or go any further than adopt such measures as are necessary to show that a man is qualified to vote. That was the next step.

A census was taken in due form, not including one half of the people of the Territory. Next, the members of the convention forfeited their pledges. What were those pledges? If we may trust to what has been cited here, and not contradicted, a large proportion of the members of the convention pledged themselves to submit the whole constitution to the people. These pledges were forfeited; and I heard a very singular excuse given for this the other day by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] who said that their constituents had released them from their pledges; that they had been released by the people to whom they had given them. I should like to know how or in what form that release was given? They held themselves out to the people on paper pledging their honor that, if elected delegates to the convention, they would submit the constitution to the people. They refused to do so; they forfeited their word after they were elected. Having been elected, they refused to perform their promise. It is charged on them; and the excuse is, that those to whom they made the promise released them from the obligation of keeping it. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] with his high sense of honor, and I believe it is higher with no man, whether he could be excused from an obligation thus given in writing, by any individuals who might come to him, and say, "We do not hold you to it; party purposes require a little different disposition." Honorable men never would make such an excuse for breaking their word of honor thus given. So long as there was a single voter who threw his vote for me, or might have thrown his vote for me, on my written word, or my spoken word, that I would act in a particular manner, I should deem myself base if I could retain the office thus bestowed on me, and at the same time refuse to redeem the pledge that I had made.

The next step that was taken under the forms of law was to present two slave constitutions, as I have before stated, and tell the people of Kansas they might take their choice between them, provided they would swear to support the one which might get the majority of votes.

The last step in this proceeding, under the forms of law, was to return six or seven thousand votes as cast on the constitution, on the 21st of December, when it is satisfactorily shown that no more than two or three thousand were thrown. Does any Senator ask me where I get my authority for this? I get it from the same authority to which the President appeals to show that there was rebellion in Kansas—Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton. They say it, and nobody undertakes to dispute it.

Now, all these forms having been complied with, pledges having been forfeited, the question not submitted, and a cheat in the vote, we are told that legality is all on one side, and illegality on the other, and we are bound to take the result; in other words, that this is a legal ratification. That is the principle laid down, and it amounts to this: that because it has never been submitted, therefore, it has been legally adopted—a logical conclusion to which I am entirely unable to give my assent.

What is the reply which is made to the allegation of fraud? The honorable Senator from Georgia makes it. His reply is, that it must be investigated in the proper place. What is the proper place? Is not this the tribunal? Where is the question to be settled if not here? Are not we the tribunal to settle the question whether Kansas shall be admitted as a State under this constitution? Are we not the tribunal to settle whether the matter has been fairly submitted to the people of Kansas, and whether they have adopted the constitution? It comes before us for action. If a better tribunal than this can be found to settle the question definitely, I wish the honorable Senator had pointed it out.

The votes on the constitution are returned to Mr. John Calhoun. He is the man who forfeited his pledge; he is the man who broke his word; he is the man who promised to submit this constitution to the people of Kansas, and refused to do so. The votes are to be returned to him; he declares them; he claims no power to go behind the returns; and he is the person to make a conclusive return on this subject. When we wish to inquire into the truth of these allegations, and judge whether this constitution does fairly express the will of the people of Kansas, is it enough to reply, "the question has been settled by Mr. Calhoun, and he is the proper tribunal; and the Congress of the United States in deciding whether or not Kansas is to come into the Union as a State has no right to inquire whether a fraud has been committed or not; or whether the will of the people of Kansas has been expressed or not?" I reply again that the Senator from Georgia, for he is an eminent lawyer, well knows the principle that fraud vitiates everything, no matter what. It vitiates the record of a court of law. It sets aside a judgment. This is claimed as a judgment of the people of Kansas; a judgment that is conclusive by virtue of the decision that has been made there by a person who is a party to the whole thing. It is claimed as a judgment. We ask to go behind it, and inquire into it. It is said we are precluded; on what principle? Not on the principle of law, for if fraud will vitiate the record of a court and enable any proper tribunal to inquire into it, I wish to know why fraud will not vitiate an election, as has always been held from the foundation of the Government to the present time, when that election is brought before the very tribunal which is appointed by the Constitution to settle the question?

My conclusion, then, Mr. President, on all this matter is, simply, that the President of the United States, in sending this communication to us, his written argument, has deliberately chosen to omit the most important facts in the case, as well known to him, or which should have been as well known to him, as any man; for he cannot plead ignorance. They are facts apparent on the record; palpable, plain, unmistakable. He has omitted to state them, and he has stated others which are disproved by the record accompanying the message. It has been shown over and over again, beyond all power of contradiction, and I take it few men can be found with hardihood to deny it, that the vote of December 21st, on the constitution, does not express the will of the majority of the people of Kansas. The attempt is merely to estop us, and to say that, by virtue of the success of these fraudulent practices, the people of Kansas have no right to inquire into the matter. Sir, I deny the principle. It exists neither in law, nor in equity, nor in legislation, nor anywhere where truth and justice prevail. Therefore, all I have to say in reference to that matter is, that considering the question in that point of view, this constitution presents itself to my mind as an outrage, deliberately planned, followed up remorselessly, and, perhaps, from the indications we have had, designed to be carried through and imposed on the people of Kansas. All I have to say is, that it will meet with my resistance, feeble as it may be, here, so long as I am authorized to act on it, under the forms of the Constitution of the United States.

Sir, I have considered this question so far wholly with reference to the simple point whether, in the exercise of what is called popular sovereignty in Kansas, there has been any adoption by the people of that Territory of the constitution thus presented. That is only one branch of the remarks which I intended to present to the Senate, and the Senate will pardon me if, on this occasion, I go a little further, and treat of what I believe to be still more important, at any rate, as important, and, as affecting my mind, as materially with reference to the whole subject. I have presented the question on the ground of popular sovereignty. The party to which I belong have rejected the idea of popular sovereignty in the Territories from the beginning. We do not reject the idea that the people have a right to rule. We admit it in our principles and our practice; but we have rejected the idea that Congress had a right to change the whole form in which it had been accustomed to exercise authority over the Territories of the United States, and lay those Territories open to slavery when they were free, under the name of giving the people the right to prescribe their own institutions in their own way. Since this doctrine of popular sovereignty has been forced on us—since it has been adopted, to a certain extent—we have been compelled to yield to it. We were in hopes that even in the exercise of that principle, of the right which it was said the people had to frame their own institutions, Kansas would be a free State. We sympathized with it in the hope that it would be available. We took it as the shipwrecked mariner takes the first plank on which he can lay his hand in order to escape death. The boon was apparently held out, if it was a boon, to the people—the right to settle what their institutions should be by their own popular vote. We rejected it when offered, because we believed it was a breaking down of the landmarks which Congress had adopted with reference to the Territories, and establishing a principle that would carry civil war and slavery into the Territories. Our predictions in that particular have been verified.

Why have we rejected it; why have we repudiated it in regard to the Territory of Kansas—because in the remarks which I have to make I confine myself to that? I answer for myself when I say that I repudiated it because, to me, the circumstances under which it was introduced were such as to lead to the conclusion that, in my mind, it would make no difference even if the whole people of Kansas had adopted a constitution which recognized slavery. I expressed my sentiments on that subject on a former occasion very distinctly, and if I may be excused for doing so, although I am ordinarily averse to attempting to repeat myself, I wish to refer to what I said when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was under consideration, as the ground which I hold at the present time. I said then:

"If gentlemen expect to quiet all these controversies by adopting what my constituents now consider, and very well consider, an act of gross wrong, under whatever pretense it may be, whether on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the former act, or any other, after having rested so long satisfied with it, let me tell them that this, in my judgment, is the beginning of their troubles. I can answer for one individual. I have avowed my own opposition to slavery, and I am as strong in it as my friend from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] I wish to say, again, that I do not mean that I have any of the particular feeling on the subject which gentlemen have called 'sickly sentimentality,' but if this matter is to be pushed beyond what the Constitution originally intended it; if, for political purposes, and with a political design and effect—because it is a political design and effect—we are to be driven to the wall by legislation here, let me tell gentlemen that this is not the last they will hear of the question. Territories are not States, and if this restriction is repealed with regard to that Territory—it is not yet in the Union, and you may be prepared to understand that, with the assent of the free States, in my judgment it never will come into the Union, except with exclusion of slavery."—Appendix to Congressional Globe, vol. 29, p. 322.

I took the ground then, that if the Missouri restriction were repealed, and this Territory which had been dedicated to freedom, thrown open to the incursions of slavery for the purpose, as I believed then, and believe now, of making a slave State of it, it was not the last of my opposition; that if it presented itself in my day with a constitution allowing slavery, I should oppose its admission as a State. I am willing to go further now and say that, viewing it as I did at the time, and as I do now, to be an outrage, to be a breach of compact, to be a repeal of that restriction for the purpose of making slave States out of Territory which was before dedicated to freedom, I hold myself at liberty to contest it, now and at all times hereafter. Establish slavery in that State, if you please, by force or fraud, for nothing but force or fraud can do it; and the result with regard to myself is that, on that subject, I hold the liberty to agitate, I shall hold the liberty to agitate, and I will agitate so long as a single hope remains that slavery may be driven from the Territory thus stolen, robbed from freedom. I have no hesitation on that point; I am perfectly willing to avow it now and before the country. While I say now, as I have said here before, that with regard to the slave States of this Union, I would not, if I could, interfere with their institutions; while I hold that under the Constitution of the United States we have no right to interfere with them directly, and that under the laws of morality we have no right to do indirectly that which we have no right to do directly; and while I am willing they should enjoy all the benefit they can get from their institution undisturbed by me, here, henceforth, and forever, as long as they may choose to embrace it, with regard to this Territory which has once been dedicated to freedom by a solemn compact, and which has been stolen from freedom by the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and where slavery has now been forced on the people by a series of outrages such as the world never saw—a man can hardly imagine the gross character of these outrages—I hold myself free from all obligation. Force it there if you will; force in this constitution if you please; but I hold myself absolved, so far as the Territory is concerned, from all obligation to receive it.

I was commenting on the idea of what was called popular sovereignty, and I was about to say that I considered it at the time, and now consider it, a mere pretext. It was a mere excuse for the repeal of the Missouri restriction. It was designed, in my judgment, and I stated it deliberately, for the purpose of making Kansas a slave State. This was denied; it was denied indignantly on this floor. I have been myself rebuked for undertaking to question the motives with which the act was done. Sir, I appeal to the recorded speech of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. EVANS,] who stated, in substance, subsequent to the passage of the act, that it was designed to make Kansas a slave State. I appeal to the speech made by a northern man, I regret to say a Representative from Pennsylvania, in the other House, who said, substantially, that it was designed to give Kansas to slavery as a sort of offset, to what we obtained in California, south of the line of 36° 30'. I appeal moreover, as proof conclusive, to the facts which took place at the time; to the nature of the bill; to the want of necessity for the passage of any such act for any other purpose; and to the peculiar provisions of that bill which so hemmed in Kansas and hedged it about with slave Territory, that, apparently, it was impossible for the people of the free States to make their entrance into it.

What else could have been meant by the repeal of the Missouri restriction? I know some gentlemen said "it is a matter of feeling with us; we do not think anything will come of it." It was answered with the manifest reply, "will you set the country in a blaze from one end to the other merely upon a point of honor; for a thing that you do not intend or wish to avail yourselves of?" If it could be rendered more manifest by anything that could be appealed to, it was proved by every after transaction with reference to the matter; it was proved by the forcible invasion; it was proved by that series of outrages to which I have referred; and now, at this day, nobody undertakes to deny what we then charged.

I say, therefore, that this popular sovereignty idea was a pretense. It was held up to the people for a short time as, in fact, the main thing to be accomplished by the bill. The honorable Senator from Georgia the other day undertook to say here in his place that he was familiar with that provision, and that it was not introduced for any such purpose; but simply for the purpose of excluding a conclusion; that is to say, that there were some gentlemen who held there was danger if you repealed the compromise that the old French and Spanish laws would be reinstated, and that slavery thereby would be established in Kansas, and that this clause was put in merely for the purpose of negating that conclusion. That is not so, because if you appeal to the bill itself, the very next provision settles that matter, namely:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive or put in force any law or regulation which may have existed prior to the act of the 6th March, 1820, either protecting, establishing, prohibiting, or abolishing slavery."

That is the clause which affects the question to which the Senator from Georgia alluded.

It is proved by another fact. The honorable Senator from Illinois, in his speech which he made on the night the bill was passed, the last night, the memorable night, declared that this clause (which was not an amendment, but came in as one of the changes of the committee who reported the bill, and was moved by him) was the main feature of the bill, and the removal of the Missouri restriction was only an incident. I dare say the Senator remembers it. He said that the great object of the compromises of 1850, as they were called, the leading idea of the compromises of 1850, for which he contended, was to give the people the power of deciding what their institutions should be in the Territories, and he went so far on that occasion as to contend that they should be allowed not only to establish but to exclude slavery; that is to say, that no provision should exist which would not give the people of the Territory both powers. I have his speech before me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not intend to interrupt the gentleman from Maine; but he said a moment ago that the object of that bill was to make a slave State of Kansas, and that nobody denies it. I must say to him that I interpose my positive denial. It was not the object to make it a slave State; it was not the object to make it a free State; but it was the object to leave the people of Kansas perfectly free to do as they pleased in the management of all their domestic institutions, slavery included. I do not desire to say any more than that at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We use language in debate which the Senator is aware is perfectly understood; but, if taken literally, goes perhaps further than it should. When I say that nobody denies it, I do not mean that everybody admits it. I mean to say simply that the matter is palpable from after circumstances as well as from what took place at the time; and from the absence of any other reasonable motive, and from what has taken place since, in the progress of affairs towards making it a slave Territory, no reasonable, unprejudiced mind, not connected with the transaction, can deny, on any good, logical reason, that such was the object with which the Missouri compromise line was repealed.

But, sir, I was replying to the idea that this clause was intended, as was suggested by the honorable Senator from Georgia, as a mere exclusion of a conclusion. The framer of that bill, in his speech on that occasion, said that the idea of popular sovereignty was the principal thing aimed at in the bill; and that the removal of the Missouri restriction, instead of being the principal thing, as contended by the Senator from Georgia, was merely an incident necessary in order to effect the object of conferring popular sovereignty. That is the idea. I stated that it was a pretense. I so considered it. We so considered it on our side of the House, and so stated it. But I now go further, and say that what I then considered to be a pretense for the repeal of the Missouri compromise, I now consider to have been a delusion and a snare; and I am willing to give my reasons for this opinion as briefly as I can.

It was held out to the country as the main feature of that bill, that a great boon was to be conferred on the people of the Territories; that whereas, by the operation of the Missouri restriction, they had been excluded from the power of deciding what their own domestic institutions should be, by the repeal of that restriction this power was conferred on them. Upon whom? What was understood at the time? That it was conferred on the people of the Territories as the people of the Territories, and acting with regard to their own territorial institutions. That idea was boldly proclaimed by the Senator from Illinois. That idea was proclaimed as boldly by southern gentlemen on this floor on the occasion of the Kansas debate. It was denied by nobody, if I recollect, except the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] and a hint of dissent was given by an honorable Senator from Virginia; but, with these exceptions, according to my recollection, no one here denied it. Southern men and northern men all agreed that, by the repeal of the Missouri compromise, it was intended to confer on the people of the Territories, as people of the Territories, the power and right to settle their own institutions in their own way; to say whether they would have slavery or not. It was so presented to the people on the stump, in the years 1854 and 1855, throughout all the northern States.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, I will make a remark here. I intend hereafter to make a more formal answer to his argument; but on the proposition he is now stating, I beg leave to call the gentleman's mind to the fact that when that particular subject in the discussion of the Kansas bill was under consideration, it was distinctly stated that the supporters of that bill North and South entertained different views as to the rights of the people of a Territory to exclude slaves from a Territory; and for that reason the clause was added to the section of the bill which gives power to the people of the Territory "subject only to the Constitution of the United States," the intent being to leave that particular power subject to construction by the courts of justice. We carried out that intent by providing, in another clause of the bill, for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States on every question touching slavery, whether the amount in contest was two thousand dollars or not. The gentlemen from the South who supported the bill contended that it was not in the power of Congress to confer on the people of a Territory the right to exclude slaves, because our right to carry our property into the Territories was guaranteed by the Constitution. Gentlemen from the North denied it; and on that particular question this very clause was inserted into the bill of a grant of power subject only to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, referring to that contested question which, by common consent, was to be submitted to the Supreme Court, and has been decided, in the Dred Scott case, in conformity with the views then entertained by gentlemen from the South.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I remember that controversy very well, and I know that something of that sort was said, but the matter was not questioned as a matter of argument. Gentlemen did not seem disposed to discuss it. Nobody, as I said before, started the idea, then so monstrous, then so new, now established, as the Senator says (if he considers it established) by the opinion of the Supreme Court; nobody dwelt upon it. That clause means nothing more; it is substantially in all the territorial bills; not in the same language, but to the same extent; that is to say, that they shall have all power of legislation in the Territory, subject to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; but it was not contended then in argument that the Constitution of the United States, by its own force, carried slavery into the Territories, and protected it there. It was hinted that a different opinion prevailed; but the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Badger] disavowed it. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Pratt,] if I remember aright, offered an amendment, which he subsequently withdrew, giving expressly to the people of the Territories power to exclude or admit slavery at pleasure. The language of the act, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. WADSWORTH] says, carries the same idea with it.

But the point to which I was directing my attention was simply this: that at that time it was not pretended but that the people of the Territories had power, or were intended to have power, under that clause to legislate upon the whole subject—subject, however, as of course everything of that kind must be decided to be, to the Constitution of the United States. I am speaking of what the idea was then; and I was endeavoring to illustrate my position, that it was intended as a snare and a delusion. Why? It was so presented here; it was so presented in the country; it was so argued through the free States. Was it the design of gentlemen who placed it in that condition, to have two grounds on which they might sustain the Democratic party; South, on the point that there was no constitutional power; North, on the point that there was constitutional power; and thus vibrate in the scale, on the one side or the other, according as they might catch votes, as they assumed this or that doctrine? Was that the calm, settled intention of that bill? It makes out my position of its design to establish slavery there, much more strongly than any argument I have used.

But what is the result after it was thus argued? When the Cincinnati convention met we had an entire change of doctrine. The Cincinnati convention intimated a different opinion; and the Democracy of the North, which had talked so much about popular sovereignty before, which universally in the Senate had claimed that the people of the Territories had the right as Territories to settle the question of slavery in their own way; the Democracy of the North, when they met in Cincinnati, yielded to the doctrine promulgated there that it was only to be settled when they came to form a State constitution; because that is the clear inference from the platform there adopted.

You have gone still further, and now assume the doctrine that the Constitution by its own force not only carries slavery into the Territories, but protects it in the Territories, until a State constitution is formed. Is that the doctrine? Is that what is now assumed by the Supreme Court? Suppose it to be so, I should like to know what new power was given to the people of the Territories by this famous clause in the Kansas bill granting popular sovereignty? Did they not have that power before? Was it necessary to repeal the Missouri compromise in order to give the people of the Territory of Kansas a right to prohibit or establish slavery by their State constitution as they saw fit. The Missouri compromise provided nothing further than that slavery should not be carried into the Territories north of 36° 30'. Suppose, without the act, the people of Kansas, when they came to form a State constitution, should have provided that slavery might exist in that State; legalized and authorized it; and sent that constitution to Congress, and it was admitted; would not that have been a repeal of the Missouri compromise? What was gained, then, in any form, I should like to ask, by this famous provision introduced into this bill, and which has been called a stump speech?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer the Senator from Maine. There was on the statute-book an act prohibiting the introduction of slaves there "forever," not confined to the Territory only, but extending forever; and it is useless to disguise the fact that there was a large political party in this country who claimed that "forever" was to apply to a State as well as a Territory, and hence they resolved that they would never admit another slave State into this Union, whether the people wanted it or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How resolved it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Resolved in county meetings, in congressional conventions, in State conventions against any more slaveholding States whether the people of the proposed State desired slavery or not. The Democratic party took the ground that the people of each Territory, while a Territory, should be left free, without any congressional intervention, to fix their institutions to suit themselves, subject only to the Constitution of the United States; and that when they came into the Union, they should come in with just such a constitution as they desired, subject only to the same restriction. Here was an act on the statute-book which purported to invade both these rights. The Kansas-Nebraska bill repealed that prohibition or restriction of slavery, leaving the people perfectly free to do as they pleased, both while a Territory and when they formed a State constitution, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution of the United States. I repeat, therefore, the object of that bill was to remove all restrictions, and make the principle general, universal, that the people should fix all their institutions, slavery not excepted, both while a Territory and a State, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution.

The Senator now comes forward and says that since that time the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Dred Scott case, has decided that the Missouri restriction was unconstitutional, and that, therefore, Congress could not delegate to a Territorial Legislature the power to prohibit slavery; and hence, he says, this act conferred no new rights on the people of the Territory. His argument goes too far. If that be the true construction, it shows that the only effect of the Kansas-Nebraska bill was to take an unconstitutional and void statute from the statute-book. You assume the correctness of the Dred Scott decision for the purpose of your argument. I do not blame you for assuming that, for it is a decision by the highest judicial tribunal on earth, the tribunal authorized by the Constitution of the United States to decide it. They have decided it, and we are bound by the decision, whatever may have been our individual opinions previously. That decision establishes the fact that the Missouri restriction was unconstitutional and void; the fact that Congress cannot prohibit slavery in a Territory; the fact that the dogma of the Wilmot proviso was void, and would have been a nullity if it had been imposed on the Territories. If that be so, was it not wise to remove that void legislation which remained on the statute-book only as a snare, or as a scare-crow, and which ought not to be there because it was in violation of the Constitution of our country? I ask, was it not wise to remove it and to say plainly, in clear and explicit language, that our true intent was to leave the people of a Territory, while a Territory, and also when they become a State, perfectly free to make their laws and establish their institutions upon all questions, slavery not excepted, to suit themselves, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The honorable Senator, probably on account of my unfortunate mode of expression, did not exactly comprehend what I meant to say. I am very glad, however, to hear him now give the old original construction to this provision of which we have been speaking. He says now that the intention was to confer on the people of the Territories, while Territories, the power to settle all questions, including slavery, in their own way, subject to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course. If the Constitution prohibited the exercise of that power, you could not confer it. If the Constitution of the United States prohibited you from passing the Missouri restriction, you had no right to pass it. If the Constitution allowed you to give the people of the Territory the right to prohibit slavery while a Territory, this act conferred the power. In other words, the Kansas-Nebraska act conferred all the power which it was possible by any legislation or any human effort to give to the people of a Territory under the Constitution of the United States on the subject of slavery. We could give no more, for we gave all we had—all that the Constitution did not prohibit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not quarreling about that at all. I was saying that this was a delusion and a snare. Why? Because it did precisely what the honorable Senator says it did. It professed to hold out to the people of the Territories that they had a right which they could exercise to exclude slavery, if they saw fit, or to admit it, if they saw fit, subject to the Constitution. It was so stated and so argued to the country.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I dislike very much to interfere with the course of argument of the Senator from Maine; but it is a historical truth, which cannot now be shaken, that during the discussion of that bill, and during the preliminary meetings of its friends, which were made public, the fact was divulged, that its supporters differed in relation to that constitutional power; that some from the North contended that the people of the Territory had the power, if we gave it to them; that Congress had the power to give to them authority to exclude slaves from the Territory, whilst a Territory; and that, on the other hand, the representatives of the people of the South determinedly resisted that pretension, and said, from the beginning, they would never agree to any act which in any manner might imply the concession of a right in Congress, or in the people of a Territory under Congress, to exclude them with their property from territory which was common soil, belonging to the people of the whole United States.

The fact I have just stated cannot be contested, for the reason that there is a special clause in the bill providing for the submission of that very question to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Senators from the North, who took the opposite view of the question, said, "very well, we differ on this constitutional question, but there is a tribunal in this country which can settle all these disputed points of jurisdiction without the necessity of resorting to force or bloodshed: let that supreme tribunal decide, and we will submit." The people of the South never asked for anything else; never sought any other solution of the question. Now, it is obvious that since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case, it is decided that from the origin all this agitation of the slavery question has been directed against the constitutional rights of the South; and that both Wilmot provisos and Missouri compromise lines were unconstitutional. An attempt is made to go back on the interpretation of the Kansas act, and then, when that fails, to question the authority of that tribunal whose right to decide in the last resort has never before been questioned in this country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I am not aware of any such provision in the Kansas-Nebraska act in regard to referring this question to the Supreme Court of the United States as the Senator has referred to. If there is any such provision he can find it. I know it was proposed, but it was not admitted at the time. But whether there is such a clause or not, would make no difference. Congress can confer no power upon the courts of the United States, except under the Constitution. If they would have it under the provisions of the Constitution, very well; if they would not have it, it cannot be conferred by Congress.

But I do not wish to be drawn off from the point I was arguing. I do not undertake to say that there were not gentlemen at the South, then members of the Senate, who held, or might have supposed and might have intimated, an opinion that there was no power on the part of the people of the Territories to exclude slavery until they came to form a State constitution. That might have been so. What I was arguing was, that the idea held out to the country at the time was that the people of the Territories had the control of the subject, and would continue to have it while a Territory. I say it was so presented to the people in 1854 and 1855, at the polls, throughout the free States. I do not know how it was presented throughout the southern States. I know that gentlemen on this floor, Senators from southern States, avowed the doctrine that the people would have power to act on it as they chose, to exclude slavery or admit slavery.

The point I was making, however, was one totally distinct from that; and it was, that no sooner had the people been induced to believe that such was the intention, no sooner had this pretense been made available for the purpose of reconciling the people of the free States to the repeal of the Missouri restriction, than the Cincinnati convention met and repudiated the whole doctrine of territorial popular sovereignty. Whatever the Senator from Illinois may now say with regard to his construction of that clause, what it meant in the beginning, the Democratic convention of this country, in nominating a President, especially repudiated that doctrine before any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and avowed substantially that the people of a Territory had no right whatever to exclude slavery until they came to form a State constitution.

Now, the Senator from Illinois has not even attempted to answer the question which I put to him, which was this: if the doctrine of the Cincinnati convention is true—not the doctrine of this bill, as he asserts, but if the doctrine of the Cincinnati convention is true—that the only power which the people of the Territories have to interfere with slavery is when they form a State constitution, what was gained by that celebrated provision thus inserted in the Kansas-Nebraska bill? I say the people had it before. Suppose the Missouri restriction had continued up to the present day, providing that slavery should not exist north of a certain line, 36° 30'; and at the present day, while that restriction was in operation, the people of Kansas should assemble and adopt a State constitution, by which they should authorize the introduction and sale of slaves, and then should send that constitution to us, and we should admit them on that constitution: should we not repeal the Missouri restriction pro tanto? Certainly we should.

I say then, that under this resolution of the Cincinnati convention, which was the creed of the Democratic party, North and South, no power whatever was conferred on the people of the Territories in regard to that particular matter of popular sovereignty. They had none that did not exist before. No boon was conferred.

Therefore I say that I believed it was not only a pretense at the time, but it was a fraud and a snare; and when the people of the free States were deluded into the idea that by the repeal of the Missouri compromise line they were to have the power given to the people of the Territories to establish or reject slavery, as they pleased, the snare was, that the Democratic party was to put it to them next, that they should not have the power to admit or reject slavery, as they pleased, except when they came to form a State constitution, and slavery had overrun them; and that when, by such proceedings as the present, they had been bound hand and foot, and cast into the burning fiery furnace of slavery, then they might have the privilege of doing—what? Simply what they could do before—form a constitution to suit themselves; send it to Congress; and if Congress adopted it, then repeal the Missouri restriction. It went nothing further than that, and that was the point I made; and to that point no answer has been given. I was endeavoring to illustrate the idea that there was an intention in this matter—an intention demonstrated from the absence of all possible motive except to force slavery into the Territory; from the nature of the provisions surrounding the Territory with slave States; from the proceedings that have taken place since in the Territory, and from the principle which was adopted as a cardinal point in the creed of the great Democratic party, viz: that they should not have the power to reject or exclude slavery until they came to form a State constitution, and in the mean time, that everybody from the slave States might carry slaves there when and how they pleased, and they were there recognized and protected by the Constitution of the United States. Sir, had that doctrine been announced at the time the clause was inserted, had that clause been inserted, that we intended to leave the people of the Territories perfectly free when they form a State constitution to establish or reject slavery, as they please, would it not have been laughed to scorn, as conferring any new advantage on the people of the Territories—anything that they had not before? Certainly it would.

The Senator from Georgia said this measure had been before the popular forum, and the popular forum had decided in its favor. How has it decided? It has decided under these pretenses, these delusions, these frauds practiced upon them with regard to what was the absolute meaning of that clause. What privilege was conferred on the people by it? No other than that which I have spoken of; and it is idle to talk of the matter having been settled by the great tribunal of public opinion. There has been no such opinion expressed, because there have been no points except the two I have mentioned, before the people, one of which was abandoned when it had served its purpose, and the other carried in such a manner as to force slavery on the people of Kansas without any power left in the people to act on the subject, directly or indirectly.

I desire, before concluding, to advert to one other position which was taken by the Senator from Georgia, and which has been alluded to again to-day—that this matter has been settled by the judicial forum. It is said that it has been carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and settled there. Does the honorable Senator from Louisiana, as a lawyer, undertake to tell me that the question has been settled by a judicial decision in that court? Did that question ever arise and present itself to the mind of the court with reference to any necessity of the case? To what extent does the honorable Senator, or anybody else who is a lawyer, undertake to say that the decision of the court is binding? It is binding so far, and so far alone, as it can issue its mandate. Its opinion is of force only upon the question which settles the cause. Am I bound to follow out a set of opinions that may be advanced by any set of judges in any court simply because, after they have decided a cause, they undertake to give their opinions? They may be bad men, they may be weak men, but their mandate in the cause before them must be obeyed; and I will go as far and as readily as any man to obey the mandate of any court to which I am bound to render obedience; and I am bound to render obedience to the Supreme Court of the United States; but when they undertake to settle questions not before them, I tell them those questions are for me as well as for them. When they undertake to give opinions on collateral matters which are not involved in their decision, and they are not called upon to decide them, I tell them they are men like myself and others, and their opinions are of no value, except so far as they enforce them by sufficient and substantial reasons; and if they give bad reasons or bad logic, I would treat them as I should anybody else who would try to convince my judgment in such a way. I have good authority on this point; and it is authority that I present for the special benefit of those who are disposed to read its lectures lately on the subject of bowing to the opinion of the court. I have a law-book in my hand, from which I wish to read one or two passages. The supreme court of one of the States of this Union, in giving the opinion which I hold in my hand, in speaking of the action of the Supreme Court of the United States, says:

"The disregard of this court to the known will of the makers of the Constitution, as to the rule of construction, is equally exhibited in a number of other cases; especially in the cases of Cohen vs. Virginia, and Worcester & Butler vs. Georgia, in which it held that a State might be sued, notwithstanding the clear manifestation of the will of the makers of the Constitution, in the amendment of it to which I have heretofore referred, that the Constitution was not to be so construed as to make a State suable.

"But are not the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to govern this, as to the rule of construing the Constitution? They are not, any more than the decisions of that court are to be governed by the decisions of this.

"The Supreme Court of the United States has no jurisdiction over this court, or over any department of the government of this State."

I wish to read another passage showing the opinions entertained by the learned court which gave the decision before me:

"But say that I am wrong in this opinion; still, I deny that the decisions of the Supreme Court referred to are precedents to govern this court.

"Those decisions were mere partisan decisions—to be overruled in the Court which made them, as soon as a majority of the members of the court should be of different politics from the politics of the members who made the decisions. The doctrine that a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is to dictate a man's politics to him, is a doctrine avowed by a few in this country. Such a doctrine would be an easy means of perpetuating a dynasty of principles, however false and wicked. All that would have to be done, would be to start with men of those principles. Their decisions would do the rest. Whatever they said the Constitution meant, the people would have to vote it to mean. Parties, on constitutional questions, could not arise.

"But are these mere political decisions, and made by partisan judges?"

Then the court go on to review the history of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, beginning with Judge Marshall, to show that they are mere partisans. There is another little extract I should like to read.

Mr. STUART. What court is it, from the opinion of which the Senator is reading?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will give my authority after I have read what the court say:

"Now, partisan decisions may do to bind the political party which the makers of them happen to belong to. They certainly bind no other party. And this has been the uniform practice of all parties in this country. The Supreme Court said a bank is constitutional: yet, bank charters have been vetoed by three several Presidents: Madison, Jackson, Tyler."

The same court say we received such a mandate from the Supreme Court of the United States, but we treated it with contempt. Sir, that is the opinion of the supreme court of Georgia delivered in the case of Padelford & Co. vs. the city of Savannah, in the fourteenth volume of Georgia Reports, page 438.

If these are mere party decisions, let us understand it. It seems that when the decisions are one way by the Supreme Court of the United States, gentlemen of the South say "the judges are partisan judges; they cannot settle constitutional questions for us; those are political matters." When, however, they undertake extra-judicially to give opinions not called for by the point before them; to lay down doctrines at variance with the whole history and precedents of the country from its very foundation, to overturn the decisions of their own predecessors, greater men than ever they can hope to be, and to reverse all the decisions of the legislative department of the Government, on questions of a political character and description, on their own mere say-so, we are told all this is law.

Sir, I was perfectly aware, from the course of proceeding, what this decision would be. When I saw the dictum, or the dogma, if you please to call it so, laid down in the Cincinnati platform, that there was no power in the people of a Territory to exclude slavery, and when I saw that that question had been brought to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that the Supreme Court, after hearing the argument, had adjourned from one day before the election of President over to another day after the election of President, I knew what the strength of the slavery party was; I felt what the decision was to be; and I felt as well, and I do not hesitate to say it here, that had the result of that election been otherwise, and had not the party triumphed on the dogma which they had thus introduced, we should never have heard of a doctrine so utterly at variance with all truth; so utterly destitute of all legal logic; so founded on error, and unsupported by anything like argument, as is the opinion of the Supreme Court.

I should like, if I had time, to attempt to demonstrate the fallacy of that opinion. I have examined the view of the Supreme Court of the United States on the question of the power of the Constitution to carry slavery into free territory belonging to the United States, and I tell you that I believe any fairly respectable lawyer in the United States can show, beyond all question, to any fair and unprejudiced mind, that the decision has nothing to stand upon except assumption, and bad logic from the assumptions made. The main proposition on which that decision is founded; the corner-stone of it, without which it is nothing; without which it fails entirely to satisfy the mind of any man, is this: that the Constitution of the United States recognizes slavery as property, and protects it as such. I deny it. It neither recognizes slavery as property, nor does it protect slavery as property.

Fortunately for my assertion, the Supreme Court, in making that the very corner-stone of their decision, without which the whole fails, state the clauses on which they ground these assertions. On what do they found the assertion that the Constitution protects slavery as property? On the provision of the Constitution by which Congress is prohibited from passing a law to prevent the African slave trade for twenty years; and therefore they say the Constitution recognizes it as property. Will not anybody see that this constitutional provision, if it works one way, must work the other? If, by protecting the slave trade for twenty years, we recognize it as property, when we say that at the end of the twenty years we will cease to protect it, or may cease to do so, is not that denying that it is property after that period elapses? Suppose I yield to the court all the force they demand, and admit that here is a distinct recognition that this is property, because we recognize that the African slave trade may exist for twenty years; yet, when we say that after that period has elapsed that protection shall no longer exist, do we not say that after that period of time it no longer is property, and ceases to be at the expiration of twenty years? Certainly if the argument will work the one way, it must work the other. If you derive the power under the Constitution, because for twenty years it is property, you lose it when the twenty years elapse, by the same method of argument.

Mr. MASON. That is an assumption.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is my argument, and it is my answer to the assumption of the Supreme Court of the United States. If it is an assumption on my part, it is certainly an assumption on theirs. But I leave it to every fair man, on every principle of logic. It depends on that, does it? That died twenty years after the Constitution went into operation. Did not the recognition die with it? Does the Constitution recognize it after the twenty years have elapsed? The power is gone. So far as you draw any recognition from that clause, it ceased with the expiration of the period.

Again, the court say it is recognized as property by the provisions that persons held to service escaping from one State into another shall be delivered up. Are they not spoken of as "persons?" Are they spoken of as property? Is there anything said about their being property? Does not that provision of the Constitution apply just as well to white apprentices, held under the laws of the different States for a term of years, as it does to slaves? Will you pretend that by the Constitution of the United States, white persons, held as apprentices for a term of years, are property? Certainly no such position can exist. Your argument, if it works at all, must go the whole length, and you must find that the word "person" means property, and may be regularly and legally construed as property. I have not time now to pursue this topic.

Then, sir, to sum up the substance of my argument, I wish to say again that what I consider this original scheme, to have been, was to assert popular sovereignty in the first place with a view of rendering the repeal of the Missouri compromise in some way palatable; then to deny it and avow the establishment of slavery; then to legalize this by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and claim that it had become established. I sincerely believe that decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was a part of the programme. It was to be had, if having it would avail; but if not, it would never have been had.

Mr. President, the natural result of all this should have been foreseen. The honorable Senator from Illinois, at this day, interposes his strong arm to stay the tide of slavery which is setting over Kansas Territory contrary to the express will of her people. He claims to do so, not from any sympathy he has with the general subject, but simply for the purpose of carrying out what he says is the original intent and meaning of his favorite bill. From what I have said, I think it is perfectly obvious that he might have foreseen what the result would be. He has gone on, according to the dictates of his own conscience; first breaking down the barrier which kept slavery out of Kansas; next protecting and defending every outrage that has been perpetrated in Kansas, with a view to force slavery on that people up to the time of this last great outrage, when it was attempted to place a constitution, in the shape it was, before the people, and then send it to Congress; and now he stays his hand here. Why, sir, with what a vain hope! Does the honorable Senator think he can take the prey from the tiger and not himself be torn? When was slavery ever known to stay its hand in its march over a free country unless forced to do so; and when it had seized it, when was it ever known to let go its hold? It is a part of the system to pay nothing at all for involuntary servitude; and if the service is voluntary, experience has shown that it must be unlimited, unquestioning, eternal. To hesitate is to lose all; to stop, is to die. The experience of greater men than the Senator from Illinois, and of many smaller ones, might have taught him that lesson.

Sir, I say that he and the friends who stood by him, in repealing the Missouri compromise at the time it was repealed, should have known what the result was to be, should have known that as the design was to force slavery into Kansas, so slavery would never leave Kansas unless it was driven out by force. They should have understood what the result was to be; and it is not enough for them to say now, that they do not, and did not understand it. Well might they quote the language of the greatest poet of this century, and say:

"The thorns which I have reaped are of the tree
I planted; they have torn me and I bled.
I should have known what fruit would spring from such a seed."

But, sir, what is to be the remedy for all this? What is promised us? The President tells us we are to have peace when this constitution is adopted and Kansas comes into the Union as a slave State. He speaks contrary to all philosophy. Have we ever had any peace for the last four years on this question? Has this country been a peaceful country during that time? The initiation was only then; and when this matter was initiated; when the Missouri compromise was repealed; did you not witness in this country an excitement which would not die; and yet we are told now, consummate the iniquity, carry out the cheat, repudiate popular sovereignty, get a decision from a slavery court that the Constitution (shame to it, if so) not only recognizes, but protects slavery on free soil, force slavery on the people of Kansas, by presenting them two constitutions and telling them to choose one of them, for they shall go no further, and then we shall have peace!

Sir, let me tell the President of the United States, and all others, that the opposition to slavery in this country is now a sentiment, an idea—not to slavery as it exists in the States, not a desire to interfere with your institutions anywhere; but a determination, if possible, to arrest its progress over the free territories of this country, because it is believed to be a curse. Although that sentiment was covered up in the ashes of the compromise of 1850, buried so deep that it seemed as if it would never again spring into life, you yourself exhumed it; you added fuel to the sparks that were buried; you kindled that sentiment into a flame; you have been heaping combustible material on it from that day to the present, until at last you are in a fair way to make it a conflagration. Upon you be the consequence if it be so. It is not for the President to cry "Peace!" at the consummation of an outrage, when the very beginning of it excited the detestation of the community in which he was born and bred.

But, sir, we go further than that. That is to be the consequence on the one side. What is to be on the other? We are told that we are to have a crisis, and the Union is to be dissolved. I expressed my opinion on that topic four years ago. We have had resolutions in the newspapers from the State of Alabama, that if Kansas shall not be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, it would be time to look about and see how this Union could hold together. We have had it started in one or two other of the States of the South. We have had it from the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] and from other Senators. They tell us that then will be a crisis; the moment the people of this country get divided into parties, North and South, on a question that is important to them, and the people of the North triumph at the polls under the Constitution, then the time has arrived, the crisis has come, when the Union is to be dissolved! Sir, if I did not think it was to be a very serious matter in some respects, I could laugh at this idea. At any rate, it reminds me of a story familiar to all of you probably, though I never saw it until yesterday.

This disposition, which gentlemen have on all occasions, to get up a crisis whenever anything looks against their peculiar view of a subject, and to inform us that the time has arrived, with the idea that people can be frightened from their propriety, is illustrated by a story which I saw in the newspapers, something like this: A celebrated general in the last war is said, in one of the battles on the advance to the city of Mexico, to have rode up to Captain Duncan, who was in charge of a battery, and, with a very grave and sober face, told him: "Captain Duncan, fire; the crisis has arrived." Duncan turned to his men, with matches all lighted and ready, and gave the order to fire. An old artilleryman walked up to him and said: "Captain, I do not see any enemy within range of our guns; what shall we fire at?" "Fire at the crisis," was the response; "did you not hear the General say the crisis has come; fire at that." [Laughter.] So it is with gentlemen, I think, in reference to this matter. They are always charged and ready to fire at the crisis. I believe it has arrived half a dozen times within my recollection.

What I wish to say on that point is, that I look on it with great seriousness, but without a particle of apprehension. We in the free States have rights under the Constitution of the United States, and we have determination enough to enforce and sustain them. We are not to be driven from the position we have assumed by any threats of a disruption of the Union. We have no particular pretentious exclamations to utter with regard to our great attachment to it. Let that attachment be proved by our works. We will stand by the Union of this country so long as it is worth standing by; and let me say to gentlemen that the moment the time arrives when it is to be used as an argument to us, "you must yield on a question which you consider vital to your interest and your rights, or we shall take measures to dissolve the Union;" my answer is, that if we do yield, the Union has ceased to have any value for me. So long as I stand upon American soil, a freeman with equal rights with others, and power to enforce them according to my ability, unrestricted, unrestrained, and unfettered, too, this Union is valuable to me; but when the hour comes when that privilege no longer exists, when I hold my rights by the tenure of yielding to weak fears, I am willing to see any consequences follow, so far as I am concerned, or so far as my people are concerned. Let not gentlemen indulge themselves with the hope that so far as the people of the free States are concerned, all these resolutions passed by southern Legislatures about dissolving the Union, and all these mass meetings held for the same purpose, and all intimations thrown out here to the same effect, are to produce any possible result so far as the determination of free-State men is concerned on this question.

The Senator from Mississippi spoke of compromises that had been made, and said he wanted no more compromises. Sir, I want no more compromises on this matter. There is no room for compromises. I agree with him that there have been compromises enough. As addressed to a northern man, if the Senate will allow me to quote poetry again, and I shall not trouble them much in that way, it means this and this only:

"Northward it hath this sense alone
That you, your conscience blinding,
Should bow your fool's nose to the stone
When slavery feels like grinding."

Sir, I want to be ground no more under such compromises. The question that is presented to the people of this country is a simple question; shall slavery, with all its blighting and all its political power, be extended over the free Territories of the Union? Not by my consent. Never will I compromise upon one single point, so far as I am individually concerned, that will allow what I consider to be a death-blow to all the free principles of our institutions to be extended over one solitary foot of free soil beneath the circuit of the sun.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into the discussion to-day, as it has been very generally understood that we are to take the vote on the motion for reference. I merely rise to give notice that when the report of the Committee on Territories shall be presented, and the question shall be before us, on some tangible issue upon which our votes may determine what is to be the fate of this measure, I shall take occasion to answer, as best I may, some of the extraordinary arguments and propositions put forth to-day by the honorable Senator from Maine. I shall not characterize them any further. They have been put forth with great ingenuity and power, but I think they are utterly incompetent to stand the test of examination or analysis.

Mr. CLAY. With the honorable Senator from Louisiana, who has just taken his seat, I do not propose to say anything on this question at this time. I agree with the majority of the Senate, that it is proper it should be referred at once to the committee to which it properly belongs; but inasmuch as the Senator from Maine alluded to some late legislative action of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I wish to take occasion now to say, that I shall endeavor, at the proper time, to show that the State of Alabama has only taken the ground which has hitherto been assumed by every southern State of this Confederacy, with perhaps the exception of one or two. I am prepared to sustain that ground; and I shall endeavor to fortify it by arguments which are unanswerable, and which are derived from the Constitution of the country and its political history. I shall not protract this discussion at the present time; but in reply to what the Senator from Maine has rather vauntingly said, I say that when the principles which are enunciated in these resolutions of my State are forgotten or unheeded by Congress, then, like him, I may say, this Union will have no charms for me. I trust that my State will never dishonor herself by retreating from the position which she has assumed.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, at some proper time I shall have some opinions to express on this great question, which I regard as presenting an important stage in the advance of civilization on this continent; and I hope, when that time comes, I shall have listened to the arguments which have been promised us by the very able Senator from Louisiana and the very able Senator from Alabama. If they shall convince me that their positions are in accordance with the Constitution, I shall surrender any prejudices I have to the contrary. But I confess that I have very little expectation of that kind. I think that if those honorable Senators will turn their attention to the question whether it is possible that African slave labor can be made, by any application of human wealth, or human talent, or human power that can be combined, to rescue the unsettled portions of this continent from the invasion of free labor, increasing as it is in this country, and increasing by the immigration from abroad, they will find a profitable subject of inquiry. I regard that as totally impossible; and therefore I regard this attempt to force slavery into Kansas as abortive, as one that must utterly fail and bring on those who have been engaged in it the mortification of attempting to carry out, through the patronage of the Federal Government of the United States, a scheme not more destructive to the best interests of society than it is incompatible with the laws of nature.

Mr. President, I did not rise to say this so much as to say that I regret to hear Senators express the opinion that in any case, or under any circumstances, this Union will cease to have a value for them. I have no belief that the Union is going to cease at all; and I have no belief that it will cease to confer on all of us all the benefits for which it was designed; and whatever our individual opinions and feelings may be, as evolved in the heat of this debate, I do not believe at all that we shall reflect the opinions of our constituents, the people of the several States, if we suffer ourselves to believe that they sympathize in such utterances. The people of the United States will have this Union. There has been found at last in this country a Government which is a Government of the people, and in which every man who exercises the rights of a freeman exercises also the powers of a sovereign. That end having been attained in this country for the first time, I believe that those who suppose the people can be induced to overthrow it utterly miscalculate the character of mankind in general, and especially the character and the intelligence of the people of this Union.

Sir, whatever may be the decision of this question, I am prepared to see the people of that region of country in which I reside still upholding the Union; and I believe that they are of the same race, the same kindred, and the same education with the people of all the other portions of this Union, and that the Union will survive not only all threats and all alarms, but all fears, and will come out triumphantly. I believe it will come out a free nation in the highest and proudest sense of the term. I expect to see this Union stand until there shall not be the footstep of a slave impressed upon the soil that it protects, although that soil will be extended, for ought I know, from the north pole to the Caribbean sea, as it has already extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to be the general impression that the debate had better be postponed until the subject shall be reported back from the Committee on Territories; I hope, therefore, it will be the pleasure of the Senate now to take the question. I agree entirely with the opinion that it is far better to postpone the debate until then, and take up the subject when the report is made, and when we shall all be better posted in regard to the facts. Otherwise, I should be pleased myself to express my cordial concurrence with the policy which has been recommended by the Chief Magistrate of the United States in this message, which I think is unjustly and harshly dealt with on the other side of the House.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to express my concurrence not only with the message of the President, but my hearty approbation of the high motive which actuated him when he wrote it. In that paper breathes the sentiment of a patriot, and it stands out in bold contrast with the miserable slang by which he was pursued this morning. It may serve the purposes of a man who little regards the Union to perpetrate a joke on the hazard of its dissolution. It may serve the purpose of a man who never looks to his own heart to find there any impulses of honor, to arraign everybody, the President and the Supreme Court, and to have them impeached and vilified on his mere suspicion. It ill becomes such a man to point to southern institutions as to him a moral leprosy, which he is to pursue to the end of extermination, and perverting everything, ancient and modern, to bring it tributary to his own malignant purposes. Not even could that clause of the Constitution which refers to the importation or migration of persons, be held up to public consideration by the Senator in a studied argument save as a permission for the slave trade. Then everything that is most prominent in relation to the protection of property in that instrument he holds to have been swept away by a statute which prohibited the further importation of Africans. The language of that clause of the Constitution is far broader than the importation of Africans. It is not confined or limited at all to that subject. It says:

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

That was a power given to Congress far broader than the slave trade; and yet the Senator gravely argues that when that prohibition against the further importation of Africans took place by act of Congress, thenceforward the constitutional shield which had been thrown over slave property fell. Sir, it is the only private property in the United States which is specifically recognized in the Constitution and protected by it.

There was a time when there was a higher and holier sentiment among the men who represented the people of this country. As far back as the time of the Confederacy, when no narrow, miserable prejudice between the northern and southern men governed those who ruled the States, a committee of three, two of whom were northern men, reporting upon what they considered the bad faith of Spain in Florida, in relation to fugitive slaves, proposed that negotiations should be instituted to require Spain to surrender, as the States did then surrender, all fugitives escaped into their limits. Hamilton and Sedgwick from the North, and Madison from the South, made that report—men, the loftiness of whose purpose and genius might put to shame the puny efforts now made to disturb that which lies at the very foundation of the Government under which we live.

A man not knowing into what presence he was introduced, coming into this Chamber, might for a large part of this session have supposed that here stood the representatives of belligerent States, and that instead of men assembled here to confer together for the common welfare, for the general good, he saw here ministers from States preparing to make war upon each other, and then he would have felt that vain indeed was the vaunting of the prowess of the one to destroy another. Or if, sir, he had known more, if he had recognized the representatives of the States of the Union, still he would have traced through this same eternal, petty agitation about sectional success, that limit which cannot fail, however the Senator from New York may regret it, to bring about a result which every man should, from his own sense of honor, feel when he takes his seat in this Chamber, that he is morally bound to avoid as long as he retains possession of his seat. To express myself more distinctly, I hold that a Senator, while he sits here as the representative of a State in the Federal Government, is in the relation of a minister to a friendly court, and that the moment he sees this Government in hostility to his own, the day he resolves to make war on this Government, his honor and the honor of this State compel him to vacate the seat he holds.

It is a poor evasion for any man to say, "I make war on the rights of one whole section; I make war on the principles of the Constitution; and yet I uphold the Union, and I desire to see it perpetuated." Undermine the foundation, and still pretend that he desires the fabric to stand! Common sense rejects it. No one will believe the man who makes the assertion, unless he believes him under the charitable supposition that he knows not what he is doing.

Sir, we are arraigned day after day as the aggressive power. What southern Senator, during this whole session, has attacked any portion, or any interest, of the North? In what have we now, or ever, back to the earliest period of our history, sought to deprive the North of any advantage it possessed? The whole charge is, and has been, that we seek to extend our own institutions into the common territory of the United States. Well and wisely has the President of the United States pointed to that common territory as the joint possession of the country. Jointly we held it, jointly we enjoyed it, in the earlier period of our country; but when, in the progress of years, it became apparent that it could not longer be enjoyed in peace, the men of that day took upon themselves, wisely or unwisely, a power which the Constitution did not confer; and, by a geographical line, determined to divide the Territories, so that the common field, which brothers could not cultivate in peace, should be held severally for the benefit of each. Wisely or unwisely, that law was denied extension to the Pacific ocean. I was struck, in the course of these debates, to which I have not been in the habit of replying, to hear the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] who so very ardently opposed the extension of that line to the Pacific ocean, who held it to be a political stain upon the history of our country, and who would not even allow the southern boundary of Utah to be the parallel of 36° 30', because of the political implication which was contained in it, the historical character of the line, plead as he did, a few days ago, for the constitutionality and legality, and for the sacred character, of that so-called Missouri compromise.

I, for one, never believed Congress had the power to pass that law; yet, as one who was willing to lay down much then, as I am now, to the peace, the harmony, and the welfare of our common country, I desired to see that line extended to the Pacific ocean, and that strife which now agitates the country never renewed; but with a distinct declaration, "go ye to the right, and we will go to the left; and we go in peace and good will towards each other." Those who refused then to allow the extension of that line, those who declared then that it was a violation of principle, and insisted on what they termed non-intervention, must have stood with very poor grace in the same Chamber when, at a subsequent period, the Senator from Illinois, bound by his honor on account of his previous course, moved the repeal of that line to throw open Kansas; they must have stood with very bad grace in this presence, to argue that that line was now sacred, and must be kept forever.

The Senator from Illinois stood foremost as one who was willing, at an early period, to sacrifice his own prejudices and his own interests, if, indeed, his interests be girt and bounded by the limits of a State, by proposing to extend that line of pacification to the Pacific ocean; and failing in that, then became foremost in the advocacy of the doctrine of non-intervention; and upon that I say he was in honor bound to wipe out that line and throw Kansas open, like any other Territory. But, sir, was it then understood by the Senator from Illinois, or anybody else, that throwing open the Territory of Kansas to free emigration was to be the signal for the marching of cohorts from one section or another to fight on that battle-field for mastery? Or did he not rather think that emigration was to be allowed to take its course, and soil and climate be permitted to decide the great question? We were willing to abide by it. We were willing to leave natural causes to decide the question. Though I differed from the Senator from New York, though I did not believe that natural causes, if permitted to flow in their own channel, would have produced any other result than the introduction of slave property into the Territory of Kansas, I am free to admit that I have not yet reached the conclusion that that property would have permanently remained there. That is a question which interest decides. Vermont would not keep African slaves because they were not valuable to her; neither will any population whose density is so great as to trade rapidly on the supply of bread, be willing to keep and maintain an improvident population, to feed them in infancy, to care for them in sickness, to protect them in age; and thus it will be found in the history of nations, that whenever population has reached that density in the temperate zones, serfdom, villenage, or slavery, whatever it has been called, has disappeared. Ours presents a new problem, one not stated by those who wrote on it in the earlier period of our history. It is the problem of a semi-tropical climate, the problem of malarial districts, of staple products. This produces a result different from that which would be found in the farming districts and cooler climates. A race suited to our labor exists there. Why should we care whether they go into other Territories or not? Simply because of the war that is made against our institutions; simply because of the want of security which results from the action of our opponents in the northern States. Had you made no political war upon us, had you observed the principles of our Confederacy as States, that the people of each State were to take care of their domestic affairs, or, in the language of the Kansas bill, to be left perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions in their own way, then, I say, within the limits of each State the population there would have gone on to attend to their own affairs, and have had little regard to whether this species of property or any other was held in any other portion of the Union. You have made it a political war. We are on the defensive. How far are you to push us?

The Senator from Alabama has been compelled to notice the resolutions of his State; nor does that State stand alone. To what issue are you now pressing us? To the conclusion that because within the limits of a Territory slaves are held as property, a State is to be excluded from the Union. I am not in the habit of paying lip-service to the Union. The Union is strong enough to confer favors; it is strong enough to command service. Under these circumstances, the man deserves but little credit who sings paeans to its glory. If through a life, now not a short one, a large portion of which has been spent in the public service, I have given no better proof of my affection for this Union than my declarations, I have lived to little purpose, indeed. I think I have given evidence in every form in which patriotism is ever subjected to a test, and I trust whatever evil may be in store for us by those who wage war on the Constitution and our rights under it, that I shall be able to turn at least to the past and say, "up to that period when I was declining into the grave, I served a Government I loved, and served it with my whole heart." Nor will I stop to compare services with those gentlemen who have fair phrases, whilst they undermine the very foundation of the temple our fathers built. If, however, there be here those who do really love the Union and the Constitution, which is the life-blood of the Union, the time has come when we should look calmly, though steadily, the danger which besets us, in the face.

Violent speeches denunciatory of people in any particular section of the Union; the arraignment of institutions which they inherited and intend to transmit, as leprous spots on the body politic, are not the means by which fraternity is to be preserved, or this Union rendered perpetual. These were not the arguments which our fathers made when, through the struggles of the revolutionary war, they laid the foundation of the Union. These are not the principles on which our Constitution, a bundle of compromises, was made. Then the navigating and the agricultural States did not war to see which could most injure the other; but each conceded something from that which it believed to be its own interest; to promote the welfare of the other. Those debates, whilst they brought up all that struggle which belong to opposite interests and opposite localities, show none of that bitterness which so unfortunately characterizes every debate in which this body is involved.

The meanest thing—I do not mean otherwise than the smallest thing—which can arise among us, incidentally, runs into this sectional agitation as though it were an epidemic, and gave its type to every disease. Not even could the committees of this body, when we first assembled, before any one had the excuse of excitement to plead, be organized without sectional agitation springing up. Forcibly, I suppose gravely and sincerely, it was contended here that a great wrong was done because New York, the great commercial State, and the emporium of commerce within her limits, was not represented upon the Committee of Commerce. This will go forth to remote corners, and descend, perhaps, to after times as an instance in which the Democratic party of the Senate behaved with unfairness towards its opponents; for with it will not descend the fact that the Democratic party arranged for itself its portion of the committees, taking the control of them, and left blanks on the committees to be filled by the Opposition; that the Opposition did fill the blanks; that the Opposition had both the Senators from New York; but did not choose to put either of them on that committee, though it afterwards formed the basis and staple of their complaint.

Mr. President, I concur with my friend from Virginia, and when I rose I did not intend to consume anything like so much time as I have occupied. I think there are points which have been sprung upon the Senate to-day and heretofore, which require to be answered and to be met. Like my friend from Virginia, I shall feel that it devolves on me, as a representative in part of that constituency which is peculiarly assailed, on another occasion, to meet, and, if I am able, to answer, the allegations and accusations which have been heaped, as well on the section in which I live, as upon every man who has performed his duty by extending over them the protection for which our Constitution and Government were formed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My physical ability is not very great at any time, and what I have is well high exhausted by the length of time during which I have been obliged to trespass on the Senate. In what I have to reply, therefore, to the Senator from Mississippi, I must necessarily confine myself to a very brief period. I may take occasion hereafter to review what the Senator has now said, in detail; and, although I have wearied the patience of the Senate very much to-day, I suppose it will not preclude me from wearying it as much at another time, if I see fit to do so. I am, therefore, not particularly alarmed by the threat of the Senator that he will proceed, at some future occasion, to treat of what has been said on this side of the Chamber to-day, and in which, I suppose, he referred to me, as I have said the principal part of it.

But I rise for the purpose of saying that I do not recognize his authority in the style which he chooses to assume, to lecture me on the sentiments that I choose to advance before the Senate. In the first place, I have not attacked the institution of slavery in the States where it is established. I have preached no crusade against it. I have expressly disavowed the intention to interfere with it—not because I have any fear of avowing such sentiments if I entertained them, nor because I should hesitate to do so in the presence of the honorable Senator from Mississippi. Sir, when the day comes when I shall shrink from stating in this Senate and before the country, every sentiment that I entertain, every feeling of my heart, with reference to these matters which so much agitate this country, under the fear of man, of what man can say or man can do; whenever such considerations shall induce me to hesitate, I will not stay in this body a single hour. I should disgrace the noble State from which I come and which trusts me here, if I hesitated to speak my opinions as well upon this subject as any other. I will not use the offensive phrase which has been used here sometimes with reference to the demeanor of gentlemen towards this side of the Chamber when we express our sentiments; but I will say to the Senator from Mississippi most distinctly, and to every other Senator, that while I intend to treat them with all that respect and courtesy which are due from me to them, as having the same rights here and sitting in the same position, they must accord to me the right to speak the sentiments which I entertain, unawed by any comment or any consequences that may be intimated from any quarter whatever.

The Senator chooses to place me in the attitude of advocating disunion sentiments. I have not sung pæans to the Union or the Constitution. I do not pretend that my life has been so illustrated by distinguished services to the country as the honorable Senator from Mississippi seems to suppose his has been. I accord to him all the glory and the merit which he may claim for himself. I attack not him. I respect his character and respect his services; but, sir, I want him to understand distinctly that whatever may be his superiority over me in those particulars, or in any other particulars, on this spot we are his peers. I am the equal of any man in my rights on this floor, and I will exert those rights wherever I choose, within the rules of order, let the consequences be what they may in regard to me; and if the time comes when I cannot make my hand keep my head, then any body is welcome to take it. Sir, I have avowed no disunion sentiments on this floor, neither here nor elsewhere. Can the honorable Senator from Mississippi say as much?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am glad to hear it, then. Mr. DAVIS. Yes. I have long sought for a respectable man who would allege the contrary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no allegation. I asked if he could say as much. I am glad to hear him say so, because I must say to him that the newspapers have represented him as making a speech in Mississippi, in which he said he came into General Pierce's Cabinet a disunion man. If he never made it, very well.

Mr. DAVIS. I will thank you to produce that newspaper.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot produce it, but I can produce an extract from it in another paper.

Mr. DAVIS. An extract, then, that falsifies the text.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very glad to hear the Senator say so. I made no accusation. I put the question to him. If he denies it, very well. I only say that with all the force and energy with which he denies it, so do I. The accusation never has been made against me before. On what ground does the Senator now put it? On the ground that I assert that I am opposed to the extension of slavery over free territory, and have asserted that the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the events which have followed it, have been an outrage on the rights of the free States and on the Territory of Kansas, and that I will continue to agitate that subject so far as that Territory is concerned, so long as I have the power to agitate upon it with any effect. Is that disunion? Does that prove his allegation?

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator ask me for an answer?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly; if the Senator feels disposed to give one.

Mr. DAVIS. If you ask me for an answer it is easy. I said your position was fruitful of such a result. I did not say you avowed the object—nothing of the sort; but the reverse.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very happy then to be corrected in that particular. I understood the Senator to charge me distinctly with disunion sentiments, as undermining the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. As sentiments that had that effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a matter of opinion on which I have a right to entertain my view as well as the Senator his. That I am undermining the institutions of the country by attacking the Supreme Court of the United States! I attack not their decision, for they have made none; it is their opinion. My belief is, my position is, that that very opinion, if carried into practice, undermines the institutions of this country. Sir, the institutions of this country stood firm; they stood upon the doctrines of freedom, not of slavery. When the Supreme Court of the United States lay down the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States recognizes slavery, I do not deny it. The position I assumed was, that the Constitution of the United States does not recognize slaves as property; does not protect them as property. It recognizes slavery as an institution existing in the States; it provides for certain contingencies; those contingencies I neither repudiate nor deny, nor attempt to cavil at; but I do deny the position which is assumed by the Supreme Court of the United States, applied to property as recognized by the Constitution beyond the limits of those States.

I assume, as I have always assumed, that in the Territories no State has any right. There is no such thing as the right of States in a Territory. The rights, if they exist, are the rights of the people of the States—personal rights; and when an individual, a citizen of a State, leaves that State with a design to go to another, and passes beyond its limits, he loses every right which he had as a citizen of that State, for he ceases to be its citizen. It being a personal right, if you wish to put it on that ground, and wish to divide this Territory according to the interest the people have in it, in proportion to numbers, how much, I ask, would the slaveholders of the Union be entitled to? How much would the half a million of slaveholders, with their wives and children, be entitled to out of the Territories of the United States when put against the more than twenty millions of free people, who have the same rights with themselves? And yet the doctrine is taught here that because in some of the States of the Union slavery exists, therefore we are to take the number of States, and on the ground of State rights claim that the territory is to be equally divided, with equal privileges.

Sir, it is a personal privilege. So far as you may be a slaveholder, and desire to go to the Territories, you have all the privilege which belongs to you as an individual. If the Constitution enables and authorizes you to carry slaves there, take them there and try it. I deny the fact. It never was so held until very recently, when individuals of the Supreme Court gave that opinion. When Mr. Calhoun broached the doctrine in the Senate of the United States, it was received with derision, and it died. It hardly had an existence long enough to have it said that it lived; and when Mr. Calhoun, at a later day, said, as he did say, that if the Supreme Court should decide that the doctrine was not a true one, that decision would be entitled to no respect, to no observance, pray, was not he uttering sentiments undermining the Constitution of the United States and our institutions? He said then, in a supposed case, what I say now. He said that if the Supreme Court established the doctrine that the Constitution did not carry slavery into the Territories, that opinion of theirs would be entitled to no respect. I say they have decided according to his wish, and that decision is entitled to no respect, for it is opposed to all the precedents of this Government, and opposed to all the doctrines which lie at the foundation of our institutions, and opposed to the previous decisions of that court.

Now the Senator says we are aggressive. Pray who began the aggression? Was not this country at peace after the compromises of 1850? Was not the country quiet? Who reopened the agitation? Who introduced the torch of discord among the people of these States? Those who advocated the repeal of the Missouri restriction. You opened it at a time of profound peace, not we; and we warned you then, that if you insisted on it, these flames would be kindled again, and God only knew how long they would burn. That aggression has been going on in Kansas from that day to the present. It has not ceased even now; and this issue is presented here in such a shape that the Senator from Illinois is compelled, from a sense of justice and duty, and regard to his own honor, to oppose the further perpetration of the outrages that have taken place there.

You say that you make no aggressions on us; you attack none of our interests. Look at the attack made on them at this very session. The fishing interest is an important matter in this country, protected by the Government of the United States. Has there been no attack on that? Has not the honorable Senator from Georgia given notice of a bill to repeal all the navigation laws of the United States? Has he not put that question before a committee? Is that no attack on the interests of the North? I am speaking of their interests. I do not feel disposed to argue that matter now, but I regard it as only the beginning. I know not how far it will go. I did not allude to it in the speech which I made; but if the Senator asks me for proof of any desire on the part of the southern people which is to be found to attack the interests of the North, all I have to say is, look at your policy. You have broken down our manufactures as far as you could. Some of you are now seeking to break down our commerce, and you ask us what you have done, and when will we cease our aggressions? Sir, we have been on the defensive from the beginning. We were on the defensive in 1854 when the Missouri compromise line was repealed. We have been on the defensive ever since; we stand on it to-day. What we advocate is that same line which was then established. If the consequences are injurious to you, blame yourselves for that; we have had no hand in them; we warned you from the beginning.

Mr. President, I did not think I could be drawn out to the extent to which I have been, but I felt it my duty to repel the imputation that I thought was made on me by the honorable Senator from Mississippi. What my sentiments may lead to I do not know. They are such sentiments as I honestly entertain, such as I have an undoubted right to express, and I do not feel called upon to resign my seat here, although the honorable Senator from Mississippi intimates that the opinions which I have advanced must be the product either of malice or of ignorance—and I would rather be accused of the latter than the former. I beg him and the Senate to understand that I believe I know enough to express clearly the sentiments I do entertain, and to uphold my right to express them.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I rise principally for the purpose of saying that I do not know whence springs this habit of talking about intimidation. I am not the first person towards whom a reply has been made that we are not to carry our ends by intimidation. I try to intimidate nobody; I threaten nobody; and I do not believe—let me say it once for all—that anybody is afraid of me, and I do not want anybody to be afraid of me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I am sorry to hear it, and if the Senator is really so, I shall never speak to him in decided terms again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I speak of it only in an intellectual point of view. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Then, sir, the Senator was in a Pickwickian sense when he began; there were no threats, no intimidations, and he is just where he would have been if he had said nothing. [Laughter.] He closes with a point which is to show how aggressive the South is; and how does he prove it? He says that we are unwilling to be taxed for the benefit of the cod-fisheries; that we are unwilling to be taxed to keep up manufactures; that, in a word, we wish to keep our own money in our own pockets, and leave them to get the fruits of their labor to the extent they can extract it from the commerce of the world. That is no aggression. We say "manufacture if you please; fish if you please; navigate if you please; make all you can; but you have no right to tax us for the purpose." We do not ask them to pay anything in the form of taxation to support our labor, and we only ask comity, good-fellowship, the protection which the Government is bound to afford, and beyond that, that we shall be let alone.

Mr. CLAY. I feel it due to say a word in respect to one subject suggested by the Senator from Maine. I am sorry that he has anticipated me in the discussion of the cod-fisheries. I hope, at a future day, to cook up a kettle of fish which will not be offensive even to his nostrils; and I wish to say now that I shall then endeavor to define the difference between rights and interests; and I will show him that the interest is on his side and the right on ours; and that we are bowing like Issachar under burdens which have been imposed upon us at his hands.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to express the hope that the course indicated by the Senator from Virginia will prevail, and that we shall now take a vote on this question, refer the message to the committee, and let the debate be suspended until we get the report. ["Agreed."] As I am anxious to terminate the debate on the part of others, I shall not trespass on the Senate by making a speech, for fear somebody might be prompted to reply to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] to add to the motion the following instructions:

And that the committee be instructed to ascertain the number of votes given at each county in the Territory upon the question of calling a convention to form a constitution; to inquire into the appointment of delegates to the convention, and the census and registration under which the same was made, and whether the same was in compliance with law; the number of votes cast for each candidate for delegate to the convention, and the places where cast, and whether said constitution received the votes of a majority of the delegates to said convention; the number of votes cast in said Territory on the 21st of December last, for and against said constitution, and for and against any parts thereof, and the number so cast at each place of voting; the number of votes cast on the 4th day of January last, for and against said constitution, and the number so cast at each place of voting; the number of votes cast on the 4th day of January last for any State and legislative officers thereof, and the number so cast for each candidate for such offices, and the places where cast; and that said committee also ascertain, as nearly as possible, what portion, if any, of the votes so cast at any of the times and places aforesaid were fraudulent or illegal; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise for the purpose of making a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts. We are all anxious to have this subject referred to the committee, and I propose that we refer the message without any instructions, for the substance of this amendment comes up in the resolutions of the Senator from Illinois, upon which we shall pass next in succession.

Mr. COLLAMER. The resolutions of the Senator from Illinois are merely an inquiry of the President. This proposition is to obtain the truth through the investigation of our own committee.

Mr. MASON. I think time will be saved if my colleague will allow the vote to be taken.

Mr. WILSON. I wish merely to say that this amendment proposes a full investigation into the question. The resolutions of the Senator from Illinois simply call on the President for such information as he has in his possession. I think the distinction is a very broad one; and after having read the reports of the investigations that are now going on in the Territory of Kansas, reports that have come to us since the adjournment of the Senate the other day, I hope we shall adopt this amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—28.

So the amendment was rejected; and the question recurring on the motion to refer the message to the Committee on Territories, it was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now ask the Senate to take up the resolutions which I offered, calling on the President for information on this subject, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, so that we may have the information at the earliest day.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope not until we act on the resolutions.

Mr. MASON. I make the motion; it is not debatable.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. FOOT, when his name was called, announced that he had paired off with Mr. Toombs.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, Wright, and Yulee—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 8, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE W. SAMSON.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of Friday last, but was interrupted by Mr. GREENWOOD, who moved that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER stated that the motion could only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

The Clerk then resumed and completed the reading of the Journal; when the same was approved.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled:

An act (H. R. No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 31st of June, 1859; and

An act (H. R. No. 22) to alter the time of holding the courts of the United States for the State of South Carolina; when the Speaker signed the same.

PRESIDENT'S KANSAS MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER stated that the business in order was the question on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to refer the President's message in relation to the Lecompton constitution; upon which tellers had been demanded.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—aye 110, noes 105.

So the previous question was seconded.

Whilst the House was dividing, and before the tellers had announced the result,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, said: I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. That is a dilatory motion.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Is that the way you carry out the contract you made?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will come to order.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comius, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Featon, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bococek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craigie, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tripp, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—107.

So the main question was ordered.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. MILES stated that his colleague, Mr. BONHAM, was still detained at home by severe illness.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, I was appealed to by the gentleman from the Belmont district of Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] as a matter of personal favor to himself, to pair off with him on all questions affecting the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] until he should have gone to the town of Hagerstown, in Maryland, and returned—he having been called there by the death of a relative. I understand that the gentleman was in Baltimore this morning, and I further understand that he came here in the eleven o'clock train of cars to-day. Under these circumstances, I consider myself absolved from the obligation which I incurred to the gentleman, and vote "no."

Mr. LEIDY stated that he should have voted "no" on this question but for the fact that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. REILLY.

Mr. OWEN JONES stated that his colleague, Mr. REILLY, had been called home by sudden sickness in his family.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to state that I came into the House—having been unavoidably absent—just as the call of the roll was completed. I came as soon as I possibly could after the arrival of the cars. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to vote.

Mr. GARNETT. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is this the gentleman with whom Mr. CLEMENS paired off?

Mr. CLEMENS. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope, then, he will be allowed to vote.

Mr. GARNETT. I withdraw my objection. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. We have never allowed gentlemen to vote who were not within the bar when their names were called.

Mr. CLEMENS. Would it be competent for me to withdraw my vote, under the circumstances?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw his vote by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understood that I had paired off with my friend from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] upon this question until I had returned. I arrived in the city to-day; and, after accompanying from the cars the lady under my charge, who had been attending the last funeral rites of a deceased husband, I came here just as soon as I could, and am now all in a perspiration from my hurry to be here at this vote.

Several Voices. Let him vote.

Mr. CLEMENS. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. CLEMENS. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw my vote.

No objection being made, Mr. CLEMENS's vote was withdrawn.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, that the President's Kansas message be referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 113, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quinman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—114.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the President concerning the constitution framed at Lecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, by a convention of delegates thereof, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee of fifteen, to be appointed by the Speaker. That said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution and the laws under which the same was originated, and into all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation of said constitution, having relation to the question or propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution, and whether the same is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to call for a division of the question, so that the vote shall be taken, first on the reference, and then on the instructions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, because the two branches of the resolution could not stand independent of each other. The first branch of the resolution is complete in itself, but the latter part is not.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I ask to be excused from voting, on the ground that to vote in the affirmative would be inconsistent with the votes that I have already given, and to vote in the negative would imply an unwillingness on my part to have an investigation made which I believe to be essential to the best interests of the country. I therefore am not willing to vote upon the pending question.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to inquire if the motion pending is not the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] to the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES]?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PHELPS. Then if the pending amendment is voted down, the question will arise on the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, to refer the message to a select committee without instructions.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask that the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the President be referred to a select committee of thirteen.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York to move to be excused from voting?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I do, for the reason I have stated. I want an investigation made, but I should have preferred that it should be done by one of the regular standing committees of the House.

The motion to excuse Mr. CLARK was disagreed to; there being, on a division, yeas 89, noes 106.

Mr. SAVAGE. Is it in order to move to lay the whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, as the adoption of the motion would finally dispose of the subject, it is in order.

Mr. SAVAGE. Then I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he proposes to keep the arrangement which was made by the unanimous consent of the House on Friday, that no dilatory motions shall be made?

Mr. SAVAGE. Is this a violation of it?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I so understand it. Mr. SAVAGE. I do not understand the motion to be in violation of that arrangement. My motion, if successful, would be a final and conclusive disposition of the subject. As there seems, however, to be some doubt about it, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to have myself informed in regard to the position of affairs. I desire to know whether if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] is rejected, the question will not then recur on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] which is to refer to a select committee without instructions?

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 111; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Humphrey

Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quinman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—111.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, moved that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays upon the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to know if the Printer of the House is entitled to admission within the Hall?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he is as an officer of the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 111; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—115.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quinman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—111.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER stated that the question next recurred upon the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, as amended on motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is there a motion pending to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If, then, the present question be voted down, will it not be in order to move a reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is not the slightest doubt about that, if the pending question be voted down.

The SPEAKER. If the pending proposition be voted down, the motion indicated by the gentleman from North Carolina, will then be in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask that the resolution, as amended, be read.

Mr. ENGLISH. It has been read half a dozen times already, and I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. The resolution has not been read since the last vote, when it was amended; I would therefore suggest to the Chair whether the gentleman from New York has not a right to have it read?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker thinks he has. The resolution, as amended, was read by the Clerk.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 111; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Conins, Covode, Cox, Craig, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Grainger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Lench, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Waide, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Efflu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—115.

NAYS.—Messrs. Aht, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Bowic, Bowic, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilder, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Haylor, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, Mackay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollieffer—111.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, as amended, was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KEITT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Speaker, the House will remember that its proceedings during the session of Friday were broken by an unpleasant incident. It is due to fair dealing that I should assume upon myself all the responsibility for the act involving a violation of its order, its dignity, and its decorum. I was the aggressor, and whatever responsibility attaches to the act properly belongs to me alone. It was, however, casual, accidental, and sudden. It is also due to justice that I should make whatever of reparation is in my power to the dignity and decorum of the House thus violated. I do that in the expression of my profound regret at the occurrence. Personal collisions are always unpleasant, seldom excusable, rarely justifiable—never in a legislative body.

In this connection I have but one more remark to make, and that is, if any blow was directed at me I am not conscious of it. I am at least utterly unconscious of having received any. With this explanation I part from the subject.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I have been taught from my childhood that all fights among men are disgraceful to human nature and to a Christian community, and especially when they occur among the law-makers of a people, in the midst of their deliberations. The judgment of my riper years has fully satisfied me that my education in this respect, at least, has been good and true. Yet the right of self-defense I recognize as one of the inalienable rights of man, to be exercised on all occasions and under all circumstances where it is necessary to protect life or person. At the last sitting of this House I found myself unexpectedly engaged, for the first time in my life, in a personal conflict. To the House I tender most cheerfully whatever of apology is due for this violation of its order and decorum. No man can regret more than I do that there should have been any occasion for a violation of either.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at twenty minutes to three o'clock) adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

Tuesday, February 9, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDLAND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, statements showing the number and tonnage of Government vessels employed in the Pacific ocean; also of the private vessels employed by the Government in transporting coal or other supplies for the United States, and the annual expense thereof; which, on motion of Mr. POLK, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the Legislature of Tennessee, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State, in Congress, to aid in the passage of a bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and of the various Indian wars; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Jeremiah Y. Dashiell, a paymaster in the Army, praying that he may be released from responsibility for certain public money lost in the surf while being landed at the mouth of Indian river, in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. HARLAN presented a memorial and resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, praying that the State may be indemnified for expenses incurred in raising troops to protect the people of Iowa from a hostile invasion of the Sioux Indians in March, 1857; which were referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of granting bounty land to the volunteers in the Spirit Lake expedition, in March, 1857; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of the regents of the University of Michigan, praying for a donation of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRODERICK presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers not possessed of other lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of James Hendebert, praying the reimbursement of money advanced to Captain Henry, while engaged in the prosecution of his claims against the United States before Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. SEWARD. I present a memorial from the Mayor, Recorder, and members of the Common Council of Georgetown, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to prohibit the issue of bank notes in the District of Columbia. The memorialists state that they think their long residence and daily experience in the business affairs of the District entitle them to know the sentiments and wishes of the people; and they say, at the same time, that they know they are disfranchised and have no other mode of obtaining the adoption of such measures as the welfare and interests of the community with which they are connected require, except by petition. They therefore respectfully remonstrate against the passage of this bill. Yesterday, I think, similar remonstrances were laid on the table and ordered to be printed. I ask that this memorial may have the same consideration.

The memorial was laid on the table.

Mr. BIGGS. The question of printing will go to the Committee on Printing, I presume.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask whether the papers on the same subject went to the Committee on Printing yesterday, or were ordered to be printed by the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not able to say; but unless by unanimous consent, the motion to print must have gone to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEWARD. I suppose no Senator will object to this having the same disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection has been made; and the motion must go to the Committee on Printing.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. FOOT. I have received a petition, numerously signed by citizens of the city of New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent the further traffic in, and monopoly of, the public lands of the United States; and that they be laid out in farms and lots of limited size for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers not possessed of other land. As this subject has been before the Committee on Public Lands, and that committee have reported a bill to carry out the objects contemplated in this petition, and that bill has been assigned for this day as the special order, on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who has been long known as the champion of this measure, and as it is now in his special charge, I move that this petition be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have a number of memorials—one from the State of Connecticut, one from Wisconsin, one from Kentucky, and two from the State of New York—all asking for the passage of the homestead bill, granting to each head of a family one hundred and sixty acres of land; and that all future sales of the public lands be confined to actual settlers in limited quantities. I move their reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STUART. I wish to suggest, in regard to these memorials, that inasmuch as the committee has reported a bill, it is better to move to lay the memorials on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. They ask Congress to confine the future sales of public lands to actual settlers.

Mr. STUART. The committee has reported on several of those memorials, and have asked to be discharged from their consideration. It is only lumbering up the business of the committee to refer these petitions to them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not understand that any bill has been reported in regard to limiting the future sales of public lands.

Mr. STUART. The committee has reported against that proposition on several of those petitions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Marvin, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DURKEE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Jehu Underwood, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 129) to provide for the final settlement of the land claim of the heirs of Jehu Underwood, in Florida. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Johnson, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mary D. Hays and B. S. Fassett, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the heirs of revolutionary officers of the continental line, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jennett H. McCall, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate to print five thousand copies of the tables of receipts and expenditures of the Government from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1857, reported in favor of the resolution; and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Senate, showing the payments from the contingent fund of the Senate during the year ending December 6, 1857, reported in favor of it; and the motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the report of the Secretary of War, showing the number of troops stationed in Kansas each quarter since January 1, 1855, reported in favor of it; and the motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the report of the Secretary of War, showing the amount expended for the support of the Military Academy during the past year, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the report of the Secretary of War, communicating the report of the commission on the war claims of Oregon and Washington Territories, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the amount of revenue collected in each collection district for each of the years from 1852 to 1857, inclusive, the amount expended, and the number of persons employed in its collection during those years, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel V. Niles, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 131) for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the annual message of the President as relates to our relations with foreign Powers, submitted a report relative to the difficulties between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That, for the purpose of adjusting the differences between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay, in connection with the attack on the United States steamer Water Witch, and with other matters referred to in the annual message of the President, he be, and hereby is, authorized to adopt such measures and use such force as, in his judgment, may be necessary and advisable, in the event of a refusal of just satisfaction by the Government of Paraguay.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print an additional number of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in relation to the arrest of William Walker, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

PRINTING OF KANSAS MESSAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, which is the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAVIS. If the report is not to lead to debate, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the reception of the report of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report in favor of printing fifteen thousand extra copies of the message of the President of the United States communicating the constitution of the State of Kansas. I ask the concurrence of the Senate in the report.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GWIN. Is the report to print fifteen thousand copies of the message and constitution, or fifteen thousand copies of the message and the usual number of the constitution?

Mr. CAMERON. I withdraw the motion for the present. There seems to be a difference between the other members of the committee and myself, and I therefore withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, but by unanimous consent the report may be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

KANSAS LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move to take up the resolutions upon which we adjourned last evening, which were resolutions of inquiry calling for information relative to Kansas.

Mr. DAVIS. The special order must first be postponed before that question can be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion regularly in order would be to postpone the special order, with a view to take up those resolutions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not understand that that is necessary, according to the rules of the body. A special order made for one morning for half past twelve o'clock, and then postponed, loses its priority, I apprehend. I take it for granted it loses it after the first day. It is then postponed until to-morrow, and falls into the regular list of special orders which come up at one o'clock. Because a bill is made the special order for one day at a particular time, and that, too, during a morning hour, I do not understand that when postponed it necessarily comes up at that time, to the exclusion of the morning business every day until it is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state briefly his opinion on the point of order. There is no morning hour in the Senate. There is a fixed order of business in reference to petitions and reports by the rule of the body.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was going to remark that in order to avoid any questions of order in the Senate, I would change the motion, and move to postpone all prior orders of business, for the purpose of considering the resolutions of inquiry to which I have alluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the present and all other special orders, with a view to take up the resolutions of inquiry to which he has referred.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose those resolutions of inquiry cannot pass without debate. It is really, therefore, the postponement of the consideration of the bill to increase the Army, which is the unfinished business before the Senate; and I suppose every Senator will bear testimony that his mind has now been so long drawn off that subject that a great deal of what has been said heretofore will have to be repeated. I think it is a loss of time thus to interrupt the progress of the bill, and that if we proceed with the subject now, we shall more readily reach a conclusion than by a further postponement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should be entirely willing to yield to the view suggested by the Senator from Mississippi if I could have the assurance that I should not be called upon to act as a member of the Committee on Territories, and decide on the very question at issue, before this information is obtained. I only desire this information in order that I may be able, as a member of the committee, to act intelligently on the subject referred to them. I have no desire to postpone the consideration of the Army bill, or procrastinate that business at all; but my object is to obtain the information which is necessary, essential to enable us to act upon that subject which the Senate yesterday referred to the Committee on Territories. That is my sole object, and it seems to me the resolutions ought to be considered and adopted by the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I think the Senator from Illinois may feel satisfied that, whenever his resolutions come up, unless they be disposed of by a motion to lay them upon the table, they will lead to a very long debate. My own impression of the tenor of the resolutions offered by the Senator is, that their effect will be, if they are adopted, to transfer to the Halls of Congress all the crimination and recrimination, without any useful result whatever, which we know to have existed in Kansas for the last two years; and under that impression, whenever it shall be the pleasure of the Senate to take up those resolutions, I shall move to lay them on the table, as a test question, for it is not a question proper for the consideration of the Senate. If, however, that motion should not prevail, then I feel satisfied the resolutions will lead to a very long debate. I hope, therefore, that the order of business will be pursued, and that the Senate will go on and dispose of the Army bill, which is certainly a question of very great importance before the country. What the Committee on Territories may do, that committee will decide for itself. If it chooses to refrain from acting until these resolutions are disposed of, it is a proper subject for the committee to decide. I take it for granted the Senator can have no assurance from the Senate of what it would be proper for the committee to do in the case.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his objection. I expected to have been in my seat yesterday when the vote was taken on the instructions moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] but did not return in time. I should have voted against those instructions if I had been present; but I can see no reasonable objection to a call for copies of the public documents to be found on the files of the executive department of Kansas Territory. We asked for these very documents before, except the returns of the election on the 4th of January, and we received for answer from the President that no copies of these documents were on file here. There is no change, as I understand, between this resolution and the resolution which the Senate adopted on my motion in December, except that this asks for the returns of the elections held on the 4th of January.

Now, Mr. President, how is it that a call for documents of this character can possibly give rise to the discussion specified by the Senator from Virginia—a discussion into which, I assure him, I have no disposition to go? It is alleged here, on one side, that one half the counties of Kansas Territory were not represented in the convention, without any fault of their own. On the other side it is alleged, as specifically, that the greater number of those counties contained no population. It is a fact that ought to be settled. I do not say that ought to induce us to delay the decision of the question on the admission of Kansas; but it is a fact on which we ought to be satisfied, and the country ought to be satisfied. It is susceptible of being demonstrated on the one side or the other; and we can demonstrate it, if we can ascertain what number of votes were given in October, 1857, in the various counties of Kansas for members of the Territorial Legislature, and for a Delegate in Congress. If these are paper counties—counties in name, with no votes in them—there is an end of the whole allegation. If, on the contrary, they are counties that ought to have been represented, then it goes, as I once before said on this floor, to the legality of the whole convention. The fact that Senators may make a public document sent here the pretext for an argument that is not pertinent to it, seems to me no reason why we should not have the document. It is simply asked that we shall have the returns of the various elections, and the law requires them to be here. The organic act requires the Secretary of that Territory every six months to send the executive minutes; but it has not been done; and, therefore, we cannot get them by an ordinary application to the Departments. This results from a neglect of duty on the part of the Secretaries of that Territory. I think we ought to have them. I hope the Senate will agree to order them; and to do it now, because it is a material part of the controversy. If we put it off, it will be an argument why we should not have the question heard in committee, and why it should be delayed ad infinitum.

Mr. GREEN. I had supposed that the information called for was designed for the use of the Senate more than for the committee. If it be designed for the use of the Committee on Territories, it is much more appropriate that the committee themselves should call for it, than for one member to call for it in the absence of any action or consideration on the part of the committee. The committee have never been called together on the subject. It has never been before them. I know it is perfectly proper for any Senator to move for information for the use of himself and of other Senators; but when it is for the use of a committee it would be more appropriate for the committee itself to make the request. There is one branch of it however that is wholly immaterial and ought to be stricken out. To the others, if they do not cause delay, I have no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will give way for a moment, I should like to hear the resolutions read before the discussion goes on.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 40.

Mr. HAMLIN. They have not been taken up yet.

Mr. COLLAMER. We want to know what they are, to see whether we shall take them up.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish all the information within his possession or control on the following points:

1. The returns and votes for and against a convention at an election held in the Territory of Kansas, in October, 1856.

2. The census and registration of votes in the Territory of Kansas, under the provisions of the act of said Legislature, passed in February, 1857, providing for the election of delegates and assembling a convention to frame a constitution.

3. The returns of an election held in said Territory, on the 21st of December, 1857, under the schedule of the Lecompton constitution, upon the question of "constitution with slavery" or "constitution without slavery."

4. The returns of an election held in the Territory of Kansas, on the 4th day of January, 1858, under the authority of a law passed by the Legislature of said Territory, submitting the constitution formed by the Lecompton convention to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection.

5. The returns of the election held in said Territory on the 4th day of January, 1858, under the schedule of the Lecompton constitution, for Governor and other State officers, and for members of the Legislature, specifying the names of each officer to whom a certificate of election has been accorded, and the number of votes cast and counted for each candidate, and distinguishing between the votes returned within the time and in the mode provided in said schedule, and those returned subsequently and in other modes, and stating whether at either of said elections any returns of votes were rejected in consequence of not having been returned in time, or to the right officer, or in proper form, or for any other cause, stating specifically for what cause.

6. All correspondence between any of the Executive Departments and Secretary or Governor of Kansas relating to Kansas affairs, and which has not been communicated to the Senate.

Resolved, That in the event all the information desired in the foregoing resolution is not now in the possession of the President, or of any of the Executive Departments, he be respectfully requested to give the proper orders and take the necessary steps to procure the same for the use of the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. As this is a question merely preliminary to the order of business, I shall not go into what my mind had previously inclined me to discuss. I shall defer it until I see what course the Senate think proper to take. I want no delay. I am willing to have an investigation of all matters which it is proper should be investigated.

Mr. BELL. I should not, on a mere motion to take up these resolutions at this time, after the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, say anything on the general subject, if it had not been intimated by the honorable Senator from Virginia, that if these resolutions be not taken up at present, he will, whenever they shall be taken up, make a motion to lay them on the table, which, of course, would preclude me or any other Senator from making any remarks. I shall content myself with expressing the opinion that the information sought for in these resolutions appears to me to be of the utmost importance as connected with the main proposition, which will be shortly, I presume, before the Senate. I do not understand that the information asked for by these resolutions, relates to any frauds or disturbances which the honorable Senator from Virginia supposes would lead to a long and angry debate, and crimination and recrimination, if we had the information. The information sought is principally statistical—the number of votes given at the respective elections, which is supposed to be material in connection with the main subject; and then copies of all the correspondence between the President or any Department of Government, and Governors, Secretaries, and other officials in Kansas Territory, mainly in reference to the election on the 14th of January.

I consider the number of votes given pro and con. upon the subject of the adoption of the Lecompton constitution of the greatest importance to the Senate in coming to a wise and prudent determination in regard to the main question. At all events, it would with me have great influence; and I cannot conceive that any portion of the Senate could desire that main question to be decided without all the information within our reach, in regard to the true state of things in Kansas in reference to a point to which, so far as I can infer, on looking over the President's message, he has not made the remotest allusion. I speak in reference to the estimated or alleged overwhelming majority of the people of that Territory against the proposition to admit Kansas into the Union with the Lecompton constitution. I have heard various statements on that point, in the Senate and out of it; but little in the Senate, to be sure. On the one side, it is alleged that there was more than ten thousand majority against the constitution evinced in that election; on the other side, I have heard it denied, and heard it alleged that no election transpired on that occasion which is calculated to give the true state of the case in regard to the views of the people of that Territory on this subject.

Will the Senate of the United States undertake to decide that Kansas shall be admitted with the Lecompton constitution, without any satisfactory knowledge of the state of parties, or of the state of sentiment in Kansas on this subject? I know very well that some gentlemen think all these questions ought not to be considered, and they consider that we have no right to go outside of the grounds of principle, fundamental principle, as it is called, on which we are to act on the proposition to admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. Their idea is that there is a constitution formed in a legal manner, in a perfectly regular manner, as stated by the President—

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a point of order, which I very reluctantly do on this or any other occasion, certainly when it stops my friend from Tennessee; but I must ask the Chair whether it is in order to go on with this discussion on the proposition to take up the resolutions?

Mr. BELL. I know that it is by the permission of the Senate that I speak. If the honorable Senator from Mississippi takes exception, I think the Chair will be bound to rule me out of order.

Mr. DAVIS. It is not an objection to the Senator, he will understand; but this discussion is postponing a bill in which I am interested, and is equivalent to taking up the resolutions for debate.

Mr. BELL. I am in favor of proceeding with business in regular order. I said pretty much all that I intended to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuing the practice of the Senate, the Chair has not felt himself called upon to restrict debate; but a general debate on the merits of the question, on a motion of this sort, the Chair does not suppose to be strictly in order.

Mr. BELL. I know it is the uniform courteous habit of the Chair, on such occasions, when some gentlemen have been indulged, not to interpose unless objection is raised in the Senate. I made, I thought, a proper explanation when I said that I would not have spoken at all, but for the anticipation that when this question was brought forward, the Senator from Virginia (and he is very prompt in getting the floor) might move to lay the resolutions on the table, and his motion might be carried by a majority, and preclude me from expressing my sentiments as to the importance of the information sought by these resolutions. I wished to express the deep conviction that I cannot conceive that the Senate of the United States would be willing to take up and decide the main question without the important information which may be afforded, if there be any in the Departments, on the subject to which I have particularly alluded. I cannot conceive that they can lead to any investigation of the fraud or outrages, pro and con., to which the honorable Senator from Virginia has alluded. I take my seat, begging pardon for having added these few additional words.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone present and other special orders, with a view to take up his resolutions of inquiry.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senator from Virginia to withdraw his opposition; and if the resolutions are to be debated, I feel bound by the understanding among my political friends, not to put any obstacle in the way of the Army bill. Although I desire to have the information, I cannot engage in any new discussion until the Army bill has been disposed of.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MASON. I have made no proposition. I have said that whenever the resolutions come up, I shall move to lay them on the table; and I refrained from giving any further reason for it than an apprehension of the consequence. I will not move to lay a subject on the table and debate it first myself, because that motion precludes debate; but I may be allowed to say this: that the great object I seek to attain will be to take the sense of the Senate on the tenor of the resolutions; that they ask the Senate to go into inquiries which belong either to the Territory or to the State of Kansas, and do not belong here. All Senators who agree with me, I presume will vote to lay them on the table.

Mr. GWIN. I do not object particularly to the resolutions; but if the motion is to put aside the Army bill in order to take them up, I shall not vote to lay aside the Army bill, though I have no particular objection to the passage of the resolutions. When they come up, I may vote for them.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sliedell, Toombs, and Yulee—30.

So the motion to take up the resolutions was not agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. While these proceedings have been going on, the hour has arrived for the consideration of an older special order, which was assigned at an earlier period, and which is now before the Senate. It is the motion of the Senator from Illinois to refer so much of the President's annual message as relates to Kansas affairs, to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DIXON. Do I understand the Chair to say that the special order is with regard to the reference of the President's annual message?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir. The Army bill was the special order for half past twelve o'clock. When the hour of one o'clock arrived that special order falls, to give way to another, which was assigned at another period, and takes precedence according to the order of time at which it was assigned, in conformity with the rules and the decision of the Senate the other day.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to postpone that special order and all prior orders, so that we may proceed with the consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. DIXON. I had supposed that the subject which was the special order this morning was the bill for increasing the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state again to the Senator that the bill for the increase of the Army was made the special order for half past twelve o'clock. It came up at that hour. Another special order of an older date was assigned for one o'clock, and when the hour of one arrived it would have been the duty of the Chair to call up the older special order assigned for that hour, under a rule of the body which says that when two or more subjects have been specially assigned, they shall take precedence according to the order of time at which they were assigned, and according to the view expressed by the Senate the other day when that question arose. Accordingly, at one o'clock the Chair calls up an older order. The Senator from Mississippi now moves that that, and all other prior orders, be postponed, with a view to take up the Army bill.

Mr. DIXON. The remarks I propose to submit can, as I understand, be as well made on the bill which the Senator from Mississippi desires to bring to the attention of the Senate. I am perfectly willing to give way.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit the vote to be taken on the motion?

Mr. DIXON. I give way.

Mr. BIGLER. I simply suggest that we take a vote and proceed with the consideration of the Army bill, and then the Senator has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to postpone the special order indicated by the Chair, and all other special orders before the Senate, with a view to continue the consideration of the Army bill.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TOOMBS to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. DIXON. It was my desire, Mr. President, yesterday to address the Senate on the general subject of the affairs of Kansas, then perhaps more properly before the body than it is now; but such was my reluctance last evening, at the late hour when I might have obtained the floor, to claim the attention of the Senate, that I relinquished my desire. I now propose to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I submit some remarks, briefly as may be, I trust, upon the question before the Senate at that time; and I think, sir, that everything that might have been said yesterday, or at any previous stage of the debate, may as well be said on this bill as upon any other subject which has been before us for consideration. The President of the United States, in the message which was yesterday referred to the Committee on Territories, informed us, among other reasons why Kansas should be admitted as a State, that one, in his opinion, was, that if we so admitted her he could remove that portion of the Army of the United States which is now in that Territory; and I take it that we may infer from this that one very important reason in the estimation of the Administration for at this time increasing the Army is, that the President thinks it his duty to keep a very large portion of the troops in that Territory. It is my opinion that there is no occasion at this time for retaining any portion of the Army of the United States in the Territory of Kansas for any purpose whatever; at any rate for any such purpose as that for which it is now retained there. I desire to allude, in the course of my remarks, somewhat to the reasons given by the President of the United States for sending to and retaining in that Territory, the troops under his command as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

We are in the midst of a very important controversy. I am sorry that it takes the character of a controversy; but I desire to ask the Senate why it is that we are now engaged in a controversy of this kind, in regard to one of the Territories of the United States? In the beginning of the year 1854, the law with regard to the state of every portion of the territory of this Union, and especially this portion of it, was fixed and settled. It was settled by a law which had existed for more than thirty years, and which had been considered constitutional; and it had been declared, by a very great authority on this floor, (Mr. Webster,) to be in his judgment irrepealable. He stated here, in 1850, that the condition of the territory of the United States, with regard to slavery, was fixed and settled by an irrepealable law. So far was he from supposing that the law of the United States which fixed the character, and had for a long time fixed the character of the Territory in question, was unconstitutional, that he actually declared it to be irrepealable. He supposed it to be in the nature of a contract which could not be repealed.

It was not, however, actually irrepealable; it was repealed; and we are told now, we were told by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] the other day, in the course of his very remarkable and very able speech, that the legislation existing at that time in the Territory of Kansas, which was repealed by the act of 1854, and declared inoperative and void, was the beginning of legislation and interference on the subject of slavery in the Territories of the United States. I have not quoted his exact language, but I think that was the idea suggested by the Senator. We have since been told, we were told yesterday, that the course of the non-slaveholding States and their representatives on this floor, and in the other branch of Congress, had been aggressive. The charge has been made here and elsewhere throughout the country, that the people of the free States of this Union are, in their feelings and in their legislation, aggressive on the subject of slavery, and that the aggression commenced in the year 1820. If I understood the Senator from Georgia, his idea was that then was the commencement of interference on the part of Congress. I deny, with all respect to the opinions of that gentleman, and other gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, that there has been any aggression on the part of the free States of this Union. I deny that that was the beginning of the interference of Congress; and I take upon me here to say, and I can show, by reference to acts of Congress and the whole course of the Government, that, from the very beginning of the Government, from its earliest inception, even before the establishment of the Constitution of the United States, the whole course of policy of the Government was legislation on the subject of slavery as well as other subjects in the Territories; and that full power was claimed on that subject, and that it was not until 1854 that the power of Congress was abnegated. Then it was that Congress, instead of exercising its power on that and all other subjects in the Territories, announced the doctrine that there was no such power in Congress. If the doctrine was not then started, the action of Congress at that time was its first official recognition.

Now, I propose to show that from the very beginning Congress asserted, claimed, and exercised the power of legislating on slavery, as on all other subjects in the Territories. I do not propose to detain the Senate with a historical account of what took place in regard to the ordinance of 1787, known as it is to every Senator present; but I beg leave to refer very briefly to certain historical events which occurred previous to that time. That was not the beginning. Any one who will refer to the history of events connected with that period, will find that there was not only no intention of extending slavery into the Territories of the Union on the part of the fathers of this Republic, but that there was actually no desire to extend territory. Not only did they not claim that slavery should be extended, but there was no wish, or desire, or intention, or supposition, that the territory of this Union could be extended in any direction. In the year 1787, the whole territory of the United States was covered by the ordinance of 1787. That ordinance was adopted and ratified by Congress among their first acts after the Constitution. Their first important act was to pass a bill for the protection of American industry; and almost their second act was to pass a bill ratifying and confirming the ordinance of 1787. This, I presume, is pretty much the order in which my honored friend from Rhode Island, who sits by my side, [Mr. SIMMONS], would take up the subject if it were now referred to him.

What took place before that time? The Congress of the Confederation, in their last moments, were employed in a manner somewhat instructive to us, in view of this subject. What were they occupied upon? If you refer to the debates in the Congress of the Confederation, you will find that the subject before them was the question whether the whole territory bounding the Mississippi, together with the exclusive right of the navigation of the Mississippi river, should be ceded to Spain. Seven States of this Union voted to relinquish to Spain the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi river for twenty-five years. What States were in favor of that proposition? Mr. Madison, in a letter to Mr. Jefferson, written in the year 1787, states the course of each delegation. He says:

"Maryland and South Carolina have hitherto been on the right side. Their future conduct is somewhat problematical."—Madison Papers, vol. 2, p. 642.

It was doubtful what position the States of South Carolina and Maryland would occupy on that all-important question. They then had no idea of extending territory. So far from intending to extend slavery, they had no idea at that time that our territory would ever extend beyond the Mississippi river. They could not have had that supposition with the view they entertained in regard to the small importance of the navigation of the Mississippi. We are told by Mr. Madison, that in the discussion of that question between the Spanish Minister, (Mr. Guardoqui,) and our Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Spanish Minister said that Spain occupied both sides of the Mississippi, as far as the mouth of the Ohio, thus including Kentucky, and,

"With an air of ostensible jocoseness, he hinted that the people of Kentucky would make good Spanish subjects, and that they would become such for the sake of the privilege annexed to that character."—2 Madison Papers, p. 592.

Instead of excitement on the subject, two southern States—Maryland and South Carolina—were so indifferent with regard to it that Mr. Madison could not tell which way their votes would be recorded. In the result the Constitution was adopted, and the powers of the Congress of the Confederation, of course, departed, and no action was taken on the question. There was then no northern aggression. The proposition to prohibit slavery in the territory northwest of the Ohio river did not come from the North. It is now known to have originated with Mr. Jefferson himself. Northern people took very little interest in the question, comparatively. Southern statesmen, seeing that it would be better for that region of country that their institutions, about which they knew so much, should not be there extended, proposed the prohibition in the Congress of the Confederation, and it was carried by their votes and by their influence.

After the ordinance of 1787 was established, our territories were extended in the southwestern region of this country; the purchase of the Louisiana territory was made, with regard to a portion of which the controversy now going on is concerned. What do you see in the legislation of Congress, in reference to that territory? If you will refer to the very first act passed on that subject—the act for the organization of Orleans Territory—you will see that instead of abdicating power on the question of slavery, Congress exerted full and supreme power on that subject. Any Senator who states that the commencement of legislation for the restriction of slavery in the Territories was in 1820, certainly either has not examined this subject, or has not retained in his memory the result of that examination. I do not now propose to dwell on that branch of the subject. It has repeatedly been dwelt upon at sufficient length in the Senate. It has been held up before the country. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER], in a speech of great ability, has laid before the Senate all the facts in regard to that legislation. I barely desire to refer to it. You will find that in that act Congress exerted the power of abolishing a certain species of slavery which then existed in this country. Congress provided that slaves carried into that Territory for a certain purpose should be, immediately on being conveyed there, entitled to their freedom. Congress exerted a power of prohibiting the slave trade many years in that Territory before they had power to prohibit the foreign slave trade with the States of this Union.

Not to dwell on that legislation which took place in the Territory of Orleans, what was done when the State of Louisiana was admitted into the Union? We have been told repeatedly that Congress had no power to affix conditions to the admission of a State into the Union, except to provide that that State should be republican in the character of its government. If, however, you will refer to the act admitting Louisiana into the Union, you will find that not only was her government required to be republican in its character, but also a condition was annexed that the proceedings of all her courts, and all her legislative proceedings, should be in the language in which the laws and proceedings of this Government were published, to wit: in the English language. That was one of the conditions insisted upon before the State of Louisiana could be admitted into the Union. Another condition was that the navigation of the Mississippi should be free from any tolls which the State of Louisiana might claim at any time the right of imposing; and furthermore that the public lands in that State should be ceded to the United States, and the right of the State to tax them relinquished.

Such, at that time, was the policy of the Government. Was there to be found a statesman in this whole country, in Congress or out of Congress, who then claimed that the power did not exist in Congress to legislate on the subject of slavery, as well as all other subjects, in the territories of this country? I do not wish to exhaust the patience of the Senate by referring more minutely and particularly to authorities on the present occasion, but I beg leave to ask the attention of this body to what was said by Mr. Madison himself, at the first session of the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution formed by his aid and his counsel. A petition was presented to that Congress by Benjamin Franklin, asking that the traffic in human beings might end. Some degree of excitement was occasioned by that petition; but what did Mr. Madison say? The power of Congress to legislate on the subject of slavery was then, for the first time, debated in either branch. It was admitted on all hands that there was no power to legislate with regard to slavery in the States; but how was it as to the Territories? Mr. Madison said:

"He admitted that Congress is restricted by the Constitution from taking measures to abolish the slave trade; yet there are a variety of ways by which it could countenance the abolition, and regulations might be made in relation to the introduction of them into the new States to be formed out of the western territory. He thought the object well worthy of consideration."—Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, vol. 1, p. 1246.

That covers the whole ground. He does not barely say that Congress might legislate with regard to the Territories; he says regulations might be made with regard to the introduction of slaves into the new States to be formed out of the western territory, showing his opinion to be not only that Congress could legislate in regard to the Territories, but could so legislate as to bind the States formed out of them after they became States of this Union. Down to the year 1820, I have never been able to find, in any examination I have given the subject, that the power was doubted or denied; on the contrary, it was exercised on all occasions. Whenever the matter came before Congress, the power was exercised fully and completely.

We then come to the year 1820. I suppose the restriction of slavery in the bill to admit Missouri into the Union is one of the instances of northern aggression, upon which gentlemen would dwell in discussing this matter. I need not remind the Senate of the manner in which that question was brought before the country; but I desire at this time to call attention to the peculiar mode in which that compromise was carried through both this and the other House of Congress. Was it done by northern men? Was it considered as a gain by northern men? I have been at some little pains to look into the manner in which that bill was brought before Congress and passed, and I find that there is no record of any advocacy of the measure, except by southern men. The principal advocate of it seemed to be Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina. Mr. Clay, of course, was an advocate of it, but he occupied the chair a large portion of the time, and what he said is not reported in the current reports. Mr. Lowndes was one of the warmest and strongest advocates of that compromise, and when the vote was finally taken, and the measure passed Congress, it appears that all the members present from the States of Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, voted in favor of that compromise. It was passed by their influence and their exertion. Their arguments sustained it. The North opposed it. It is true the North claimed more; it is true that most of the non-slaveholding States of the Union claimed that slavery should not be permitted in any territory of the United States, but the restriction of slavery in the territory north of 36° 30' was advocated and sustained by southern men, and carried by southern votes.

The Missouri compromise act was signed by Mr. Monroe, after consultation with his Cabinet, among the members of which was Mr. Calhoun. Among Mr. Monroe's manuscripts has been found a paper indorsed: "Interrogatories, Missouri, March 4, 1820. To the heads of Departments and Attorney General."

Questions. "Has Congress a right, under the powers vested in it by the Constitution, to make a regulation prohibiting slavery in a Territory?"

"Is the eighth section, which passed both Houses on the 3d, for the admission of Missouri into the Union, consistent with the Constitution?"

The following original draft of a letter was found in Mr. Monroe's handwriting, not addressed to any one, but supposed to be intended for General Jackson:

"DEAR SIR: The question which lately agitated Congress and the public has been settled, as you have seen, by the passage of an act for the admission of Missouri as a State unrestricted, and Arkansas likewise, when it reaches maturity, and the establishment of the 36° 30' north latitude as a line north of which slavery is prohibited and permitted to the south. I took the opinion in writing of the Administration as to the constitutionality of restraining Territories, (and the vote of every member was unanimous,) and which was explicit in favor of it, and as it was, that the eighth section of the act was applicable to Territories only, and not to States, when they should be admitted into the Union. On this latter point I had, at first, some doubt; but the opinion of others, whose opinions were entitled to weight with me, supported by the sense in which it was viewed by all who voted on the subject in Congress, as will appear by the Journals, satisfied me respecting it."

To show that the question was fully considered by Mr. Monroe and his Cabinet, I ask attention to the following extracts from the diary of Mr. John Quincy Adams, who was then Secretary of State:

"March 3, 1820.—When I came this day to my office, I found there a note requesting me to call at one o'clock at the President's House. It was then one, and I immediately went over. He expected that the two bills, for the admission of Maine and to enable Missouri to make a constitution, would have been brought to him for his signature; and he had summoned all the members of the Administration, to ask their opinions, in writing, to be deposited in the Department of State, upon two questions: 1. Whether Congress had a constitutional right to prohibit slavery in a Territory; and, 2. Whether the eighth section of the Missouri bill (which interdicts slavery forever in the territory north of 36° 30' latitude) was applicable only to the territorial state, or would extend to it after it should become a State. As to the first question, it was unanimously agreed that Congress had the power to prohibit slavery in the Territories. [Mr. A. thought it extended to the State, which was bound by—others that it only related to the Territory.]

"March 5.—The President sent me yesterday the two questions, in writing, upon which he desired to have answers in writing, to be deposited in the Department of State. He wrote me that it would be in time if he should have the answers to-morrow. The first question is, in general terms, as it was stated at the meeting on Friday. The second was modified to an inquiry whether the eighth section of the Missouri bill is consistent with the Constitution. To this I can, without hesitation, answer by a simple affirmative; and so, after some little reflection, I concluded to answer both.

"March 6.—I took to the President my answers to his two constitutional questions, and he desired me to have them deposited in the Department, together with those of the other members of the Administration. They only differed as they assigned their reasons for thinking the eighth section of the Missouri bill consistent with the Constitution, because they considered it as only applying to the territorial territory, and I barely gave my opinion, without assigning for it any explanatory reason. The President signed the Missouri bill this morning.

"A true copy from the original, by me,

—CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS."

With this legislation the country rested in peace for many years. In the year 1854, however, this legislation was disturbed. At that time the country was in peace; the compromise measures of 1850 had been adopted, and had been for the most part acquiesced in. There were some, to be sure, in some parts of the country, who were opposed to those measures; but the opposition had nearly subsided; there was a general acquiescence. If the subject had been allowed to slumber there, I think the acquiescence would have continued, and would have increased. But, in an evil hour, in the year 1854, the law which had existed for more than thirty years—the constitutionality of which had been admitted on all sides; which had scarcely been denied, or, if it had been denied, had been denied in a manner which showed that there was no very great sincerity in those who were denying it—the restrictive portion of the act was declared inoperative and void; and, in addition to that, a feature was presented in the bill which it was supposed would render it quite acceptable to the people of the free States. What was that feature? Having stricken out, and declared inoperative and void, the clause prohibiting slavery north of 36° 30', the bill provided that the question of slavery in the Territory included in it should be left to the free action of the people of the Territory. They were to be left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." That was the only feature of this bill which, so far as its supporters in the northern States were concerned, was considered in any degree acceptable. To a portion of the people of this country that feature was acceptable. It was that feature of the bill which sustained the party now in power in the last presidential election. Mr. Buchanan is right, in his message, when he says the subject was presented to the people of the northern States of the Union in this light: that the people of the Territory of Kansas should be permitted to vote on the question of slavery freely; that it was to be submitted to them; that their will was to be not only considered, but respected and regarded as final.

That bill having become a law, what was the action of the people of this country respecting it, considering them sectionally, viewing them as occupying different portions of the Union? What did the northern States? I will consider their conduct in the light of the charges brought against them. They are accused of having colonized Kansas Territory. We are told that people from the northern States of the Union, being desirous, if possible, to retain that Territory as free territory, believing, as they did, that it belonged to them by every title, not only by the legislation which had long been acquiesced in, but by the law of nature, that it was a proper region for free territory, emigrated to that region in large numbers; we are told that emigrant aid societies were established; we are told that free settlers were encouraged and aided by incorporated companies to go into that Territory, and there take up their residence. If it were so, I am not able to say that I see in that anything objectionable; certainly there was nothing illegal. What if it were true that northern States did incorporate companies with a view of settling one of the Territories of the Union: is not that a perfectly proper and perfectly legal course? Is not settling a Territory a laudable object?

We are told in the message of the President of the United States, in regard to Central America, that the proper way of obtaining that territory which does not belong to us, is by emigration; that we ought not by force of arms to attempt to seize Central America; but that we ought to do it by peaceful emigration. If it is right to emigrate into a territory which does not belong to us, is it not perfectly proper, is it not a laudable object, to encourage emigration into a Territory of this Union? That is all that any Senator can say has been done, even admitting every charge with regard to the Emigrant Aid Society. It was a laudable object; it was a desirable object; and if there was the further object of carrying liberty into that Territory, it certainly does not render it less laudable or less desirable.

But what are the facts? In point of fact, the settlement of that Territory by means of the Emigrant Aid Society, which has been considered a very great act of aggression on the part of the North, has been much overstated. I believe the fact to be that only a very small portion of the free settlers of Kansas Territory went from the New England States at all; or, if they went there from the New England States, it is not true that they went there under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society. For one, I can say that in my entire acquaintance, I have never known but a single emigrant who has ever gone into that Territory from the State of Connecticut. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] informed us the other day, that (I think) nine tenths, at any rate a very large proportion of the settlers of the Territory have gone from the northwestern States, and they have not gone under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society. They had a perfect right to do so. The States of this Union had a right to pass acts of incorporation for any legal purpose, and if citizens had gone under those acts of incorporation, there would have been no possible objection which could have been made to it by any Senator with any show of reason; but in point of fact it was not so. The settlers went there, as we should have supposed they would go there, from the adjoining States, from adjacent territory; or a large proportion of them, almost the whole of them, did so.

That having been the course of the free States, what, I beg leave to ask, was the course of the States that are called the slaveholding States, or the slave States—I prefer to call them the slaveholding States? Did they attempt to settle that Territory? Did they make any attempt to settle it by peaceful emigration? If the State of South Carolina, or the State of Virginia, had seen fit to incorporate companies, with the view of settling Kansas, with the view of encouraging their own people to go there and settle that Territory with an honest intention of residing there, there would have been no complaint raised by the portion of the Union from which I come. Their right was perfect: they could have done it. I never heard that they did; but what did they attempt to do? I do not say that any of the States of this Union interfered in any improper manner in the settling of that Territory; but I do say that the proof is perfectly undeniable—I undertake to allege that it is proved by the report of the investigating committee of the other House of Congress—that the people of the adjacent States, instead of attempting to settle Kansas, instead of going there as actual residents with the intention of remaining, went there by force and took possession of the ballot-box at the point of the bayonet. It was not fraud in the inception; they did not begin by fraud; they adopted no such peaceful means as fraud implies. They went there by actual force and violence, and drove the free settlers of that Territory from the polls, and took possession of the government.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] the other day, denied these charges; and he charged the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] with having stated what he could not prove. I say it is proved. It is so far proved that any Senator has a right to allege it on this floor; he has a right to say it is substantiated by evidence. It is shown that, of the voters who took part in the first election, on the 30th of March, 1855, in the Territory of Kansas, where the violence first made its appearance, about five thousand, in round numbers, were persons who had no residence in the Territory, who had no intention, so far as appears, of becoming residents, who were there merely for the occasion of voting; and when their business of voting was finished, they returned to their homes in an adjoining State. They established a government; they gave it the form of law; they elected a Legislature. That Legislature was not elected by the people of the Territory, but by the people of an adjoining State—men who exercised the right of suffrage in their own State—men who had exhausted their right of suffrage in their own State; men who, having voted in their State, had no right to vote anywhere else. They came into this Territory, and without resorting to fraud, by actual violence took possession of the polls, and drove away those who had a right to vote at that election. That is the origin of the "legality" of the acts that have since taken place in Kansas.

We are told by the President of the United States that the form of law has been given to this action; and we are told that the Legislature has been recognized by both branches of Congress; we are told that he himself has recognized it. That is the very thing of which we complain. The very cause of complaint on the part of the people of the northern States of this Union, and, I trust, a portion of the southern States, is, that this gross and outrageous and too successful attempt to subvert the liberties of the people of that Territory, to deprive them of their rights, has been upheld and recognized by this Government. Can it be claimed here: will it be claimed, that fraud and violence can be ratified, can be sustained, can have any sanction given them by any subsequent indirect approbation, such as it is claimed has been given them by the other House of Congress? It seems to me that no Senator can claim that any such technical support can be given to these proceedings.

We come, in the progress of events, to the presidential election. While these troubles were exciting the attention and interest of the people of the country, the last presidential election took place; and what was the issue then made before the people? I cannot say what was the issue made in the southern States; but I can say with safety that the issue made in the northern States of the Union was whether the people of the Territory of Kansas should be allowed to settle the question of slavery for themselves. If any other question had been presented to the people of that portion of the country, I am safe in saying that the result would have been very different. The President tells you that everywhere this question was made—not the question of the extension of slavery to Kansas; not, shall Kansas be a slave State; but shall the people of Kansas at the polls in a legal manner, in a proper manner, be permitted to say whether they will have slavery or not? That was the question submitted in the presidential election, and the result is known to us all. The people of this country decided it. I am willing to admit that the decision was then made, so far as you can draw an inference in regard to their decision from the result of the presidential election. They decided that, in their judgment, it was right and just that the people of the Territory of Kansas should be allowed to decide on their own institutions in their own way.

When the President of the United States took his place as Chief Magistrate of this Union, a very large portion of the people of the northern States and of my own constituents had great confidence in his patriotism. They had a strong hope that there would then be a fair opportunity furnished for the people of the Territory of Kansas to decide on their own institutions. They knew very well that if that decision was made in accordance with the actual views of the people of the Territory, it would be in favor of the views entertained by us on the great subject of slavery. They had entire confidence as to what the decision would be, and they had great confidence in the patriotism and the honesty of the President of the United States. He had assured them that the people of the Territory should be permitted to decide the question in their own way. He has stated, in his annual message, that if the question had not been presented to the people in the manner I have suggested, the result would not have been what it was; or, at any rate, he has said that it was so left, and that such was the understanding everywhere. Well, sir, has that been done? Has the confidence reposed in the President of the United States by the people of this country been repaid? Let us see.

Sir, in the course of the last summer, when it was first publicly announced that the President of the United States had deemed it his duty to use the Army to enforce the pretended laws of the Territory of Kansas, or more correctly speaking, to compel the free State settlers of that Territory, they being a large majority of the actual population, to submit to the government of a small minority, a number of my constituents united in a memorial to the President, which was expressed in the following language:

"His Excellency James Buchanan, President of the United States:

"The undersigned, citizens of the United States, and electors of the State of Connecticut, respectfully offer to your Excellency this their memorial:

"The fundamental principle of the Constitution of the United States and of our political institutions is, that the people shall make their own laws and elect their own rulers.

"We see with grief, if not with astonishment, that Governor Walker, of Kansas, openly represents and proclaims that the President of the United States is employing through him an army, one purpose of which is to force the people of Kansas to obey laws not their own, nor of the United States, but laws which it is notorious, and established upon evidence, they never made, and rulers they never elected.

"We represent, therefore, that by the foregoing your Excellency is openly held up and proclaimed, to the great derogation of our national character, as violating in its most essential particular the solemn oath which the President has taken to support the Constitution of this Union.

"We call the attention further to the fact that your Excellency is, in like manner, held up to this nation, to all mankind, and to all posterity, in the attitude of 'levying war against [a portion of] the United States,' by employing arms in Kansas to uphold a body of men, and a code of enactments purporting to be legislative, but which never had the election, nor sanction, nor consent of the people of the Territory.

"We earnestly represent to your Excellency that we also have taken the oath to obey the Constitution; and your Excellency may be assured that we shall not refrain from the prayer that Almighty God will make your administration an example of justice and beneficence, and with His terrible majesty protect our people and our Constitution."

This memorial was signed by forty-three gentlemen, citizens of the State of Connecticut. They made no publication of the paper; but in good faith they sent it to the President for his own private perusal, with the intention and the hope that it would exert on his mind such influence as it might deserve to have. No man can say that the memorial is not couched in respectful language. The President himself took no exception to it in this respect; for he made an exception to his general rule in relation to papers addressed to himself, and gave it a particular reply. This reply was made through the channel of the newspaper press, and thus was first announced to the public the existence of the memorial itself. It was not by the memorialists obtruded upon the public attention. The President himself, apparently desirous of an opportunity to publish his intentions regarding Kansas, seized this as a fitting occasion of making them known. I make no complaint of this, nor do I complain of the tone of the reply. It was like the memorial itself, respectful in manner and style, and the character of the memorialists perhaps justified the unusual course taken in giving it publicity.

Now, sir, I invite the attention of the Senate to this correspondence between my constituents and the President, in several points of view. I have brought the history of the affairs of Kansas down to the period when this correspondence took place. I have shown the character of the act repealing the Missouri restriction, and I have referred to the series of outrages consequent thereon. I have referred to the presidential election of 1856, and to the hopes kindled in many honest and confiding hearts that James Buchanan would take high patriotic ground on the subject of that unfortunate Territory. Then, at this precise time to which I have alluded, came the correspondence of which I am speaking.

The main object of the memorial was to protest against the use of the Army of the United States in enforcing the execution of the pretended laws of Kansas. To that I will first direct my attention. They first lay down the acknowledged principle that the people should make their own laws and elect their own rulers. They then say that Governor Walker openly represents and claims that the President of the United States is employing through him an army, one purpose of which is to force the people of Kansas to obey laws not their own, nor of the United States; but laws which it is notorious and established upon evidence they never made and rulers they never elected. They then allege that by the foregoing the President is held up and proclaimed as violating his oath of office. They do not charge him with such violation of his oath; but they say that to use the Army of the United States to force the people of Kansas to obey laws not their own nor of the United States, but laws which they never made and rulers they never elected, would be such a violation; and they say further that the President is represented and proclaimed by his agent, Governor Walker, as employing through him an army for that purpose.

This memorial always seemed to me timely and proper; but whatever may have been thought of it by others at the time of its publication, it has since, by the progress of events, been fully vindicated, and the wisdom and justice of its appeal been fully established. The President of the United States, however honest his intentions, had no legal right to use the Army in the manner and for the purpose indicated in the memorial, and acknowledged by him in his reply. This I now propose to attempt to prove.

The memorialists declare that the laws of Kansas, which the President was enforcing by the bayonets of the regular Army, were not laws; that they had never the election, nor sanction, nor counsel, of the people of the Territory; and that they were not laws of the United States. What is the President's reply to this? I take now his own allegation with regard to it. Does he say that the laws in question were really enacted by competent legislative authority? Does he say that the rulers, claiming authority which he was sustaining by Federal bayonets, were actually chosen by the people of Kansas? He says no such thing. He barely alleges that the Territory had been organized, and that its government was in operation. "A Governor," he says, "secretary of the Territory, chief justice, two associate justices, a marshal, and a district attorney, had been appointed by his predecessor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and were all engaged in performing their respective duties." Who denies this? Who disputes the authority of these officers? Their powers were not in question. The President well knew, when he dwelt on this long array of officers of the Territory, appointed by his predecessor, that their powers were undisputed, that they were unresisted in the execution of their duties, and that they were not now the subject of complaint. Why, then, dwell on this list of officers, except to divert attention from the true question; which was, are the laws of Kansas the enactments of the representatives of the people, and are their elected rulers the officers chosen by them? But he goes on:

"A code of laws had been enacted by the Territorial Legislature. It is quite true a controversy had previously arisen respecting the validity of the election of members of the Territorial Legislature, and of the laws passed by them; but at the time I entered upon my official duty, Congress had recognized this Legislature by different enactments."

The Delegate elected to the House of Representatives, under a territorial law, had just completed his term of service on the day previous to my inauguration. In fact, I found the government of Kansas as well established as that of any other Territory. Under these circumstances, what was my duty? Was it not to sustain this government, to protect it from the violence of lawless men, who were determined to rule or ruin? to prevent it from being overturned by force; in the language of the Constitution, "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed?" It was for this purpose, and this alone, that I ordered a military force to Kansas to act as a posse comitatus in aiding the civil magistrate to carry the laws into execution."

The President asserts that it is his duty to enforce the enactment of the so-called Legislature of the Territory. I have already considered the question whether those acts were entitled to be considered true legislative acts or not. My own opinion is that they were not. I think it has been shown conclusively that there was no form of legislation connected with them which gave them any authority or should entitle them to any respect. But let us for a single moment suppose that they were legislative acts: the signers of this memorial were of opinion that even if they were, the President of the United States ought not to send any portion of the army into that Territory for the purpose avowed by him. While I do not admit that they were acts of legislation, I undertake to say that even if they had been acts of a Legislature properly and legally chosen, the President of the United States, under the Constitution and under the law, had no legal right to send the Army of the United States into the Territory of Kansas for the purpose which he has himself acknowledged and avowed. For what purpose had he a right to send the army into that Territory? The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress certain powers with regard to the Army. It gives Congress power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion." Founded on that clause of the Constitution is the act passed in the year 1795. In passing that act, Congress followed, almost verbatim, the language of this clause of the Constitution. It has sometimes been questioned why larger powers were not given by that act of Congress; and one gentleman, I think the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] spoke the other day of a casus omissus in this act.

Sir, the reason why no power was given to the President of the United States to order troops into a Territory, is that Congress themselves had no power to delegate to him that authority. Congress had only power to provide for the calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion. When Congress had passed a law authorizing the militia to be called out for that purpose, their power was exhausted. The framers of that bill passed it with the Constitution before them. They gave the President all the power which the Constitution invested in them. They authorized him to call out the militia for certain purposes, and Congress had no power to authorize him to call out the militia for any other purposes. To show that the act of 1795 goes no further than I have stated, let me read three sections to the Senate:

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State, or States, most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose, to such officer or officers of the militia, as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State, or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of the militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress.

"SEC. 3. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse, and return peaceably to their respective abodes, within a limited time."

I think there are very few, if any, Senators here, who would claim that under that act, if there had been no further legislation, the President of the United States would have been authorized to order the militia of any State of the Union into a State or Territory, unless for the purposes specified in that act. He would have power, having thus been authorized by Congress, to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion—how? The mode in which he was to do that was specified in the act. In the first place, after having been called on by the Governor or Legislature of a State, he was to issue his proclamation as President of the United States, stating the reasons why he had resorted to this measure. Then, after having ordered the militia into any State, the law expressly provided that he should retain them there for no longer than the space of thirty days after the next meeting of Congress. So jealous were the framers of that act of the powers of the Executive, that even in the instances therein specified, the President was only permitted to use the militia for the space of thirty days, and after all the prerequisites mentioned in the act had been complied with.

Then, in the year 1807, another act was passed, under which the President of the United States claims the power to keep the Army of the United States, as he is at this time retaining them, in that Territory, and as he tells us he will retain them, until we admit Kansas as a State. What is that act? My constituents saw fit to expostulate with the President of the United States for using the Army for the purpose, as they supposed, of crushing the liberties of the people of Kansas. Now, what authority had the President to use the Army there at all? The act of 1807 simply provides:

"That in all cases of insurrection, or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as shall be judged necessary; having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect."

When might he use the militia under the previous law? Could he use it at all in any Territory? There is not a word said in the Constitution, or the law which was drafted in compliance with it, in regard to a Territory; but in the second act the word "Territory" is used, and it may possibly be claimed by some that, by implication, the President has power to use the regular Army in a Territory. I do not admit that such a power as this can be granted to the President by implication; I say an express act of Congress must be shown to authorize the President to use troops in that manner; but if any Senator is of opinion that implication is sufficient on which to found this authority, I take it the implication must follow the general act itself. If the President gets the power by the use of the word "Territory," he must comply with all the prerequisites of the former act; and, if the analogy of a State is to be carried into a Territory, because of the use of the word "Territory," then he is to act in a Territory precisely as he would in a State. If he has power to order troops into a Territory, he has power to order them there as he would in a State, and in no other wise. If he has any power at all, under this law, as to a Territory, he has it precisely as he has it in regard to a State; and he is bound to comply with all the requisites, prerequisites, and postrequisites, in regard to his employment of the troops required in any State of this Union. His power is no greater in a Territory than in a State.

That, I think, must be admitted by every Senator who claims that there is this power by implication. If there is a grant, it is a grant confined to the powers the President had in a State. Now what could he do in a State? In certain cases he might use the militia in a particular manner; but he could retain them there only for the period of thirty days after the next meeting of Congress. There was the limit of his power; and he may use the regular Army in the same manner, having complied with all the prerequisites. I do not claim that the President of the United States has not a right to station or quarter troops in Kansas. That is not the question. The question is whether he has the right to order the troops of the United States into the Territory of Kansas for the purpose which he has himself avowed.

What is that purpose? The act of Congress authorizes him to use the Army for the purpose of executing the laws of the Union; for the purpose of suppressing insurrection; for the purpose of repelling invasion. But what has he done? He tells us—he tells the gentlemen of Connecticut who wrote to him on the subject—that he has ordered troops into Kansas, not for the purpose of repelling invasion, not for the purpose of suppressing insurrection, not for the purpose of executing the laws of the Union, but for the purpose of protecting the polls "as a posse comitatus," as a measure of "precaution," he says. Did the Congress of the United States intend to give to the President precautionary powers in regard to the preservation of the peace by the use of the regular Army? Has he a right to judge for himself as to when there is a probability that the laws may be violated? And if he sees reason to suppose that at any time the laws may be violated, or an election precinct disturbed, has he a right, as a precautionary measure, without complying with any of the prerequisites mentioned in the statute, without waiting for a requisition from the Governor, or for a call from anybody, to send the Army into any State or Territory to guard the polls?

The Senator from Georgia told us the other day, in rather striking language, that liberty preserved by regular troops is not worth preserving. I am rather inclined to think that the freedom of elections in the States of this Union, preserved by regular troops sent by the President of the United States as a measure of precaution, is scarcely worth preserving. What has he done? We have before us, (it was laid on our tables this morning, and I then saw it for the first time,) a document containing some particulars with regard to the manner in which that posse comitatus was employed by General Harney, eminent as I admit him to be in his military capacity. It seems that on the 3d of October, 1857, this order was sent to Captain Hendrickson:

HEADQUARTERS TROOPS SERVING IN KANSAS,

FORT LEAVENWORTH, October 3, 1857.

CAPTAIN: By special orders No. 85, from these headquarters, of this date, you are instructed to proceed, in command of companies A and H, 6th infantry, to the town of Kickapoo, to be in time for the opening of the polls at the ensuing election in that place, on the 5th instant.

You are further instructed by the general commanding to report your force, upon your arrival at Kickapoo, to the proper civil authorities, to act as a posse comitatus in the execution of such orders as may be deemed proper to give you in that capacity.

Before leaving this post you will report to his excellency the Governor for certain instructions he is desirous of giving to you concerning the above civil duties. After the election is over, you will return with your command to this post, unless detained by the proper civil authorities for a longer period.

I am, captain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. PLEASANTON,

Captain 2d Dragoons, A. Ass. Adjutant General.

Captain THOMAS HENDRICKSON,
6th Infantry, Fort Leavenworth, K. T.

MR. BENJAMIN. Where is that to be found? Mr. DIXON. On page 128 of the second volume of the message and accompanying documents for 1857-8. I deny that the President of the United States had any right to send a body of the regular force of this country to Kickapoo, or any other place, as a precautionary measure for the purpose of protecting the polls. I will not now allude to what took place at Kickapoo. There were three hundred voters in that small town, and they gave one thousand votes under the auspices of the regular troops of the United States. The polls were pretty thoroughly protected on that occasion. But, not to allude to that, admitting that everything there was fair and honest, nobody claims that there was any outbreak; nobody claims that there was any danger of an outbreak. It was a place where the free-State men had no strength; it was a place where the vote was almost wholly on the other side. But, to drop that point, and not to dwell on it at all, I say the President of the United States had no power under the Constitution, or under the law, as a precautionary measure, to send troops to that point for the purpose of guarding the polls. General Harney, in a letter to Mr. Floyd, Secretary of War, says:

"HEADQUARTERS TROOPS SERVING IN KANSAS,

FORT LEAVENWORTH, October 11, 1857.

"SIR: I have the honor to report, for the information of the Department, that the general election in this Territory, which took place on the 5th and 6th instant, has passed off very quietly, no disturbance or tumult having occurred at any of the polls which have been heard from to mar the peace of the Territory.

"The troops have returned from the different election precincts, with the exception of Sherman's battery of artillery and one company of foot artillery, and these companies have been retained in the vicinity of Lawrence, at the request of his excellency the Governor of the Territory."

What a picture does that present! An election carried on under the auspices, under the guard and protection, of the troops of the United States, sent out by the President of the United States as a mere measure of "precaution!" There was no disturbance, peace was preserved, "order reigned in Warsaw;" and why should it not? You had the whole force of the Army of the United States, and the President tells the New Haven gentlemen, who protested against his course, that the whole power of the Government should be used for the purpose for which he has used it in that Territory. What was the opinion of the late President of the United States with regard to the power of the Executive on this subject? I will not say that I quote it as an authority which ought to govern on all subjects; but I do say it is an authority which ought to have binding force on the present President of the United States, and on Senators on the other side of the House. This subject was discussed by General Pierce, in his message presented at the commencement of the third session of the Thirty-Third Congress; and he said then:

"The President of the United States has not power to interpose in elections, to see to their freedom, to canvass their votes, or to pass upon their legality, in the Territories any more than in the States. If he had such power, the Government might be republican in form, but it would be a monarchy in fact; and if he had undertaken to exercise it in the case of Kansas, he would have been justly subject to the charge of usurpation, and of violation of the dearest rights of the people of the United States."

I adopt that language. I think it is correct. I think the President had no power to use the Army for that purpose; and I believe that his act in using that power was, in the language of President Pierce, a usurpation; that the law gave him no authority; that it was, in every sense of the word, improper; that it was an act unnecessary in itself; that there was no pretext for it; that there was no occasion for it; that the election would not have been disturbed by those whom he calls free-State men, if those troops had not been there; and he does not admit that he took them there for the purpose of protecting the polls from those of opposite sentiments.

Believing that no power existed on the part of the President of the United States to send troops into Kansas; at any rate believing that they ought not to be sent for such a purpose, a portion of my constituents, as I have already stated, addressed the memorial, of which I have spoken, to that officer. Mr. President, who are the men who have thus memorialized the Chief Magistrate? They have been stigmatized as if guilty of some outrageous enormity. The Government organ, in this city, if I am not mistaken, has joined in the denunciations of a partisan press. It has used language with regard to them which it might well have left to its more unscrupulous companions, and which I do not wish to quote in this presence. Even the Governor of Virginia, in a letter to his political friends in Tammany Hall, has joined in the cry. I know not how many epithets of derision, from various quarters, have been applied to the gentlemen who have signed the memorial of which I speak.

Among other things they have been denounced as political clergymen. Well, sir, suppose it were true that they were all clergymen. Undertake to say that the clergy of this country stand where they ought to stand; first and foremost in intelligence, in education, in morality, in sincere piety. A purer, a more spotless clergy cannot be found in Christendom. They wear their sacerdotal robes unspotted. They mingle in no mere political strife. They lead the people by their counsels and by their example in the paths of that religion whose doctrines they preach, whose precepts they practice, and whose profession they adorn. This, sir, whatever may be said of a few individuals who have proved unworthy, you and I know, and every Senator here knows to be true from our own observation of their lives. Are not such men eminently entitled to the privilege of memorializing the President of the United States on a subject which they believe touches the immortal destiny of man, and takes hold on eternity? I was shocked when I saw these men insulted and vilified by the organs of the Government, and I rejoiced when it appeared that the President himself authorized and justified no such indignity, but gave them memorial a respectful reply.

But, sir, allow me to say that, in point of fact, only a small proportion of the whole number of these forty-three memorialists are clergymen. The rest are eminent civilians and men of science. As a body, they are not inferior in position, in talents, in influence, in learning, to any equal number of men who may be found in any State in this Union. Such are the signers of this memorial. The distinguished man whose name has been placed at the head of the list, and first addressed in the President's reply, sought no such honor; but I admit he is entitled to the distinction. Connecticut consents to accept him as her representative man, and the President was only right in taking his name from its too humble place on the list, and placing it before those who would gladly yield him precedence. And now, sir, who is Benjamin Silliman, that he should be assailed by name in the Government organs, as if he were not entitled to address a respectful message of expostulation, or, if there were need, of reproof, to the President of the United States? One of the great lights of modern science—known, celebrated, distinguished among the few who have adorned the arts, and shed new light on the studies most cultivated by civilized man; the peer, the friend of Humboldt, of Davy, (while he yet lived,) of Arago, of Agassiz, of Chevreul, of Cotta, of De La Beche, of Jean Baptist Dumas, of Faraday, of Le Verrier, of Brogniart, of every great contemporary name made illustrious by devotion to science—known all over the world, when many of our distinguished countrymen are still unknown; the honored instructor of three generations of young men, in that far-famed university beneath whose classic shades he is passing his last days, the guide, the philosopher, the friend, whose teachings and whose counsels have been enjoyed by more of our public men than those of any man now living, the honored professor, at whose feet your own Calhoun sat for many years, when he, a young man, went to New England, as the young men of Rome went to Greece to learn philosophy. There, sir, under the instructions of Silliman, and Dwight, and Kingsby, his great intellect was cultivated, adorned, and strengthened. There he learned to wield that invincible logic which enabled him successfully to encounter the giants of other days—the Websters, the Clays, the Bentons—in this Senate, with constant victory; or, if not with victory, without ever having been compelled to acknowledge defeat. I know not, sir, how many members of this body were trained by the same men or their successors; one, at least, I see near me, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] who has left in those halls a traditional record of eminent scholarship, of high talent, scarcely surpassed by his distinguished position on this floor. But this with deference I say, that whatever honors may be in store for any member of this body; whatever just claims to undying fame the talents, the acquirements, the eloquence, the public services, of the most distinguished here may give him, there is not one among these honored Senators who may not deem himself satisfied, all the hopes of his youth more than fulfilled, all the labors of his manhood more than rewarded, if he may finally reach the measure of fame enjoyed in his ripened years by Benjamin Silliman. No office could elevate him; no honors could extend his reputation; no added celebrity could make his name familiar where it is now known among civilized men. It is inscribed in the immortal records of learning, and can never be forgotten, till the knowledge of humanizing arts and sciences shall fade from the memory of mankind.

I will say more, sir, if the President of the United States, with all the honors he has received from his country, including the added distinction of being enrolled in that list of eminent men who have held the high office he now occupies; if he may believe that when he is at last summoned to his reward, his name shall be as well known to the educated minds of Christendom as that of Benjamin Silliman, he may well be satisfied with the anticipation. Far off, I trust, is the distant day when Professor Silliman shall be called from among men; but when he shall have entered into the fragrant laurel grove through which the ancient Eridanus rolls its ample flood—if I may copy the beautiful allusion of the Senator from Ohio on another occasion—the civilized world will lament his departure, and acknowledge his services to the cause of popular science. His fame is of no country, but of the world.

Yet such is the man who has been assailed and traduced for the audacious character of his respectful memorial to the President; such the man, for having presented whose memorial a Government official has found it necessary to make a public apology.

In the President's letter to these gentlemen, there are several points to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. I have already alluded to that portion of it referring to his use of the troops. Senators on this floor—men of great legal science, whose opinion I have more confidence in than I should ever have in my own—after the greatest and closest investigation of a subject, have given it as their opinion that the President had no power under the acts of Congress to use the Army as he has used them in Kansas; but I have done with that point. There are a few other matters to which I desire to call attention.

The President says that the Topeka convention is an illegal body, and that he has treated it as a usurpation. Now, is it not the right of every citizen of the United States to meet and peaceably petition for a redress of grievances? Was the Topeka convention any more than that? Was there any overt act? Was there anything to render it illegal? Conventions are frequently held in various parts of this country. It is growing somewhat common to hold them, not only at the North, but at the South; conventions in which a great many sentiments which some gentlemen might perhaps consider treasonable are expressed, but I have never yet heard it claimed that, so long as no overt act was performed, no step taken of forcible resistance to any existing Government, those conventions were illegal. If that was an illegal convention, the President and his friends here could show it. Have they done so? I think not. What law did it contravene? Did it contravene the organic act? Did it contravene any act of the Territory of Kansas? Was there any law existing anywhere prohibiting any set of men, in any of our Territories, from meeting when they pleased to form a constitution, call it a constitution, and send it to Congress? They sent it to Congress, and what action did Congress take? One branch of the Congress of the United States accepted this constitution, made by this so-called "illegal" body. It came very near being, and would now be, if it had received the assent and consent of the Senate of the United States, the existing law of the State of Kansas. Had they not a right to send that constitution here? Did they infringe or violate any law or any enactment by doing it?

But the President says he will treat them as President Madison treated the Hartford convention. I have no doubt he thought a very severe blow. He was addressing Connecticut men, and the Hartford convention was held within the State of Connecticut, and this allusion to the Hartford convention undoubtedly was considered a very fortunate hit on the part of the President of the United States. What comparison was there between the Hartford convention and the Topeka convention, admitting that the latter was illegal? There was no analogy between them. There have been conventions held in this country somewhat analogous to the Hartford convention, if they were guilty of what was charged against them. If the Hartford convention had any design (of which I have never seen the proof) of bringing about a disunion of the States, there have been conventions held which might have been compared to them, and to which the President might have alluded. But why drag in the Hartford convention? There were peculiar reasons, I think, why the President should not have alluded to it. I think his own cheeks ought to have been bedewed with some penitential tears before he made any reference to the Hartford convention, in addressing these gentlemen. They did not belong to the party that sustained the Hartford convention. I doubt whether any portion of them—certainly, if any, very few of them—belonged to it; the great body of them were men not then in active life; but the President did belong to the party which sustained and upheld the Hartford convention, and did not leave that party until long after. It was long after that, that Democratic blood began to flow in his veins. I think that before alluding to this, he should himself have shown some signs of penitence. He should have shown that he at least regretted that he had any connection with the Hartford convention, with which he attempts to taunt these gentlemen from Connecticut.

He goes on further and expressly avows in this letter that his principal, if not his sole object, in sending troops into Kansas, was to protect the people in their right to vote on the constitution which was to be submitted to them. There has been a great deal said in this body and out of it as to the right of the people of Kansas to vote on a constitution formed for themselves, and, as should be supposed, by themselves. The question is raised whether they ought to be sustained in so voting; whether they ought to be admitted into the Union under a constitution which is known to be in violation of their wishes; against which they have protested; against which they are now constantly protesting; against which they have protested by their late vote. But what says the President? He says:

"It is my imperative duty to employ the troops of the United States, should this become necessary, in defending the convention against violence while framing the constitution, and in protecting the bona fide inhabitants' qualified to vote under the provisions of this instrument, in the free exercise of the right of suffrage when it shall be submitted to them for their approbation or rejection."

Was it, then, a question whether the constitution shall be presented for their approbation or rejection? So far from it the President of the United States says it is his duty to use the whole power of the Government in protecting them, when it shall be submitted for their approbation or rejection. It is not only to be submitted to the people of the Territory, but the regular Army is to attend them at the polls, and they are to be sustained and defended in their right of voting upon it.

What has been done? Has it been submitted? Have the people of that Territory had any opportunity of voting upon it? The President tells us in a subsequent message that each citizen of Kansas has had a fair opportunity "of expressing his opinion, by his vote, whether Kansas shall be received in the Union with or without slavery." True it is that the constitution itself has not been submitted; but the great question of slavery, he says, has been submitted! I say it has not been submitted at all. The question submitted to them was, will you take this constitution with a particular form of slavery, or will you take it with another form of slavery? and that was the only question submitted to them. It has not been the question of slavery or no slavery. It is difficult to say—the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] said the other day, it would be difficult for him to say, if he were a voter of that Territory, whether he would prefer the constitution in the one form or the other. It is somewhat immaterial; it is a slave constitution in either form.

Are the people of this country to be told that this question has been submitted to the consideration of the proper tribunal—that tribunal which ought to judge upon it, and which they were told should judge upon it? Are they now to be told, at this late day, when the constitution has not been presented to the people; when there has been no opportunity for them to act on the question of slavery alone; that it has been thus presented, and that they are bound by that decision which is pretended to have been made?

Why, sir, the President of the United States says that the vote taken on the day appointed for the election of State officers by the convention is a waiver of all objection on this point. The ground now taken is, that having appeared there and voted under protest, every objection which had previously been made by the people of that Territory to the illegality of the former proceedings is waived. That was the reason why many in that Territory thought it was best not to vote at all. That is the very reason they gave for not having voted previously. They were upbraided; they were charged by the President with treasonable designs for not having voted at the previous elections. They said if they did vote it would be urged that they had waived all objection; but when, finally, at the urgent request of the President of the United States and his officers, they do come forward and vote, then the very thing is said which they had apprehended would be said, namely, that they have waived all objection to all former illegality, and are now estopped from pleading any of those objections on any future occasion.

The President says to us at the close of his message that Kansas must be admitted as a State because dark clouds are lowering over this country which will grow darker, and from which some direful consequences are anticipated, unless the State shall be admitted. I have no wish to allude to anything of this kind. I have had no wish, and have now no wish, in any remarks I may submit, to allude to the subject of slavery at all, or to the questions growing out of it, as to the stability of the institutions of this country and the duration of our Union. I believe that this question may be discussed without much reference to slavery. I think it may be looked at now without reference to the condition of the African race on this continent, and the duration of slavery as an institution, either as a State or territorial institution. In regard to its existence in the States of this Union, I have no desire to discuss it. I have no wish to say one word in regard to the existence of slavery in any State of this Union. If other Senators see fit to do so, I have no objection to any course they may pursue; but so far as I am concerned, I desire only to discuss such measures as I may vote upon in this body. Having no power to vote on the subject of slavery in the States of the Union, I am perfectly willing to drop the discussion of it, and say nothing about it; other Senators may do as they please.

In the consideration of the subject now before us, we are no longer confined to that view of it which relates solely to the destiny of the African race on this continent, and our duties and rights as affected by African slavery. The tendency of all disputes regarding the interests of humanity is to escape from the contemplation of particular instances of wrong or complaint, and rise into the region of general principles. The individual instance of alleged oppression thus becomes, by a natural progress, the concern of the whole human race. The interest of the man becomes the interest of mankind. Thus it has always been in all history. So it was in the struggle which terminated in the establishment of the constitutional Government of England on its present basis; what was at first the quarrel of a few daring individuals became the quarrel of the English nation. So it was in our own Revolution. The question soon lost its local and individual character; the cause of Boston became the cause of all; and when the contest was over, the rights of the whole human race had been vindicated, and the liberties of all within the influence of the result confirmed. And now, in the instance before us, we see a controversy which, in its beginning, regarded the condition of an oppressed and despised people, whose fate many of the governing race in this country thought unworthy of their attention, ending in a terrific conflict, convulsing the whole continent, the termination of which is to decide nothing less than the right of man in this Republic to self-government.

I deem it, Mr. President, a happy circumstance that this question has ceased to relate solely and entirely to particular interests and conditions, and has become thus general in its character. The great principles which it involves can now be distinctly discerned and understood. Those who were indifferent when their attention was invoked to the concerns of what they considered an inferior race, may not be reluctant to engage in a struggle which involves their own rights and privileges. But more than this: the question having ceased to be particular in its interest, can no longer be considered sectional. It relates to the right of man to self-government—not at the north or the south only, but throughout the Republic. Every freeman, whatever his sentiments, whatever his interests in relation to the question of slavery, and wherever his residence, may forget and escape from the narrow prejudices of birth and education, and take such part as a generous nature should prompt in this great contest in defense of the rights of humanity.

When we view it in that light, and stand here and say that we cannot consent to the admission of Kansas into this Union, under the constitution adopted at Lecompton, because the people of that Territory have not been permitted to express their opinion on that constitution, because it is wholly in violation of their wishes, because their rights and privileges have not only been neglected, but have been forcibly and fraudulently trampled in the dust, we are told by the President of the United States that we must make no such objection, because dark clouds hover over the Union. What does that mean? I would not allude to it here, if the President of the United States had not done so. I do not wish to stand here, occupying my position as one of the humblest Senators on this floor, as a defender of the Union. I wish to say nothing about the Union. I wish to take it for granted that the Union of these States is to continue; but the President intimates that it depends upon the result of the vote on this question of admitting Kansas. I see no blame attached by him to those who propose to destroy the fabric of this Government, unless Kansas shall be admitted, under this constitution, into the Union of these States.

Suppose a portion of the people were to be addressed, as we familiarly say, "from the stump," a portion of the people of the State of this Union which is most ultra, if any such there be, in defense of the institution of slavery, and an orator, such as many they have sent to this body, in addressing them, were to say to them, "My friends, the Union between the States forming this Government, is to be dissolved; and why? In the year 1820, we made a compact, we made an agreement, we consented, our representatives themselves brought forward the proposition, we made a solemn covenant and agreement that north of 36° 30' slavery should be forever prohibited. Now, my friends, it is proposed on the part of our northern brethren to do as they agreed; they propose to carry out that compact; they have carried it out for thirty-six years; they propose to continue it; we have had all on our side of the line; they propose to take the other side of the line; and now, gentlemen, we propose to dissolve this Union because our brethren will do as they have agreed." That is the whole of it. The people of the North are now told—I regret that they are so told; I wish it were not said; I am sorry that any such threat should be held out even by implication, and that the President of the United States should make the intimation—"if you insist on what you consented and agreed to twenty years ago, the Union is to be dissolved." What would Henry Clay have said, what would William Lowndes have said, what would Mr. Calhoun have said? What would these gentlemen have said, if they had been told by Mr. Taylor, of New York, who opposed the compromise, "we will not make this agreement; because, if we do make the agreement, in less than half a century representatives from your portion of the country will threaten to dissolve the Union if we propose to abide by it?"

Sir, would any man at that time have dared to say anything of that sort? Would it not have been considered insulting to the South? Would it not have been considered insulting to Mr. Lowndes, to Mr. Clay, to all those distinguished men who forced this compromise on us, if they had been told that if it were insisted on by the North, their descendants would make that a cause of dissolving the Union? I have no very great fear of the Union being dissolved at any time. I see no reason why our friends on the other side of the House should attempt to dissolve it. You have it all, as it is. I see not how you could very well have a more complete southern confederacy than you now have. I do not object to it. Connecticut never has objected to anything of that sort. Connecticut has never been very anxious to assert her rights and interests on this floor. She has been willing, as a patriotic member of this nation, to do her duty, to perform her part; but she has never claimed any very great share of the honors or the spoils of office. She took a pretty active part in the commencement. She was active in the Revolution. You could not have had your independence without her, and she made your Government. Mr. Calhoun stated in a speech on this floor that to Connecticut, to Oliver Ellsworth, and to Roger Sherman, were the thanks due for the Government we now have, and to them solely, with Mr. Paterson of New Jersey. We took an active part then; but since that time we have been perfectly willing to live in the Union simply as a patriotic member.

Our people are a Union-loving people. They would sacrifice everything but honor and principle to save the Union; but when they are told that their brethren of the South demand of them that they should relinquish an agreement and compact made over thirty years ago on this subject, or that the Union must come to an end, they have nothing to say on the subject. I think they desire their representatives here to vote as they think duty ought to prompt and dictate, without paying any regard to intimations of that kind. Certainly I intend to do so. I intend to follow nobody's lead here. Something has been said in regard to leaders, and how certain Senators intend to vote. I intend, as one, to vote in accordance, as I understand them, with the views of my constituents, in connection with, and most willingly under the lead of, my colleague, [Mr. FOSTER,] and under the lead of nobody else. Other Senators may speak for themselves. I propose to speak for myself.

But, sir, I can see no reason why the President should imagine that so dark a cloud now hangs over us. Suppose we should not at this time admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution; and suppose, upon the whole, it should be thought best to adopt the resolutions which were offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] the consideration of which has been voted down at this time, and make further inquiry—and all we ask is inquiry; suppose the Senate of the United States should conclude, on the whole, that it is best to investigate this subject, to ascertain whether all the charges of fraud and violence are founded in truth or not; is it not too trivial a cause for a dissolution of the Union? It seems to me almost puerile, that the President of the United States should come before us, and tell us that on this question hangs the permanency of our institutions. It cannot be, sir. Our institutions do not hang on any such feeble chain as that. They hang on another chain. They hang on the golden chain of mutual advantage. That is the chain on which they are suspended—the mutual advantage of the different sections of this country. That I believe will forever sustain the Union.

But, sir, we are told that a pledge has been given, and pledges are not to be violated. A pledge, it seems, was made in 1854, and the people of the northern States of the Union are now violating a pledge! They are aggressive, and they are violating pledges! Why, sir, the Union newspaper, this morning, if I may allude to the passing events of the day, spoke of a pledge made in the year 1854 by the people of the United States with regard to the question of slavery. I wish to take this occasion to say, that instead of making a pledge at that time not to violate the legislation of 1854, the general feeling throughout the northern States, so far as I know, was that they would not be bound. There was a general protest. Your old parties were broken up; it destroyed the vestiges, the fragments of all the old parties, with the exception of the Democratic party; and I think that is pretty thoroughly demoralized by this time. There was great excitement at that time on the subject. Instead of making a pledge for that purpose, there was another pledge made. There was a determination expressed that the territory included within the compromise of 1820, which had then been ceded to freedom, which belonged to freedom by every title, human and divine, should never, with the consent of the people of the North, be converted into slave territory. It was free then; it had been declared free by the acts of southern men; their leading statesmen had acquiesced in this disposition of the territory; it originated with them; Mr. Calhoun had acquiesced in it; Mr. Monroe and his whole Cabinet had acquiesced in it. The people of the North said we will never be content that that territory shall be made slave territory so long as we can prevent it. They did not say that they would dissolve the Union if it was done. I have never heard any threats of that kind. I do not understand that they now propose to do so.

They propose to stand by the original agreement. They do not ask you now to restore the compromise of 1820. That of course is now out of the question. They ask a practical recognition of it. That is their feeling; that is their desire; they go that length; but still they are not only not permitted to go that length, but they are not permitted to go so far as to claim that the people of the Territory of Kansas shall settle the question for themselves. A large portion of the people think that Congress never ought to admit Kansas as a slave State under any possible circumstances; but the course of events has changed the aspects of the question. It is not now a question of that kind; but it is, as I have already indicated, a question as to whether the people of the Territory shall be permitted to decide for themselves on this question. I scarcely know of any difference of opinion in that region of country on that point.

If this is persisted in; if it is insisted upon that the people of that Territory shall not be permitted to express their opinions, my belief is that there will be a unanimity on this subject at the North, such as has never been witnessed on any question before. It is not now merely a question of slavery; it is not so considered. There are hundreds and thousands who care nothing about the question of slavery, and never have taken much interest in it, who do feel an interest in the question whether the people of the Territory of Kansas shall be permitted to say for themselves whether slavery shall exist there. They see here a determination to force on that people a constitution which they not only never have adopted, but which they have rejected; and they believe that that ought to be resisted to the end, and if need be to the bitter end, however bitter that may be.

But, sir, I have no desire to occupy the attention of the Senate further on the subject. I have already trespassed further than I intended, and, with my thanks to the Senate for their attention, I will now close.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of submitting a very few remarks on the subject-matter before the Senate, which, if I recollect aright, is the "bill to increase the military establishment of the United States." If my memory serves me correctly, the pending direct question before the Senate is on the motion of the honorable Senator from Georgia to strike from the first section of the bill all after the enacting clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) That is the pending question.

Mr. FOOT. It is my purpose, I will say here, to discuss at full length the Kansas question, old and hackneyed and thread-worn as it is, yet still as the great absorbing question before the country, when we shall have that subject before us on the report of the Committee on Territories, to whom it has been referred for consideration and report. But my purpose now is to address myself, for a few moments, to the question immediately before the Senate.

I shall vote for the proposition to strike out the first section of the bill before us. The reasons which will control my actions on this bill have been very forcibly presented already by the honorable mover of the pending amendment, and by several other Senators. But, sir, I beg to state, very briefly, for myself, the reasons which will compel me to vote against this bill, whether the first section shall be stricken out, or whether it shall be retained.

I shall vote against any measure which looks to a permanent increase of the military establishment of the United States at the present time, and simply for the reason, which, indeed, comprehends the whole argument of the case, that I am unable to see any existing necessity for it; that I am unable to see any possible occasion for it. An Executive call for a permanent increase of the military force of the country is an extraordinary one, and requires always, for its justification, some extraordinary occasion. It is made at an extraordinary time, and is made, allow me to say, sir, in an extraordinary manner; in that it is made without the assignment of a single specific circumstance in the condition of the country which renders it necessary; without assigning a single specific reason for so doing.

Fortunately, we are at peace with all the world. No speck of war with any of the nations of the earth appears on our political horizon, and, indeed, it is not so pretended. The President of the United States, in his recent annual message to us, says that with all "other European Governments except that of Spain, our relations are as peaceful as we could desire." Against that Government there are a few unadjusted claims in behalf of American citizens, amounting in the aggregate to something less than two hundred thousand dollars. In addition to that, there is the matter of difference between the two Governments growing out of the affair of the American steamer Eldorado and the Spanish war frigate Ferrallana, on the high seas, off the coast of Cuba, in the spring of 1855, wherein we complained of an insult to our flag. But the President informs us in the same message that he is about "to send a new Minister to Spain with special instructions upon all pending questions between the two Governments, and with a determination to have them speedily and amicably adjusted, if possible." There is no reason to doubt, I trust, but that these questions of difference will be settled at an early day, in a manner just and honorable to both Governments. It is not quite time, therefore, as yet, while these negotiations are in progress, to declare that "war exists by the act of Spain;" and hence it is not quite time yet to incur the heavy expenditure of the proposed increase of the military establishment of the United States in order to meet so remote and improbable a contingency. And I will say, in passing, that, possibly, we may ultimately be able to obtain possession of Cuba at a much cheaper rate than by such a process.

I take it for granted, then, that this call for an enlargement of the military force of the country is for no purpose of national defense against any foreign or external foe. When a call shall be made on us for men and money for such a purpose, I trust I shall be as ready and prompt to vote them as any one here. But so free are we from any actual or threatened violence from abroad, that we need not a single soldier for defense against foreign aggression. We might, with entire safety, so far as regards foreign invasion or encroachment, disband our whole Army; and I think I would, to-day, if the proposition were before us, vote to reduce it to one half its present strength.

This call for a permanent increase of the military establishment of the United States is unusual and extraordinary, as being made in a time of profound peace; and still more extraordinary as being made in a time of a most severe monetary revolution throughout the country and throughout the business world; as being made in a time of widespread and general depression in all the departments of industry through the country; when the Government itself is on the very verge of bankruptcy, and is obliged to meet its own immediate and pressing obligations with paper promises; when your national Treasury is well-nigh empty, and when your revenues are falling far short of your current civil expenses. In such a time as this, sir, nothing can justify a call for an increase of the military force of the country, and a corresponding increase of the Government expenditures, short of some great and pressing emergency—nothing short of some imperious necessity. Does such an emergency exist? Is any one prepared to say that any such necessity exists at the present time? Certainly it is not to be found in any condition of our foreign relations.

Does it exist in any condition of our domestic affairs? I respectfully submit and insist that it does not. Is it demanded by any condition of things now existing in Utah? Not at all, in my opinion. The present regular military force of the country, at its maximum, is about eighteen thousand men. One half, or one fourth—yea, sir, one sixth part of this number is abundantly sufficient, in my judgment, to suppress whatever of disturbances, whatever of insurrection, or rebellion, or resistance to the constituted authorities of the country there may be in Utah, even if it be thought best and wisest to use the military arm of the Government to suppress insubordination among that people. But, in my judgment, Mr. President, instead of sending the military troops of the United States to put down the Mormon rebellion, as it is termed, it would be far better and wiser, and more politic, to withdraw the forces which have already been sent there; to recall your civil officers; to withhold your appropriations from that Territory. Leave them to themselves. Let them alone, and they will make no trouble for us. Let them alone, and they will let us alone. Have nothing to do with them, and they will soon cease to exist as a separate, organized community. Have nothing to do with them, and they will fall to pieces and dissolve of their own dissensions, and their own intrinsic weakness.

Sir, they are an ignorant, superstitious, and misguided set of fanatics—an insane people, who have been gathered up from all parts of the earth—some of them from our own country; many more from Germany and from among the mountains of Wales and Scotland—and they are gathered here to this "Zion" of theirs in the valley of Salt Lake. There I would let them alone. Recall your civil officers; withhold your appropriations, unless it be in charity, if need be, to save them from suffering; send them no more appropriations for the ordinary purposes for which they have hitherto been sent; assume no responsible government over them, except that sort of guardianship which we exercise over our Indian tribes; and above all send no armies to them, but rather send them commissioners of peace, and they will make no war upon us.

I think it was a mistake to give an organized territorial government to this people; and if I am not mistaken, the Committee on Territories—if I am, my honorable colleague will inform me—at the last Congress, had under consideration the question of the repeal of that territorial government. At any rate, it seems to me, sir, that this would be a far better course to pursue towards these deluded, crazy people, than to send an armed soldiery among them to shoot them down. The very idea of raising armies to go to war with Brigham Young and his Mormons, strikes me as presenting this great nation of ours in rather a humiliating, not to say a ludicrous, attitude before the world. There is no glory to be won; there are no laurels to be gathered on such a field as that.

As at present advised, I shall vote against any increase of the Army of the United States, on account of any present or prospective state of things in Utah. If the very worst condition of things shall happen there which the most credulous can anticipate, our present regular force is ample to meet any emergency which can possibly arise there. If not, if I am in error in this, then raise a sufficient temporary force for the occasion, to be discharged when the occasion shall have passed. At most, it is but a temporary difficulty, and demands no permanent increase of the Army of the United States.

If it be said that an increase of the Army is needed for the purpose of suppressing what some gentlemen are pleased to call rebellion in Kansas, I have but a single remark to make in answer to it; and that is, that the proposed increase of the military establishment of the United States, I apprehend, will be found to be utterly insignificant and altogether insufficient for that purpose. I have nothing more, however, to say at present on that point.

If it be said, again, that this enlargement of the military force of the country is needed for the purpose of protecting our border settlements from the ravages of the Indian tribes, I answer, in the first place, that this necessity, if necessity it be at all, is no greater now than it has been for many years past; and I add, in the second place, that the regular military force of the country is as adequate for that purpose to-day as it has been for many years past, and much more adequate than it was but a very few years ago. I answer further, that volunteer companies can readily and effectually supply, for the time being, any deficiency or inadequacy in the regular military force of the country. And after all, a few companies of mounted rangers, I believe, with the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houston,] to be much better than either.

But a more pertinent and potential answer still, is this: protect the Indians against the aggressions, the incursions, the wrongs, the injustice, the violence of the whites, and you will have no occasion for any military force, either regular or volunteer, to protect the whites against the Indians. I presume it is safe to say that in nineteen cases out of every twenty, these Indian wars and depredations which have cost this Government such enormous sums of money, and which have caused so much of alarm, misery, and bloodshed, have been provoked by, and have had their origin in, the aggressions of the whites. Put a stop to this; put a stop to the aggressions of the border whites; put a stop to the injustice, the frauds, the wrongs, and the robberies of your white Government agents, and we shall hear very little more of Indian invasions and of Indian barbarities.

The sum of the whole argument against the proposed increase of the military establishment of the country is this: that we are not advised of any existing necessity for it; and we are unable to conceive of any such necessity. We are at peace with all nations; and whatever domestic disturbances there may be within our borders, they are but local, incidental, and temporary, and our present regular military force is abundantly sufficient to meet any emergency that can possibly arise from them. Least of all, sir, do they call for an increase of the military establishment of the United States, and a corresponding imposition of taxation and burden on the people. We all know that the people of the United States will very cheerfully bear the imposition of any burden on them when they see an existing necessity for it. They will cheerfully bear whatever burden may be imposed on them for the necessary defense of the country; but when they see no such existing necessity, and above all, when they are not even told of any such necessity, they will at least bear such impositions with impatience.

Besides casting this large number of men for support upon the public charge, it takes just exactly so many men from the productive power of the country; and, in a corresponding degree, so much from the effective means of national wealth and of national prosperity. But I will not enlarge on this point.

Aside from all this, Mr. President, as we have already been told, and we may be emphatically told again, the American people have a hereditary and just jealousy of standing armies, the effect and influence of which were so eloquently depicted the other day by the honorable Senator from Georgia; and that jealousy is the more awakened as they see your Army growing in numbers and strength, but surely, from time to time, and almost from year to year. It is not that nobody is alarmed at a small army of five or ten thousand; it is not but what everybody would be opposed to a large army of one or two hundred thousand; but the ground of alarm, of apprehension, of jealousy, is, that they see your small Army, to which nobody is opposed, rapidly advancing to your great Army of one or two hundred thousand, to which everybody to-day is professedly opposed.

Standing armies, I need not say in this presence, have proved the bane of every Republic that has risen or fallen, in ancient or in modern times. They overthrew all the earlier, as they have overthrown most of the later, Republics of the world. They have been the instrumentalities by which the grand and the petty tyrants of the Old World, "springing from the stagnant pools of despotism" for the last two thousand years—from the Roman triumvirate, which reared the throne of the Cæsars upon the ruins of republican liberty there, to the Emperor who to-day holds in his hands the destinies of France, and of Europe—the instrumentalities by which the despots of the earth have been able to sustain themselves while pressing with their iron heels upon the necks of the popular and prostrate masses of the people.

Sir, in the absence of any foreign war; in the absence of any formidable domestic disturbances beyond our present means of suppression and defense; in the absence of any information with regard to any existing necessity for a permanent enlargement of the military force of the country; and in the presence of a general and crushing depression in all the departments of industry; in the presence of impending national bankruptcy; and in the presence of the popular distrust of large and increasing standing armies in times of peace, I shall certainly best discharge my duty to the convictions of my own judgment, and to what I conceive to be the public sentiment of the country, by voting against this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Biggs.) The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. A number of gentlemen who, I believe, are friendly to the main purpose of the bill, and on whose votes I have relied against striking out this section, have left the Senate, not expecting that the vote would be taken to-day; and, therefore, I very much prefer that the debate shall be closed if the Senate think proper, and that the vote shall be taken at some hour, which shall be named, to-morrow. I will say three o'clock, to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD and Mr. TOOMBS. Say two o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well; I will say two o'clock, to-morrow. The debate may as well go on to-day on this and any other amendments gentlemen may wish to offer, so that it may be entirely practicable for us to take the vote to-morrow at some hour which may be named.

Mr. PUGH. I supposed the honorable Senator from Mississippi desired to vote on this bill, and therefore I was disposed to rest with the reasons which have been so well given by the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Vermont. I have the utmost inclination to support any reasonable demand of the Administration for an expenditure of public money; but, sir, I think the Senate and the country ought to be admonished of the wasteful extravagance of this Government, and particularly in the Army and Navy; and I say to the honorable Senator from Vermont, that if he will bring in his bill to reduce both the Army and the Navy, he shall have my vote from the first proposition to the last. It is hardly a month ago since we were asked to give the Government $20,000,000 to carry on its ordinary expenses. The emergency was so imminent, we were told, that we could not resort to the ordinary form of a loan; we must adopt a system of irresponsible paper money, with no provision for its redemption. As much of it as could be pressed into circulation in every conceivable manner, has gone into circulation. We have made no attempt to provide for its payment; and, I declare for one, I see no manner in which we can support this increase of our expenditures, unless we go on issuing paper money time and again, without any reasonable means provided for its redemption.

Now, sir, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the condition of the defenses of the country to say whether this force may be necessary to subdue an alleged insurrection in the Territory of Utah; but I think it is due to the Senate and due to the country, in these circumstances, that that necessity should be demonstrated; and I cannot say that I think it has been demonstrated. Here is an Army of eighteen thousand men, or which may amount to eighteen thousand men. Where is it employed? Is not that sufficient to subdue a few wandering bands of Indians, and these poor deluded creatures in the Territory of Utah?

I see no necessity for the troops to remain in Kansas. They were called there legally, in my opinion, in the first instance—differing therein from many other Senators—but the party which was alleged then to be in opposition to the territorial government is now in possession of the government under the territorial form, and it occurs to me that there is no further necessity for the presence of troops there; and, in fact, I believe that the wisest thing which could be done for the peace of the country would be to withdraw them to-day—not that I apprehend the civil war which Senators threaten. I apprehend civil peace will be the result, and quiet and satisfaction there as elsewhere.

My inclination, Mr. President, has been to vote for this bill if the first section of it were stricken out; to vote for an increase of the rank and file of the Army, not an increase of officers with large salaries; and that rather from my general confidence in the Administration, than because I am satisfied there is a necessity even for that.

For these reasons, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Georgia, to strike out the first section; and if that section be not stricken out, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill; with the further proviso, that I think this increase ought to be limited to the period of two years.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not desire to enter into any debate on the merits of the bill, but as it will be impossible for me to give it my vote, I wish to state in a very few words the reasons that control me in my action.

I cannot for the life of me discover, either from the arguments which have been addressed to us by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or by the executive communications, whether emanating from the Chief Magistrate or the Secretary of War, for what purpose a permanent increase of the Army is wanted. I have looked again and again into those communications for the purpose of satisfying my judgment on the subject; but I have looked in vain. I sent this morning for the estimates put on our table, at the beginning of the session, for the War Department, and I have looked into the report of the Secretary of War first published with the accompanying documents this morning. I find the expenditures of the Government for the Army proper, calculated during the present year in those estimates of expenses at something like fifteen million dollars. The entire appropriation required by the Department of War exceeds twenty million dollars, but the estimate put down for the Army proper is about fifteen million dollars. Then looking into the report of the Secretary of War, I find that the average amount of the public forces is fifteen thousand men. So that by combining these two statements we find the annual expenditure for each man in our Army now amounts to $1,000. The proposition is to increase the Army seven thousand men; that is, to add to the permanent regular expenditure of the Government $7,000,000 per annum for all time to come. It is not proposed that this additional force should be raised at the moment for any emergency, upon the cessation of which the Army is to be again reduced; but on the contrary we are told that it is to be a permanent increase of our regular force.

Now, sir, taking this estimate to which I have just referred—and we all know that the expenditures of our Army are annually increasing per man instead of decreasing—$7,000,000, at the rate at which this Government can borrow money, is equivalent to a capital, at the very lowest, of $140,000,000. At five per cent., and we can borrow money cheaper than that, it is equivalent to an expenditure outright of $140,000,000, for by agreeing to pay $7,000,000 per annum, we can at this moment put $140,000,000 into the Treasury.

The proposition to Congress, then, is nothing more nor less than the expenditure of a capital of $140,000,000. I can view it in no other light. I say, sir, that I have looked carefully this morning into the report of the Secretary of War, and I find nothing in it to justify this increase of force. He refers to some possible difficulties in Utah. I will say, as other gentlemen have said who have given their views against the expediency of increasing the Army, that if for the temporary emergency some additional force be now required, and we are told so by the Executive Department, I am willing to vote it; but I am not willing to vote one dollar towards a permanent increase of the Army, neither by companies, nor by regiments, nor by single soldiers.

We have now fifteen thousand men in the field. Against whom are they employed? The honorable Senator from Vermont has told us this morning, and told us truly, we have no foreign enemy to repel. As to our frontiers, the Senator from Georgia has told the Senate in language which none of us can forget, that the present condition of the Indians on the frontiers bear no comparison with that which existed some years ago, when the combination of the western tribes enabled them to fight pitched battles against the Government. A few miserable wandering savages upon the frontiers perfectly within our power to keep in check by a few companies of mounted rangers, and for that purpose we are to add $7,000,000 per annum to the permanent expenditures of the Government!

I must have some other reasons offered to me to control my judgment before I can agree to this bill. Disposed as I am to support every legitimate measure of the Administration, disposed as I am to give it a cordial and even generous support, I cannot vote for such a recommendation as this. I will not repeat the reasons given by other gentlemen, but the fiscal reason alone would be sufficient to satisfy my judgment and control my vote, if my judgment were not already convinced by the arguments of the Senators from Georgia and Vermont. I shall vote against the whole bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, while the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] was addressing the Senate the other day, I remarked, in an undertone, and I saw that it was incorporated into what he said, that the expenses of the Army per man for the past year were equal to $1,500. The Senator from Louisiana now states that, taking the number composing the Army at fifteen thousand, and such I understood to be the number from the chairman of the Military Committee, and dividing fifteen millions by that number, it will make $1,000 per man. The amount is sixteen millions, which would be a little more than $1,000 per man. What the Senator states is true; but is it not equally true that we have before us appropriations of about six millions asked for legitimate Army purposes for the past year, outside of fortifications? You may tell me that it is for an extraordinary state of things. Grant it; but add to your

Army, and if they are to be located in the very position now occupied by your Army, will not that same state of things exist, demanding of us a like appropriation to supply the deficiency for another year. I say, then, by every just rule in the world in ascertaining what is the amount of expenditure for the Army proper for the past year, you should take into the account the appropriation of about six millions which is now asked of us to supply deficiencies. Take, then, these two sums together, and what do they amount to? Fifteen millions and six millions are twenty-one millions. Divide that sum by fifteen thousand, and you have to a dollar—excluding the odd dollars in the millions—$1,400 to a cent, and I insist that that sum, and not $1,000, is the amount which is to be set down legitimately as the expense of your Army for the past year, and it is an alarming expense.

Mr. President, it was my purpose at one period of time to address the Senate on this question, but other Senators have anticipated me in what I proposed to say. I shall, therefore, content myself with voting upon reasons which have been given by others. I wish, however, to state one suggestion which occurs to me as worthy of remark, and which has not been stated to the Senate. These troops, if they are to be used at all, if I understand the state of things existing, are to be used for the same purposes, and in the same way, that our Army is now employed. The war-making power, in all its ramifications, is delegated expressly in the Constitution to Congress. Are we to have war in Utah? I hold that that is a question for us to determine; and while I have a seat here, I will not vote a dollar or a man to support executive wars anywhere. If there is to be a war, if there are to be forces used in Utah, I insist that it is a question for us first to settle, and to determine the mode and manner in which they are to be used. I concur in what fell from the Senator from Vermont. I would withdraw our troops from there; I would send no additional forces there; because, in my judgment, it is not the best and most appropriate way to effect the object desired.

Now, sir, step by step you witness the aggressions of the executive power. I speak in no party sense; I speak in no sectional sense; I bring into the discussion nothing of local questions; but, basing it upon principle, upon principle alone, I would not vote a single man to send into that Territory until we have determined, ourselves, in a preliminary manner, the necessity that shall exist for sending them there. I would not vote to increase the Army a single man for ordinary purposes; but, as other Senators have said, I will vote now, I will vote this minute, to reduce it to ten thousand men, and that number, in my judgment, is more than ample for all purposes.

Look at the manner in which the Army has been always increased. Look at your debates when you created your dragoons. What were the purposes for which they were raised? To suppress Indian hostilities, or to keep the Indians in check; to protect the frontier settlements. What have they done? Sir, I stand here and I challenge contradiction: not a single thing have they done since they were created, except, on one occasion, to murder a few poor squaws and little children.

Mr. DAVIS. What occasion does the Senator allude to?

Mr. HAMLIN. The name of the point at which it took place has escaped me; but the Senator from Texas alluded to it a few days ago, and perhaps he will recollect it.

Mr. DAVIS. It is the same, is it? I am ready for that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I say that is the only exploit which has signalized that arm of our military forces. There is always an emergency, in the minds of some men; and for this purpose, or that purpose, an army may be increased to an indefinite amount. If I can be satisfied, on investigation, that it is wisest and best, and that it shall be necessary, to send an adequate military force into the Territory of Utah, I am willing to vote those men; but I am unwilling to vote them for the ordinary purposes of the Government. How many troops on all the Atlantic coast are now stationed in your forts and fortifications? If I am wrong, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will correct me; but I think in what is called the eastern department—and, if I am not mistaken, the eastern department embraces all the Atlantic coast from the Gulf of Mexico to Maine—there are about eight hundred men and officers, an ample number; and that number I think is ample for any other equal distance of our coasts or our frontiers, where ever that may be.

I simply rose for the purpose of saying this. I do not wish to be put in a position of refusing to vote troops that are actually necessary for any emergency; but I insist that that emergency is a question which is to be determined by ourselves. Before we raise them for that emergency we ought to have all the facts, all the information that will lead to an enlightened vote on the subject. For ordinary purposes we are entitled to the same sources of information and to the same information in fact. We have neither investigated in the one case, nor have we had the information in the other. But, believing as I do, that for peace purposes, for the purpose of keeping a skeleton army according to the whole policy of the country, the present force is sufficient, I will vote to strike out the first section of this bill; and then I shall cheerfully vote against the bill, if it shall be so stricken out.

Mr. WILSON. As a member of the committee—

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. SEWARD. If no person desires to speak but the Senator from Massachusetts, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 9, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. J. MURRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting for the action of Congress, contemplated by the eighth section of the act of July 22, 1854, the transcripts of thirteen private land claims in New Mexico, designed for the House of Representatives, as indicated in the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of the 21st of November last, a copy of which was also inclosed.

The communication, together with the letter of the Commissioner and the accompanying documents, were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Mr. CURTIS, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; which were referred as indicated below:

Joint resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, for additional mail service in Iowa; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Preamble and joint resolution of instructions concerning the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution; to the select committee ordered yesterday, and ordered to be printed.

Joint resolution to procure additional mail facilities; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Joint resolution to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, asking for bounty land warrants for the volunteers on the Spirit Lake expedition; to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Memorial and joint resolution asking Congress to appropriate a sum sufficient to the State of Iowa to indemnify the said State for all necessary expenses incurred in an expedition raised under the authority of the Governor of the State of Iowa to relieve the settlements of Spirit Lake, in March A. D. 1857; to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, relative to certain Indian reserves in the State of Mississippi; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask, in this connection, that the papers connected with this same subject, now on the files of the House, be withdrawn and referred to the same committee.

The SPEAKER. That can be done under the rules.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, in this same connection, to have referred to the same committee the bill upon this subject which was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs during the last Congress. I merely desire to get it before the committee.

No objection being made,

Mr. CLINGMAN introduced the bill to which he referred, being "A bill to execute the treaties of 1817 and 1819 with the Cherokees, by making provision for the reservations under the same;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DOWDELL, by unanimous consent, presented the joint memorial of the Legislature of Alabama to the Congress of the United States, asking that the city of Montgomery, in said State, be constituted a port of entry, and that a building be constructed for a custom-house, court-house, and post office; which was referred, the first part to the Committee on Commerce, and the last part to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CONDUCT, ETC., OF LATE DOORKEEPER.

Mr. JENKINS, from the select committee to inquire into the accounts, &c., of the late Doorkeeper, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to inquire into the accounts and official conduct of Mr. Darling, the late Doorkeeper of the House, be also authorized and empowered to inquire into the misappropriation, by any person whatsoever, of any books, or other public documents, printed by the order of either or both Houses of Congress.

Resolved, That the committee be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual compensation.

Mr. JENKINS. I ask for a division of the question, and move the previous question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object to the last resolution.

The SPEAKER. A single objection will not prevent its reception.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask that the resolutions may be divided so as to take the vote upon each separately.

Mr. KELSEY. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. Not pending a demand for the previous question.

Mr. KELSEY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question and allow this whole thing to be investigated. I have heard as many rumors about the present Doorkeeper as I have heard about the last; and I desire to empower the committee also to investigate the charges in relation to him.

Mr. BURNETT. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us hear the resolutions read.

Mr. JENKINS. The resolutions explain themselves.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. SEWARD. I cannot see that that is a report from the committee. It simply asks the House to authorize the committee to select a clerk for themselves, and to extend the scope and authority given to them. They ask to be clothed with new powers. That is not a report on the matters referred to them, and therefore I raise the point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of this select committee, but it seems to me to be a natural inference to be drawn from the presentation of this report, that the committee, from their investigation as far as it has gone, see a necessity for an enlargement of their powers. If they did not see such necessity we are bound to suppose that they would not have thus sought an enlargement of their authority. I shall therefore vote for the resolution.

Mr. JENKINS. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD.] The gentleman from Virginia presents this as a report from the committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall appeal from the decision of the Chair, on the ground that this is not a report from the committee on the subject-matter referred to them. They are asking to be clothed with new powers and to be permitted to investigate matters that have never been intrusted to them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the report is in order, the gentleman from Virginia stating that it is a report from the committee. From this decision the gentleman from Georgia appeals.

Mr. STANTON. I ask for the reading of the resolution under which the committee was appointed.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not at the Clerk's desk, but it directed an inquiry into the accounts and official conduct of the late Doorkeeper.

Mr. STANTON. Was there a clause in the resolution authorizing the committee to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. There was.

Mr. SEWARD. They were authorized to report at any time in regard to the matters referred to them. Now I care nothing about this investigation. My sole object is to prevent abuses in this House by committees assuming jurisdiction over matters which have never been referred to them. But as I have not as much confidence in my own judgment as in that of the Speaker, I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. JENKINS. I hold in my hand the resolution under which the committee was appointed, and I ask that it be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into the accounts and official conduct of the late Doorkeeper of the House, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time."

Mr. KELSEY called for tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELSEY and AVERY were appointed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow an amendment to be offered extending the investigation to the conduct of the present Doorkeeper, there will be no objection to the previous question.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman will see from the terms of the resolution, that it covers the misapplication of public documents by any person. If an investigation be necessary into the conduct of any other officer of the House, another committee ought to be appointed. I do not think that our committee ought to be required to perform all the service of this kind.

The House then divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 96.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I now offer the following amendment, and demand the previous question:

Add at the end of the first resolution as follows:

And that said committee be authorized and directed to investigate any charges affecting the official conduct of the present Doorkeeper of the House.

Mr. KELSEY. That meets my views.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment; I will renew it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question or else move an additional amendment to the resolution as reported by the committee. The resolution speaks of the misapplication of books by any one. I suppose the inquiry ought to be confined to members or officers of the House.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask a division of the question on the resolutions. I desire to vote to enlarge the scope of the investigation; but I do not desire to authorize the committee to employ a clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia called for a division of the question before the previous question was seconded. The vote will, therefore, be taken separately upon the resolutions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the first resolution as amended.

Mr. HUGHES called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I am opposed to all these investigations, unless charges are made on the responsibility of some member of the House. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The first resolution, as amended, was adopted. The question was then on the adoption of the second resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual compensation.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make an explanation.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 72.

Mr. MORGAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, asked for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The House has just refused to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution provides that one fifth of the members may have the vote entered upon the Journal, and I think that if the House, at one stage of a question, refuses to order the yeas and nays, it does not debar itself from exercising that privilege at another stage.

The SPEAKER. The question is at the same stage now that it was when the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But, sir, we have divided on it. And although it is the same question I know, my own opinion is that after the vote has been taken and announced, we have the constitutional right to move that that vote be entered upon the Journal. That, I think, is the constitutional provision.

The SPEAKER. One fifth of the members have the right under the Constitution to order the yeas and nays, and to have them entered upon the Journal; but the rules of the House prescribe the particular mode in which that constitutional right is to be exercised. The gentleman claimed that right, but on his demand one fifth of the House did not vote to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It may be that at this time one fifth of the members desire to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the yeas and nays will be ordered by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move that the second resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask leave of the House to be allowed to explain the reasons for this resolution. I am chairman of this committee, and it is a courtesy not often denied to the chairman of any committee to state to the House the reasons upon which a report is based.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object. The reason why they want a clerk is to give employment to somebody.

Mr. HUGHES. That is not true. There is work to be done. The gentleman does not understand the matter.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will not the effect of the motion to lay a part of the resolution upon the table be to lay the whole subject there?

The SPEAKER. The first resolution was adopted, as amended. That has been disposed of.

Mr. JENKINS. I trust the House will indulge me with one word of explanation. I will be brief.

Mr. COLFAX. As the gentleman called for the previous question to prevent amendments, I must object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has not the gentleman from Virginia the right, having made this report from a committee, to explain it or make a speech after the previous question has been ordered? I think he has that right under the rules of the House.

Mr. PALMER. There has been a response on the call of the roll, and the gentleman from Virginia has no right under the rule to interrupt the call with a speech.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that there has been a response, and it is therefore too late for the gentleman from Virginia to claim his right to speak.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to the Chair—

Mr. PALMER. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman can insist only as far as his right goes. I make a point of order, and it is this: does the fact that the Clerk has called a name, and that there has been a response, deprive the gentleman from Virginia of his right under the rules to address the House after the previous question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Alabama. If the gentleman from Virginia had desired to avail himself of his privilege before there was a response, he would have been entitled to it, if he had not been cut off by the motion to lay upon the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 93, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craigie, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Granger, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Moit, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Ricard, Robbins, Royce, Seales, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wilson, Wood, and John V. Wright—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bishop, Boeck, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Hawkins, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kelsey, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maciay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Parker, Peadleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Warren, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zolllicoffer—114.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution.

Tellers had been ordered; and Messrs. KELSEY and AVERY were appointed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, withdrew his call for tellers.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. JENKINS moved to reconsider the votes by which the resolutions were adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. STANTON. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution for reference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. PHELPS. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I hope the gentleman will not object to a resolution for reference to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELPS. I call for the regular order of business; but I do not mean to object to the introduction of a resolution for reference.

Mr. STANTON. Then I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution making appropriations for the expenses of investigating committees. The Clerk of the House informs me that such an appropriation is wanted. The amount of the appropriation is $5,000. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LETCHER. Let me make a suggestion at this point, before the resolution goes to the Committee of Ways and Means. I would suggest that the chairmen of these investigating committees send to that committee some statement showing what are their current expenses, so that we may be informed when we come to act upon the subject.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to make another suggestion. I wish the chairmen of the committees of investigation would also inform the Committee of Ways and Means how many hours of the day and how many days of the week their clerks are employed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the appropriation is for clerks; but for witnesses.

Mr. SEWARD. It is for the expenses of special committees. I want to know how many hours these clerks are employed. I think, so far as I have seen, that very little work is done by any of them.

Mr. LETCHER. Nevertheless my friend from Georgia understands that they have to be paid.

Mr. SEWARD. I think we had better discharge them.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, that it may be referred to the special committee on the Pacific railroad.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to give way that I may introduce this bill, and have it referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad. It was sent to me; I have not examined it, and do not know whether it meets my approbation; but I desire to have it referred.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER commenced the call of the committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to allow the resolution, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, to be read and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. PHELPS, from the select committee on the Pacific railroad, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee, to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to a railroad to the Pacific ocean, is hereby authorized to employ a clerk at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. PHELPS. At a meeting of the committee I was directed to report that resolution; and really I think the services of a clerk will be necessary to aid the committee in its investigation. I move the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that, and allow me to amend that resolution.

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the usual compensation?

Mr. PHELPS. Four dollars per day.

Mr. STANTON. Do the committee intend to take testimony?

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On behalf of the minority of that committee, I wish to say that there is no necessity for a clerk.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If it is not, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has already made that motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, called for tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITH of Tennessee, and DEAN were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 42.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

THE SOUND DUES.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th of April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the sound dues; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

E. K. KENT.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of E. K. Kent, asking for compensation for his invention used at the Mints and assay offices, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Patents.

M'ATEE AND EASTHAM.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Court of Claims bill (No. 65) for the relief of Benjamin L. McAtee and J. N. Eastham, of Louisville, Kentucky; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases:

On the petition of Addison Farnsworth, asking to be remunerated for property lost in the Mexican war;

On the memorial of William B. Barry; and

On the petition of Ephraim Shackley.

The adverse reports were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MAJOR H. L. KENDRICKS.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Brevet Major H. L. Kendricks; which was read a first and second time, referred to a committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of sundry petitions and memorials; which were laid upon the table.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT KEOKUK.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that they do not pass, the following bills; which were laid upon the table, and the reports ordered to be printed:

H. R. No. 155. A bill to provide for the erection of a marine hospital in the city of Keokuk.

H. R. No. 156. A bill to provide for the construction of a custom-house and post office building at the city of Keokuk.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to state to the House, that the bill known as the steamboat bill was postponed until to-morrow. The substitute for that bill which has been agreed upon, and the report, have been printed, and gentlemen can find them in the document room. I hope any gentleman who is interested in the subject will get those documents and examine them, as I shall endeavor to call the bill up to-morrow and have it passed, if possible.

JOHN B. BAYLISS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, made an adverse report on the petition of John B. Bayliss; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN N. M'INTOSH.

On motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John N. McIntosh, asking compensation for office rent and so forth, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

J. W. SULLIVAN.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the petition of J. W. Sullivan, asking compensation for losses sustained in consequence of the failure of the mails; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

HARRIS AND MORGAN.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to revise and adjust the accounts of Harris & Morgan on principles of equity and justice; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN F. CANNON.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill for the relief of John F. Cannon; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MONEY.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to reimburse the Corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, a sum of money advanced towards the construction of the Little Falls bridge; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

J. W. NYE.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to provide for the payment of the claim of J. W. Nye, assignee of Peter Barge, jr., and Hugh Stewart; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

MARY ETT VAN BUSKIRK.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Mary ett Van Buskirk; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the unanimous report on principal, and majority report on interest, ordered to be printed.

GENERAL CHURCHILL.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution for the relief of General Sylvester Churchill; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

TEXAS BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Territories, reported back House bill (No. 152) to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary line between the territories of the United States and the State of Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If there be no objection, I ask that the bill may be acted on immediately.

The bill was read. It provides for the necessary details of running and marking the boundary line between the territories of the United States and the State of Texas, and makes an appropriation of $80,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for that purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no written report.

Mr. MORGAN. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is. Texas has appointed a commission to join such commission as this Government may appoint to make this survey of a boundary line.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the boundary marked out in the bill the boundary of the Texas bill?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, the bill was read a third time.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I should like to have time to examine into this matter, and to learn whether this proposed line is in accordance with the treaty line.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Which treaty?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I mean the resolutions of annexation.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The western line is the Rio Grande; and the other part of the bill is taken from the law defining the boundaries of Texas.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Why cannot we have a little time to look into this matter, instead of putting the bill upon its passage in the instant?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have no objection. It will take but a moment to examine it. Texas has already appointed her commissioners, and the sooner we pass the bill the better.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will say a word on this subject for the satisfaction of gentlemen who desire to know the facts. Some four or five years ago, the Legislature of Texas passed a joint resolution instructing the members of Congress from that State to secure the passage of a law authorizing the appointment of commissioners to define and mark the exterior boundaries of Texas. Subsequently, the Legislature twice passed a law making an appropriation and provision for such a commission on its part, to act in conjunction with a commission to be appointed by the Federal Government, to run and mark this boundary line; not to change any boundaries.

The question has become one of great interest to the people of Texas in this point of view: They are going out upon our borders and locating their land certificates. Doubts have arisen in the minds of some of our people whether they have not crossed over the boundary line, and located their certificates upon territory outside of the true boundary of Texas. It is to obviate the difficulties originating from this want of information that this bill has been introduced to secure the appointment of a commission to run and mark the boundary, so that the citizens of Texas may know when they are in and when out of that State.

The bill copies the boundaries from the compromise bill of 1850, beginning where the one hundredth degree of west longitude crosses Red river, running with the boundary as fixed up to 36° 30', west to the one hundred and third parallel, south to the thirty-second degree, and west to the Rio Grande. The bill, in this respect, is a copy of the boundaries as defined in the compromise measure of 1850. There is no change of boundaries proposed. The only object is to have the boundaries of Texas marked, so that our citizens may know when they are in and when out of that State.

There are other points of view in which this measure is important, outside of the points I have referred to. These boundaries separate Texas from the Indian reservation. The Government has already appointed a commission to run the boundaries of the reservation, separating it from the Chickasaw and Choctaw territories, and upon which it is proposed to locate the roving tribes of Indians in the territory of Texas, and north of Texas in the territories south of the Arkansas river. As the Government has appointed a commission to establish the boundaries of this Indian reservation, the western boundary of which is the eastern boundary of the northern part of Texas, it is desired by the State of Texas that when this boundary is run the State shall participate with the Federal Government in determining the line, so that there may be no disputes hereafter. If this bill be passed before that commission has executed its work it will prevent a second running of that line. If that commission should go on and run the boundary, and then the boundary of Texas should be defined, it will involve a double expense to the Federal Government and delay to Texas.

It is, I will repeat, a matter of great interest to Texas to have this boundary commission appointed at once. It is also a matter of concern to the Union, because it is to define the western boundary of the Indian reservation; and it is important in reference to our Indian affairs in that region that the boundary there should be established without delay.

It is not only important to settle, at an early day, these questions of boundary, but to do so will be a saving of expense; for only one commission will be necessary, when otherwise two will be demanded.

I hope gentlemen will consent to the passage of this bill. It proposes no change of boundaries. It is a literal copy, so far as the boundaries are specified, of the compromise measures of 1850.

Mr. LOVEJOY. It is to ascertain and mark the line between fixed termini.

Mr. REAGAN. That is all. It is to run and mark a boundary already fixed and defined.

Mr. LEACH. I do not rise to object to this bill, but simply to inquire whether I misunderstand the Clerk's reading of it? If I understand rightly, the bill appropriates $80,000 to defray the expenses of running these boundaries. I would ask the chairman of the committee whether anything like that amount of expense is necessary? It seems to me to be large. The committee, I have no doubt, have investigated the matter, and are prepared to give us the truth in regard to it.

Mr. REAGAN. I will make a statement, and then the chairman of the committee can answer, if he desires. I know not how far the committee have investigated this matter. I have myself made some inquiries in reference to the expense of running other boundary lines; and, from the information given me by the Department in reference to other boundary lines, I thought it proper to name this amount. It is, however, less in proportion to the length of the line than the amount appropriated for the running of other lines. I do not know that the whole amount will be necessary, but the importance of an early establishment of a line induced me to ask a sufficient appropriation to secure the running of a line.

Mr. LEACH. How long is the line?

Mr. REAGAN. Eight hundred miles.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will state, from investigations I made upon this subject, that a less amount was paid for similar services elsewhere. But only so much of this sum as will be necessary will be applied.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to say, in reply to the question propounded by the gentleman from New York, that this report was the unanimous report of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. That they investigated it, and agreed in the report?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall vote for it.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANDREW LONGABOUGH.

Mr. JEWETT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report in the case of Andrew Longabough, an applicant for an invalid pension; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID MOORE.

Mr. JEWETT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of David Moore for bounty land, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

It was so ordered.

GEORGE W. GRAVES AND OTHERS.

Mr. JEWETT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George W. Graves, Sally Walker, and Solomon Fitch, praying relief from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions in their land bounty claims, and praying that the act of March 3, 1855, and the amended act of May 14, 1856, may be extended to them; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

It was so ordered.

MARY BOYLE.

Mr. CHAFFEE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Mary Boyle; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the report and bill ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The call of committees being finished, The SPEAKER stated that reports were in order from the State of New York, and that the following resolution, offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT], was pending when the States were last called for resolutions:

Resolved, That a select committee of — be appointed by the Speaker to take into consideration all such petitions and matters relating to the construction of roads, railroads, and telegraph lines to the Pacific ocean, as shall be referred to them by the House.

And that the pending question was a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What would be the effect of reconsidering that vote?

The SPEAKER. To bring the resolution back to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is not the resolution before the House? The resolution was not laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. A reconsideration would bring the House back to the question, "Shall the resolution be laid on the table?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Would it not be in order to make that motion now?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It would be if the House refused to reconsider the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the motion to lay on the table could not be made twice while the paper is in the same legislative condition.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose it would be on a different day. If a motion were made yesterday to lay upon the table, and it failed, and the subject came up to-day, though it was in the same legislative condition, it would be in order to move again to lay it upon the table. But as the matter of the Pacific railroad and the military road have been referred, one to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the other to the select committee, and a bill introduced by the gentleman from New York, who introduced this resolution, has been introduced and sent to the Committee on Public Lands, and as the subject is now under investigation, I presume, by two standing committees and one select committee, there is no necessity for consuming the further time of the House with this matter; and therefore I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BENNETT. Is it in my power to withdraw the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

No objection being made, the resolution was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER stated that resolutions were in order from the State of New York.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT ROCHESTER.

Mr. ANDREWS introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the propriety of constructing or providing a suitable building for the use of a custom house, United States court room, and post office, in the city of Rochester, New York.

HARBOR OF PULTNEYVILLE.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill to improve the harbor of Pultneyville, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FORTIFICATIONS AT WILLET'S POINT.

Mr. HASKIN introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee, consisting of five members, be appointed for the purpose of investigating the facts and circumstances connected with the sale and purchase of a tract of land at Wilkins's or Willett's Point, in the county of Queens, in the State of New York, opposite Fort Schuyler, purchased by the Government for fortification purposes during the year 1837; and that said committee be, and are hereby, authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that resolution. I propose to debate it.

Mr. LETCHER. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York to send that matter to the Committee on Military Affairs, already organized.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I proposed to debate that resolution, and it goes over.

Mr. HASKIN. I call the previous question upon the passage of the resolution. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I proposed to debate the resolution as soon as it was introduced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor to debate it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Immediately after it was read, I arose and proposed to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York was upon the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to explain the object of the resolution.

Mr. BARKSDALE and many others objected. Mr. LETCHER. I move to strike out "a select committee," and insert "the Committee on Military Affairs."

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order, as the gentleman from New York has demanded the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I hope the amendment will be made. We shall have the whole House engaged on select committees before long.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HASKIN. I will state that we shall not want a clerk for this committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to know if this resolution contemplates the employment of a clerk or not?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 148, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Biscoe, Boyce, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Campbell, Case, Caskey, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Cornins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Darnell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Garrett, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, Hughes, Hayler, Jenkins, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Milson, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Zollcoffer—148.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, Clemens, Cox, Curry, Davidson, Dimmick, Dowdell, Florence, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Hawkins, Houston, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Landy, Miles, Moore, Phelps, Phillips, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, George Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, and Augustus R. Wright—36.

So the resolution was adopted.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. COX, when his name was called, said: I ask to be excused from voting, for this reason—I do not wish to appear in the attitude of stifling investigation of these matters; but I think that, before we raise special committees of this kind, we ought to have some data, some statements made here, on which to predicate them.

Mr. HASKIN. I will state the reason why I have moved for this committee now, if the House will allow me to do so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the resolution gives rise to debate it goes over.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. I have made this statement more for the purpose of explaining my vote than of asking to be excused. I now vote "no."

Mr. HASKIN moved that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to what I suppose to be a privileged question. I believe the morning hour has expired, and I move that we proceed to the business on the Speaker's table. There are some Senate bills and other matters there that ought to be referred.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FOSTER, and WRIGHT of Georgia, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The call of the States for resolutions, &c., was then resumed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. CORNING, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to continue the improvement of the channel of the Hudson river above and below Albany, and below Troy, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT ALBANY.

Mr. CORNING also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to construct a building for a custom-house, court-house, and post office at Albany, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CORNING also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a marine hospital at Albany, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the reenactment of certain parts of the act entitled "An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein named," approved 20th April, 1818, and which act, hereby in part reenacted, was approved March 10, 1838, and expired by its own limitation March 10, 1840; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BUFFALO MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. HATCH, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a marine hospital at Buffalo, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

APPRENTICES IN THE COMMERCIAL MARINE.

Mr. FENTON, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to require the employment of apprentices in the commercial marine of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

YONKERS A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. HASKIN, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to constitute Yonkers, New York, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARLEM RIVER.

Mr. HASKIN, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the improvement of Harlem river and Spuyten-tuyfel creek, in the county of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HELL-GATE.

Mr. HASKIN, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to remove obstructions to the navigation at Hell-Gate in the East river, opposite the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BROOKLYN POST OFFICE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for the erection of a post office in the city of Brooklyn, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SALARY OF SUPREME JUDGES.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill increasing the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CAPITOL BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to create a commission to complete the Capitol and Capitol grounds; which was read a first and second time.

He also moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. That bill appropriately belongs to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I believe the construction of the Capitol extensions is now in charge of the War Department.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to debate. If it give rise to debate, it will go over.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds have this subject, as I understand, under consideration, and are preparing a report on the extension of the grounds on different plans, covering different areas, so that the House may be able to select under what plan and to what extent the grounds shall be enlarged, and I think this subject should go to them. It is a committee which is certainly organized to investigate and look into the condition of the public buildings and grounds, and it is the committee to which this subject, as it seems to me, should properly be referred.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I have no objection to that reference, except this: the chairman of that committee told me that I had better not have the bill referred to that committee; that he was opposed to the whole thing, and should report against it. I would like to have this bill receive a fair consideration; and I want it referred to a committee which will give it a fair and proper consideration. That is my only reason for proposing that it shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds is not the proper committee to consider such a subject, we may as well abolish the committee altogether.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I will not object to its being referred to that committee.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

INVALID PENSIONERS.

Mr. FENTON introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior report to the House of Representatives the names and residence of all the invalid pensioners of the United States, who have been admitted to the roll since March 3, 1849; the time when their pensions commenced; the amount of pension per annum received by each, distinguishing each according to grade, with reference to the several acts of Congress under which said pensions were allowed.

ABOLITION OF THE POST OFFICE.

Mr. SPINNER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Post Office Department; and if they deem it inexpedient, then that they report on the propriety of repealing all the laws that restrain individuals or corporations from carrying mails or mail matter.

Mr. LETCHER moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. BEADY. I ask leave to present a memorial.

Mr. GROW. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

The motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was disagreed to.

CUSTOM-HOUSE ETC., AT TRENTON.

Mr. ROBBINS, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill making an appropriation for the purchase of a site for a custom-house, post office, and court-house, at Trenton, in the State of New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MARY C. HAMILTON.

Mr. HUYLER, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to continue the pension heretofore paid to Mary C. Hamilton, widow of Captain Fowler Hamilton, late of the United States

Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BURROUGHS asked leave to present several petitions, which he would move to refer to a select committee.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

POST OFFICE AT JERSEY CITY.

Mr. WORTENDYKE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a post office at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BURNETT moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAIR and GARTRELL were appointed.

The House refused to adjourn; the tellers having reported—ayes 25, noes 93.

CONFIRMATION OF TITLE.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill confirming the title to certain lands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FEES OF OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. PHILLIPS introduced a bill to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed to district attorneys of the United States, clerks, marshals, attorneys, and other officers of the circuit and district courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if compatible with the public interests, if our ministers and diplomatic agents have been instructed to secure, in the treaties negotiated with foreign Governments, since 1850, the right of free worship and honorable burial, to American citizens, resident in or traveling through their dominions; and what Governments have rejected these propositions, and the reasons assigned therefor.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. GROW introduced the following resolution, and demanded the previous question upon the same:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House, copies of all instructions, by himself or any head of Department, to the Government or other executive officers, in the Territory of Kansas, and all correspondence with the same, together with a copy of the executive minutes of said Territory, not already communicated to the House. Also, a copy of the constitution framed at LeCompton, together with a copy of the census and return of the votes in the election of delegates to said convention in each election precinct in said Territory, and the returns of the election held in said Territory on the 21st of December last, and 4th of January last, with the number of votes then polled respectively in each election precinct in said Territory, and copies of any other official papers in possession of the Secretary of State, relative to Kansas affairs, not already communicated to Congress.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That resolution will lie over under the rule.

Mr. HOUSTON. Under the rule it must go over one day, if objected to.

Mr. GROW. Perhaps the gentleman from Alabama does not want information in regard to Kansas affairs.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman will speak for himself, and not for me.

The SPEAKER. The 61st rule reads as follows:

"A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, or directing it to be furnished by the head of either of the Executive Departments, or by the Postmaster General, or to print an extra number of any document, or other matter, excepting messages of the President to both Houses at the commencement of each session of Congress, and the reports and documents connected with or referred to in it, shall lie on the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House; and all such propositions shall be taken up for consideration in the order they were presented, immediately after reports are called for from select committees; and when adopted, the Clerk shall cause the same to be delivered."

The resolution lies over one day.

HARBOR OF CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. HICKMAN introduced a bill for the repair and improvement of the harbor of Chester, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HANNAH STROOP.

Mr. FLORENCE introduced a bill for the relief of Hannah Stroop; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

POST OFFICE AT HARRISBURG.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of the erection of a post office building at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

PIER IN DELAWARE BAY.

Mr. WHITELEY introduced a bill for the construction of a mole or pier upon the shore of Delaware Bay, opposite the breakwater, at the town of Lewes, in the State of Delaware; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIGHT-HOUSE IN THE DELAWARE.

Mr. WHITELEY introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a light-house on one of the United States piers in the Delaware river at New Castle.

TOLL-GATES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BOWIE introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of purchasing the toll gates on the turnpike roads within the District of Columbia leading to the seat of Government, so as to make the same free within the limits of said District; and to report by bill or otherwise.

HOUSE FOR BRIDGE-KEEPER.

Mr. BOWIE introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing a lot and erecting thereon a house for the keeper of the upper Eastern Branch bridge, on the Potomac, usually known as Benning's bridge; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BOWIE asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, the petition and papers of the heirs of Gerrard Wood, copies of the same being left with the Clerk.

NEBRASKA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, presented certain papers relating to the contested-election case of Chapman against Ferguson; which were referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill recognizing the right of the officers and soldiers of the company commanded, during the late war with Great Britain, by Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia, to the benefits of the land bounty provided by existing laws for officers and soldiers of that war.

TERRITORIAL EXPENSES.

Mr. CLEMENS offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House the amounts, under the proper heads, appropriated and expended in each of the different Territories of the United States for all purposes, legislative, executive, and judicial, for roads, bridges, wells, public buildings, and so forth, and for the extinguishment of Indian and other titles, military defenses, and so forth, from the year 1845 and up to the present time, including California, before and since her admission into the Union, to the close of the last fiscal year.

Mr. CLAY moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 68, noes 61; and thereupon (at three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. F. SWENTZEL, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

ting, in pursuance of law, lists of clerks and other persons employed in that Department, other than officers of the Army, during the year 1857; which, on motion of Mr. STUART, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in pursuance of law, statements showing the contracts made under the authority of the War Department, during the year 1857; which, on motion of Mr. STUART, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with resolutions of the Senate of the 4th, 5th, and 26th of January, the annual report of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham, for the year 1857, in relation to lake harbor improvements; which, on motion of Mr. STUART, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. HARLAN presented the credentials of the Hon. JAMES W. GRIMES, chosen a Senator by the Legislature of Iowa, for six years from the 4th day of March, 1859; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at Superior, Wisconsin, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KING presented the petition of James W. Nye and other citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers only; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers only; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented thirty-six petitions of citizens of Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, praying that all entries of public lands may be confined to actual settlers, and to them only in limited quantities; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of journey-men gold-beaters of Boston, praying for an increase of the duty on gold-leaf; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received and been requested to present a memorial signed by A. Waterhouse and sundry other citizens in Maine, who allege that certain land warrants were issued to several parties whom they represent, and who, subsequent to the application for the same, and prior to the issuing, died. They ask that the law be so amended that the heirs-at-law shall be entitled to the benefit of the warrants. I commend it to the careful consideration of the Committee on Public Lands. The delay of the Department has occasioned this state of things. If there had been no delay on the part of the Government the warrants would have been issued, and would have been available by the parties for whom they were issued. The delay having been wholly on the part of the Government, and the loss having been occasioned in consequence of that delay, I hope it may receive the favorable action of the committee. Other petitions have been presented on the same subject of a similar character.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GOVERNMENT CHAPLAINCIES.

Mr. BIGLER. I am requested to present a memorial, numerous signed by citizens of Pennsylvania, by our law-makers there, by judges, preachers, and lawyers, praying Congress to take steps to reform the system of chaplaincies in the Navy and Army. The memorialists set forth that, while strenuously disapproving and opposing any union of Church and State, it has been and is the strong conviction of the American people that for our national freedom and prosperity we are mainly indebted to the principles and institutions of the Christian religion. This conviction, which has been expressed by our ablest and purest statesmen of all parties, sections, and times, they say has been recognized in our State papers and embodied in resolutions and acts of Congress too frequently and too recently to require citation.

They also represent that our Governments, State and national, have always recognized themselves as bound in simple equity and justice to make due recompense to all those engaged in their service, such recompense having respect both to the character of the service, as painful, hazardous, or long continued, and to the nature of the public servant, physical, intellectual, or moral; and thus provision is made, not only for salary, but for protection, subsistence, and, in certain cases, for special instruction and for general mental and moral culture. Thus have originated our military and naval schools, and thus, too, and as a more obvious necessity, a system of chaplaincies for the Army, for the Navy, for Congress, and for the penitentiary in the District of Columbia. These schools and chaplaincies all stand upon the same foundation of justice and propriety; they all evince the same dignified self-respect in the Government, and the same high and just appreciation of those in the employ or in the power of Government, as men with social and moral natures.

The system of chaplaincies, they say, is in fact older than our present form of Government. It was introduced by Washington himself, immediately upon his taking command of the army of the Revolution, and was maintained and cherished by Congress throughout that glorious struggle. The adoption of the Federal Constitution did not interfere with it, but on the contrary, the Administrations under that instrument, one and all, have recognized it as both national and necessary. It is evident, therefore, that the discrimination of reserved and delegated rights, and the prohibition of religious tests which are found in the Constitution, were not designed by its authors, its first expounders and ministers, to apply to the matter of chaplaincies for the public service, and that it never has been, and ought not now to be, interpreted to the prejudice of this department.

No objection, it is conceived, ought to lie against such a system on the ground of its expensiveness. In point of fact, the memorialists believe it has never exceeded in cost the annual sum of $100,000; but had it been a much larger amount, they confidently urge that such an outlay would be amply justified. When it is remembered that our soldiers and sailors are our fellow-citizens sent on our country's behalf beyond the reach of those institutions and that healthful public sentiment which are all-important to good citizenship; that they are exposed in asylums, hospitals, or garrisons to the demoralizing effects of idleness, or, in active service, to the contagious recklessness and ferocity which are incident to even the most lawful warfare; that they are thus liable to be returned to the bosom of society, disqualified for the duties and privileges of freemen—for all which the ministrations of religion are the only preventive; that often, while in active service, they are borne to distant and unwholesome climes and exposed to countless diseases and modes of death, and are thus in constant need of these teachings which nerve the heart by faith and hope; it is conceived by the memorialists that it were unworthy of a great and Christian nation to offset to a system of such uses its mere money cost. The chaplain system, properly regulated, and sustained by right-minded men, must work out such results in favor of society, as to make a liberal compensation for all the expenditures required of the Government to keep its machinery in good working order.

The memorialists further represent that the present system of Government chaplaincies is quite inadequate to the public need of such service. In the last report of the Secretary of War it is stated that the Army, as now constituted, comprises nineteen regiments, with a total of seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four men, who are distributed at one hundred and thirty-eight different posts; and the presumption is that this number of men will be speedily increased to twenty-five thousand. For these men, segregated, and necessarily deprived of all home, social, and moral influences, and for the sick, wounded, and dying among them, there are authorized but thirty teachers of religion. The Navy of the United States will, when the six war steamers now under contract are completed, comprise more than one hundred vessels, each carrying a sufficient number of men to require the presence of some member of the medical department. In these vessels, and including those who are in receiving ships, naval asylums, and navy-yards, the Government employs near nine thousand officers and men, and the number of chaplains allowed by law is twenty-four. At best, but one of our military posts in four, and but one of our national vessels in four, is provided by law with a chaplain. The actual disproportion, however, is much greater: for not more than one half of the thirty chaplains allowed to the Army are now in commission. Of the twenty-four chaplains allowed to the Navy, not more than one fourth of that number are to be found where their service is most needed, in sea-going ships. And further, as the memorialists believe, no camp or campaign chaplains are employed, there being only one or two among the troops on our Pacific coast, and not one for those serving in Kansas, Utah, and Florida.

The memorialists also represent that in the present system of Government chaplaincies are divers anomalies and defects, which well deserve attention. Chaplains, they allege, are appointed to their office without any formal and sufficient inquiry into their professional standing and qualifications; they are appointed for life, and no provision is made for retiring any who may become superannuated or otherwise disabled for the duties of their office, and thus it becomes possible that the whole number authorized by law may consist of such, to the entire prevention of religious and moral teaching to the Army and Navy; no report is required of the amount of service rendered by any chaplain; and the designation of chaplains to particular posts or vessels is made without due regard to their specific adaptation to such post or vessel.

In view of all which the memorialists pray Congress to increase the number of chaplains authorized for the Army and for the Navy, upon the principle that a Christian Government should furnish adequate religious instruction to those who, in Government service, are deprived of it; to require that no person shall be eligible to the office of chaplain, who shall not produce formal and official testimonials of his good religious and ecclesiastical standing, and of his qualifications for the special duties of the office; to make no more life appointments to the chaplaincy of either Army or Navy; retire upon a reasonable salary such chaplains now in commission as may be by reason of age or infirmity disabled from effective service; to require of all chaplains to either Army or Navy, stated reports of the services rendered, together with statistical and other information connected therewith, and that an abstract of the whole may accompany the President's message; and to designate chaplains to particular posts or vessels, with due regard to the matter of their adaptedness to such posts or vessels, and to secure to each chaplain so designated all proper facilities for the stated religious instructions of the men, and for the conduct of Divine worship among them.

The memorial is an interesting one, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of N. C. Haywood on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was Ordered, That the heirs of John Ireland have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That George Townley and John Denman have leave to withdraw their petitions and papers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 152) to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between the Territories of the United States and the State of Texas, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 41.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Edward D. Reynolds, praying compensation for making certain disbursements, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 132) for the relief of Edward D. Reynolds.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

REPORTERS' GALLERY.

Mr. FOOT. I ask for the consideration of the following order:

Ordered, That the Committee on the Library consider and report a plan for the admission and accommodation of reporters in the eastern gallery, other than the reporters of the Congressional Globe.

I understand that there is no authoritative provision over this subject at the present time. It was formerly under the control of the Presiding Officer of the Senate. That rule, however, at the last general change of our rules, was omitted. It is very desirable that it should be placed under the control of some authority; and it strikes me that a committee of this body should constitute the authority to regulate this subject. For the Presiding Officer it would be a delicate and sometimes a disagreeable duty to perform. If it be assigned to a committee of the body, it relieves the Presiding Officer from that duty. I think the Presiding Officer, at the present time, has been consulted in reference to this matter; and I presume there will be no objection to the adoption of the order.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope the resolution will lie over. I object to its consideration. I do not think there ought to be any such people in the galleries at all. It is a very great nuisance.

The resolution lies over under the rule.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to offer two resolutions of inquiry; and I ask that they may be considered at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object to them, and move to take up the resolutions I have endeavored to bring up for several days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Resolutions cannot be offered, as petitions are still in order.

Mr. GWIN. Can I not offer resolutions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolutions may be read.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must interpose again, and call for the regular order of business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois insists on the regular order, which is reports from standing committees, there being no other petitions; which, under the rules, the Chair must call for specially. Reports from committees are still in order.

Mr. GWIN. What follows then?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Resolutions and motions after the reports of committees, unless some special order should intervene.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There being no further reports, I move to take up the resolution which I offered.

Mr. GWIN. I believe I had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further reports from committees, the Chair will feel himself bound to recognize the Senator from California.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further reports, the Secretary will read the first resolution offered by the Senator from California.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War furnish the Senate a copy of the military topographical memoir, report, and maps of the military department of the Pacific, by Captain T. J. Cram, of the corps of topographical engineers.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will explain the nature of that report.

Mr. STUART. I object to its consideration. The resolution, therefore, lies over, under the rule.

Mr. GWIN. I have another resolution, to which I hope there will be no objection:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to increase the facilities for refining gold for coinage in the branch mint at San Francisco.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let that resolution lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It lies over, being objected to.

KANSAS LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now interpose my motion to take up the resolutions to which I have referred.

Mr. DAVIS. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet. The Chair will call it, when the hour arrives.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very unwilling to seem to antagonize with the wishes of the Senate on a matter of this kind; but it does seem to me the application I make is a reasonable one. I am called upon as a member of this body, and as a member of the Committee on Territories, to which the message of the President, with the Kansas constitution, have been referred, to report on those documents. The President has given, in the message referred to, many facts, and those facts it is important for us to investigate. We cannot report intelligently upon the matters referred to us unless those facts shall come before us.

Mr. TOOMBS. Will the honorable Senator from Illinois allow me to say a word? If this resolution be only directed to the President, I do not see that there need be any speeches about it, if it calls for information. If it does, I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is the point. If I can have a vote on it I will yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I suppose these resolutions are the unfinished business, and take priority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are not the unfinished business. The special order is the unfinished business, and comes up at the head of all the other orders under the rule.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move to postpone the special order, for the purpose of taking up these resolutions.

Mr. DAVIS. On that I hope we shall have the yeas and nays. There was an understanding yesterday that we were to proceed with the bill which is the special order until we finish it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not wish to antagonize with the Army bill. I do not wish to postpone it. I have refrained from calling up any other subject to its exclusion; I was willing to give the reference of the President's message the priority over all other measures, and then to consider the Army bill as the unfinished business, and when that should be disposed of, I desired to call up the Minnesota bill. This is a part of the reference of the President's message; it is necessary for a consideration of that subject. The reason we gave priority to the reference of the President's message was, that it was important to give the committee an opportunity to report upon it. If that report is not to be hurried until we can get this information, I should be willing to let the resolutions lie over until the Army bill be acted on; but if I am to be required to act and to vote on that message, and at the same time to be deprived of the opportunity of procuring the facts necessary to an elucidation of the subject, it places me in a position in which I think no Senator should be placed.

For instance, in reading over the constitution of Kansas this morning, I find that in fixing the apportionment, a certain number of representatives is awarded to Johnson county—four representatives; and I find allowed to the adjoining county of Shawnee only two representatives. I am informed that by the census taken under the law which called the convention, Shawnee county showed a larger population than Johnson, and yet the county with the largest population is to have one half the representation of the other. I am informed that this extra representation of Johnson county is founded on fraudulent votes polled at Oxford precinct under fictitious or spurious returns. I desire to know whether these things are true, and whether—

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a point of order, whether it is proper to go on with the debate on the propriety of considering a resolution at a time when a special order is pending?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am only giving reasons why these resolutions should be taken up at this time. I am only pursuing what has been the practice of the Senate. I will confine my remarks strictly to the motion to take up, and propose to show why the resolutions should not only be taken up, but taken up now, to the exclusion of other business. I do not intend to go into the discussion of the merits of the Kansas question; I do not intend to say a word on the merits of the constitution of Kansas, or of the President's message, but simply to give the reasons why the resolutions should now be taken up; and I shall do so as briefly as I can.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels obliged to express an opinion on the point of order which has been raised. The Chair supposes that short remarks of explanation would be proper; but from the very nature of the case and the nature of the question, it occurs to him that an extended discussion would be out of order when there is a special order, and a motion made to postpone it with a view to take up other business. It would defeat the very object and purpose of setting special orders, if extended discussion should be had on the merits of the business which it is proposed to take up to their exclusion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not propose to make any extended remarks. I do not propose to do anything which the Senate during the whole period I have had a seat here, has not sanctioned. I intend to be brief. I have seen a discussion on taking up a subject run two days here, under the sanction of the Senate, because there were no means of stopping it. I have seen it held here, that a motion to postpone one subject and take up another, opened the merits of both questions as a matter of parliamentary law—not only the merits of the question to be postponed, but the merits of the question to be taken up; but I do not propose to do any such thing. Because that has been held to be the parliamentary law, and has been the practice here, an honorable Senator only a few days ago brought in a resolution to change the rule, so that there should not be debate on the priority of business. The evil of general lengthy debates upon a motion to postpone one subject and take up another, has been felt and is conceded; but the right of discussion, I apprehend, is beyond dispute.

But I do not wish to discuss the merits of the question. I was only showing the importance of obtaining the information for which the resolutions call; and on one point embraced in the call, I stated that I was informed there is a representation provided for in the Lecompton constitution which will secure permanently to the minority of the people of Kansas the control of the Legislature. I am informed that the evidence of that fact will be furnished, if the information for which I call can be had. I have instanced the two counties of Johnson and Shawnee as an illustration. Shawnee, I am informed, as shown by the census had a larger number of legal votes returned than Johnson, and yet in this constitution twice the number of representatives and twice the number of Senators are awarded to Johnson county that are awarded to Shawnee; and I am told the excuse for thus awarding double representation to Johnson county is predicated on the fraudulent returns at the Oxford precinct.

If that be true with regard to Johnson county, if it be true in regard to the whole apportionment, is it not important that the facts should be brought before the Senate in order to ascertain how the matter stands? I do not allege this to be so; I am informed that it is so; I believe it is so. The production of the facts will settle the question. If I have been misinformed, let it be shown; and when these facts come I shall correct any misapprehension under which I may have labored on this subject. If it be true, that great truth ought to be known, because it is an evidence of fraud running through this constitution—planned, meditated, contemplated fraud, intended to run into the operations of the Legislature under the constitution in all time to come. I am unwilling to believe that such a fraud was contemplated; but I wish to know the facts.

So it is in regard to other questions. We are told by the President that if this constitution shall be adopted, and Kansas admitted into the Union with it, the people there can change it any time. How are they to change it if the apportionment in the constitution is a fraudulent one, arranged for the purpose of enabling the minority to overrule the majority?

Again, with a view to that very point, I desire to know the results of the election of the 4th of January for officers. There is a rumor here that the Lecompton ticket was elected—

Mr. MASON. I rise to a question of order. It may be perfectly competent for the honorable Senator to assign reasons why, in the order of business, his resolutions should take precedence of the Army bill; but it cannot be in order for him to assign reasons why those resolutions should pass, for the purpose of enabling his committee to have the information. These remarks would be properly in order, I conceive, if the resolutions were up; but I rise to the question of order, because if the debate is gone into in the manner now indicated by the honorable Senator, there must be a reply to him, and the result will be to postpone, without consulting the Senate, the unfinished business relating to the Army bill. I say, therefore, with all respect for the Senator, and submit it to the Chair, that it is not in order to discuss the merits of his resolutions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not desire to discuss the merits of the resolutions, and I propose to keep myself even within the rule assigned by the Senator from Virginia. Although I conceive that under the universal practice of the Senate for all the years I have been here, I have a right to discuss the merits of the proposition, yet I do not propose to do it. I will tell you what I propose to do: first, I want to show that this information is material to the investigation; and, being material, it is important to have it now, for the reason that instant action is asked. If I sustain both these propositions, they prove that we ought to take steps now to get the information, for it cannot be disguised that there seems to be great anxiety to act immediately on the merits of the Kansas question. If I should attempt to procure delay, it would be said that I was endeavoring to thwart the wishes of the Senate by an opposition producing unnecessary delay. I wish to produce no unnecessary delay. I wish to hasten the report on the Kansas question, and to get it at the earliest possible moment; but when I say that I believe this information is essential, when I give reasons why I cannot make a report intelligently on its merits without this information, and then when I show that we must have it now or it will be too late—these are all reasons why the matter should be acted on at this time, in preference to the Army bill. I might take up that bill and show that it makes no great difference whether the Army bill be passed this week or the next, to-day or to-morrow; but it is very essential to have this information, if I am to be called on to vote and act on the Kansas question before the Army bill is disposed of. Hence I was going on to say that it was important to know to whom the certificates of election have been awarded on the ticket elected for State officers and the Legislature, on the 4th of January.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, I must say that this is an argument on the merits of his resolutions, and upon the action which the committee are to take—not upon the priority of business; and that if he goes into this wide field of rumor which has spread itself over every subject which has been raised in the Senate for some weeks past, it is apparent that such statements as he is now making must elicit reply, and thus we defeat the agreement of the Senate to take up the unfinished business, and settle it to-day.

Mr. TOOMBS. Let the Chair decide the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it is insisted upon, the Chair must give his impression in relation to the point of order. In regard to the usage of the Senate on these questions, the Chair of course has no knowledge except as to this session, where the usage has been to some extent as intimated by the Senator from Illinois. It has been proceeding, by a sort of common consent, up to this time in the session, and no points of order have been made. The Chair supposes that in deciding questions of order he should be governed by the written rules, and, where they do not apply, by the general parliamentary law. It is perfectly certain that when the Senate has assigned a particular question for a particular time, it is a privileged question at that time; and if a motion is made to postpone it, debate ought not to be indulged in; but a mere suggestion, a mere remark might be made. Otherwise there is no limit to the length of speeches that may be made, and the object of the Senate may be utterly defeated. The opinion of the Chair, although it is a very delicate question for him to decide, is that the line of remark in which the Senator from Illinois is indulging is not pertinent to the motion to postpone, and must necessarily lead to extended debate on the merits of the question, and defeat the previous order of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Chair inform me what line of remark I may indulge in on the motion to take up, or whether he decides that no debate, no explanation of reasons for giving priority to particular business can be assigned? I intend to keep strictly within the rules of the Senate, and to act and speak with entire respect to the Presiding Officer, and to every member of the body; but I wish to know what the rules are, and have them applied to me as they have been and shall be applied hereafter to every member of the body.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me, I will state in entire frankness—

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was asking the Chair—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say to the Senator, in entire kindness, that, in making this question of order, I was actuated by no disposition to cut off any remarks which he may, at any time, think it necessary to make. It was with no disposition to violate the courtesy of the body; and courtesy has been, during my knowledge of the Senate its rule. It has had little need of printed rules; the rules that govern gentlemen in ordinary intercourse have been sufficient for the body; and, therefore, it is that by consent one thing is done to-day, and it is repeated to-morrow. As the Senator asserts, this may grow into precedent; but when in the progress of the business of the Senate it becomes necessary to insist on parliamentary rules they are as practicable here as elsewhere; and a debate springing up on a mere question of the priority of business, and running into the merits of the whole subject proposed to be taken up—going into the illimitable field of rumor—it is apparent defeats the order of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not intend to say that the Senator from Mississippi was discourteous in interposing his objection. On the contrary, it is his duty, as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to maintain the priority of the bill in his charge, if he can do so consistently with the rules. I feel it to be my duty, if I can, to obtain this information, which I believe is essential in the performance of the trust confided to me. I must do what I can, within the rules, fairly and properly to get the information. Since the Chair decides that the line of remark in which I was indulging was not authorized by the rules, I shall endeavor to ascertain whether the decision cuts off all debate on the priority of business. If the Chair so decides, I shall conform to it, although I shall have to say that it is reversing, so far as I understand it, the decision of this body uniformly made for the entire eleven years that I have been a member of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Chair is satisfied in regard to the practice of the Senate, he will pursue that practice without regard even to general parliamentary law or his own opinion on questions of order. He desires to conform himself to the usages of this body. His only difficulty, heretofore, has been to understand what those usages have been from the conflicting statements of gentlemen.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The point I now wish to know is, whether I may assign reasons for taking up this subject and giving it priority over the Army bill, or whether I am not to give any reasons. I shall conform, if I can find out what the rule is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Questions of relevancy are uncertain, and the most difficult of all to decide. The Chair cannot draw a precise line; but he can say to the Senator that upon a question of laying aside one piece of business to take up another, it does seem to him to be out of order to pursue a line of discussion, even although it may appear to bear on the issue, which must necessarily lead to extended debate, which may even lead to a long speech on the part of the Senator himself, and defeat the object which the Senate had in making a particular piece of business the special order. He cannot be more explicit.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well; I have yet to ascertain whether the Chair decides that a motion in reference to the priority of business is debatable or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think it is properly debatable. He thinks that here, as in every deliberative body, suggestions may be made in reference to it, as, on motions to lie on the table, by common consent suggestions are indulged.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Are those suggestions made as matter of right, or matter of courtesy?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are matter of courtesy and custom, so common and universal as to amount to a right—suggestions or remarks that do not lead to discussion in reference to the order of business. The Chair can only say that the impression on his mind is that the Senator's remarks open up a general discussion of the question, will lead to debate, and therefore are not pertinent to this question in reference to the priority of business.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I waive those remarks; and now I will state to the Chair what I propose to show, without making an argument, that I may know whether or not it comes within the rules. The President of the United States has referred, in his message, to the fact that the Legislature elected on the 4th of January, could call a convention to change a constitution immediately. I desire to find out who were elected members of the Legislature on that day. I desire to ascertain whether it be true that a Legislature has been declared elected, sixteen of whose members depended on a forged return from Delaware Crossing; or whether it be true that the president of the convention has gone behind that fraudulent return, and set it aside because it was fraudulent, and declared the other side elected. I desire to find out who was declared elected; because, if one ticket was elected, that answers the President's argument; and it is sustained if the other was elected. I want to know, therefore, how the fact is upon that point.

I want to know also the facts as to the election on the 4th of January, not only for State officers and members of the Legislature, but also as to the adoption of the constitution. I hold that that election was a legal one, and I wish the facts on that point. I want the returns. I wish also to have the census which was taken under the law calling the Lecompton convention, showing the number of votes in each county, so that we may see whether in any one county, or in quite a number of counties, twice or three times as many votes have been cast as there were voters on the register. I want to see whether the apportionment on representation, made by the Lecompton convention, is based on population. All these matters are said in the message to be fair, and the assertion is that all these proceedings were conducted fairly. I want the facts. I am told the facts disprove the assertion that they were fair.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator state where he wants them?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I want them as a member of the Senate, and as a member of the Committee on Territories. I do not think the information can hurt anybody.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, if the Senator wants them as a member of the committee, this is not the place to argue the matter. If he wants them to decide any question which has been referred to the committee, surely no question has yet been referred which involves the legality, the validity, the fairness of any election under the State constitution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly, a question has been referred that involves the legality of that constitution; because its validity, as I am prepared to show, depends on the vote of the 4th of January, so far as it may be considered an embodiment of the popular will. I wish copies of the laws, I wish the census under them, I wish the votes at the elections, for the purpose of ascertaining the fact whether this constitution is the act of the people of Kansas, or whether it is repudiated legally according to the forms of law by the people of Kansas. I believe that the facts for which I call will prove that the people of Kansas, according to the forms of law, at a legal election, have repudiated, and declared null and void, this constitution. If it be true that at an election authorized by law, an election legal in its results, this constitution has been rejected by ten thousand majority, then I think it is proper that we should have the opportunity of knowing it. There is a great variety of facts for which the resolutions call that I deem important and essential. If the information I have received about these enormous frauds is not true, the friends of this measure ought to desire the information in order to show that it is not true.

Mr. MASON. I respectfully submit to the Chair that one of two things must be done: either the honorable Senator must be curtailed in his course of remark, or the whole question be thrown open to debate, (and I need not predict that the debate will last many days,) because he is going now into the merits of the resolutions which he has offered. On a question of priority of business, he assigns reasons why he wants the information that the resolutions call for. He assigns no reason why it is important that that information should be obtained now as a question of priority over the unfinished business of yesterday; being the Army bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will give that reason now.

Mr. MASON. But I mean to say this: I ask that the decision of the Chair may be enforced, or that it may be understood that the whole debate shall be gone into.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is entirely unnecessary to ask that the decision of the Chair shall be enforced, for I shall yield, voluntarily and cheerfully, obedience to it the moment it is announced. When the Chair decided some time ago that the line of argument I was then pursuing was not quite justified by the rules, I waived it. When I asked the question whether I could give reasons for taking up the resolutions, the Chair did not understand that I could give none, but he said I must not be too lengthy and must not wander from the question. I then proceeded to show what were my reasons, keeping within the line indicated by the Chair. The Senator from Virginia is under the impression that I have shown the importance of this information, but have not shown why it should now be had in preference to considering the Army bill. On that point I will say there is no great necessity for the Army bill, to-day or to-morrow; it makes no difference whether it be passed this week or next week. This information I must have now, or it will be too late, or I shall be held responsible for postponing the Kansas question. If the Senator from Virginia, or those with whom he acts, will assure me that the Kansas question shall not be pressed upon me until I get this information, I will withdraw my motion now, and agree to go on with the Army bill.

Mr. MASON. I can only say, in regard to that, that being perfectly satisfied that the information for which the Senator calls, if it could be had, would lead to no results which ought to affect the question submitted to the committee, these resolutions shall never pass by any aid of mine, or by my vote. In my view, if the information could be had for which the resolutions call, it is not information which the Committee on Territories ought to act upon, in its deliberation on the admission of the State of Kansas. It belongs to the people of Kansas and the State of Kansas, but not to Congress.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is frank in avowing that his objection to my motion results from his opposition to this call for information, and not from his anxiety to have the Army bill passed. He is perfectly frank. I am glad of it.

If it is the determination of the Senate that this information shall be smothered, that no means of acquiring it shall be given, you may as well say so at once. If the Senate is determined that I shall not investigate the fact whether the apportionment in the Lecompton constitution is based on fraudulent votes or on actual population, then it will do right in voting down my resolutions. The objection of the Senator from Virginia is to the resolutions at any time, not to postponing the Army bill.

Mr. MASON. Both.

Mr. DOUGLAS. One good reason is always sufficient, without adding another; but I have no objection to taking it that way. I submitted the resolutions calling for this information last Thursday. They were then, by a side motion, postponed and got rid of. I have asked for their consideration on each day since that, when the Senate has been in session. Deeming it essential to have it, believing that it will expose fraud that affects not only the election, but fraud in the making of the constitution—fraud in the apportionment for the Legislature under the constitution—fraud which hereafter is intended to secure the power of the Legislature in the hands of a minority in opposition to a majority—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois will pardon the Chair—

Mr. MASON. If debate is gone into, there must be reply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will pardon the Chair for a moment. The Chair is very clear, with great respect to the Senator from Illinois, that his remarks are not in order upon a question of the priority of business. The Chair will hear any suggestion, according to the sense of the Senate, that the Senator may make, why these resolutions should be taken up now to the exclusion of the special order; but the Chair does think the remarks of the Senator are not in order. We must have an established order of business; and this is subversive of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My respect for the Chair and for the body restrains me from pressing a statement of my reasons any further. I will now ask a vote by the yeas and nays on the question of postponing the Army bill, and taking up these resolutions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS. Before proceeding with the call of the roll, I wish merely to state that the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foor,] acquires additional importance at this time, from the fact which has been exhibited, that a Senator has sought to postpone the consideration of a subject which was continued from yesterday, by the consent of the Senate, to be entered upon at a certain period to-day, and finished at a certain hour; and I do hope that the Senate will now redeem its obligation to the unfinished business.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Crittenden, Davis, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sillwell, Toombs, and Wright—24.

So the motion was not agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Toombs to strike out the first section, in the following words:

"That there shall be added to each of the regiments of dragoons, cavalry, infantry, and of mounted riflemen, two companies, to be organized in the same manner as the companies now composing these arms respectively, and to receive the same pay and allowances, and to be entitled to the same provisions and benefits in every respect, as are authorized by the existing laws; they shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and the enlisted men are to be recruited in the same manner as other troops, with the same conditions and limitations."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to detain the Senate from taking the vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia. I did propose, and I do still propose, to say a few words in favor of the amendment which I have intimated that I intend to offer, but I shall waive that for the present; I shall wait until the vote has been taken on the motion of the Senator from Georgia to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I have been far more willing to listen than to take any part in the debate which has gone on so far upon this bill; but I do not feel at liberty to give my vote on the motion offered by the Senator from Georgia, without a word of explanation, and of explanation only.

There are none, I apprehend, in the Senate, who are more disinclined to increase the public force of the country further than is absolutely necessary for the public service than I am, whether it be in the Army or in the Navy. But whatever opportunities other Senators may have, I confess that my means of knowing what the necessities of the public service are in reference to the use of the public force are very limited, and I am obliged to rely, to a very great extent, on the information given to me from that Department which is particularly charged with that subject—I mean the executive department. I do not advert to any blind reliance on the Executive, or any undue confidence in the executive department, with its present or any other head. I give them the confidence that must be due from one branch of the Government to the other; but I know that from our recent very large acquisitions of territory, it would seem to have become the more necessary to enlarge the Army, chiefly for the purpose of protecting our people on the frontiers, or of protecting our people who are in transitu between the Atlantic and the Pacific States. I know, too, (and it has been disclosed here more than once,) that the great expenditure of the Army arises from the staff department, chiefly the quartermaster's department. The great source of expenditure in the Army is the expense of transportation, not of troops only, but of the supplies necessary for those troops. I know it has been the great labor of my honorable colleague, [Mr. Hunter,] who is charged more particularly with the finances of the country in the Senate, as far as practicable to cut down those expenditures; and yet he has found it impossible, because of the necessarily dispersed condition of our Army over the immense territory which they are called upon to pervade.

I was very much struck, in this connection, with a remark which fell from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, (than whom none is more competent to give information to the Senate on all subjects connected with the military department,) that when the Army was small, and it was found necessary to transport them on sudden emergencies from one to another very distant point, great expense must be incurred in that transfer, and the transportation which accompanies it, which might have been avoided, or to a great extent curtailed, if the materiel of the Army were large enough to increase the number of military posts on the frontier. Now if it be true, (and I know it is true,) that the very great expense of the Army is in the transportation, in the quartermaster's department, it might be economy to increase the number of men in order to increase the number of military posts. It does not follow that because we raise our Army from fifteen to twenty or twenty-five thousand men, we thereby increase the expenditure; for it may result that by confining it to the smaller number of men, a larger expenditure is required in order to make a proper disposition of it. I should be very much gratified if it would be in my power to interpose a vote here which would prevent an increase of the Army, even to the amount contemplated by the Committee on Military Affairs; and I would do it, if I could confide in my judgment rather than in that of those who have an opportunity of surveying a field which is not open to me. I shall therefore vote against the proposition of the Senator from Georgia, and, so far as my vote goes, sustain the project of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS. The proposition before the Senate is to strike out that section of the bill which provides for adding two companies to certain regiments of the Army, being those regiments which now have but ten companies. I hope the Senate will decide to retain that section, for a few reasons which I will offer at this time.

I think the organization, as I stated on a former occasion, will be more complete, because it will give regiments divisible into three battalions of four companies each. It will give the power to divide regiments without dividing battalions so as to garrison three posts by each regiment, or, if you please, six posts, without reducing any post to a single company. I will here say to Senators as a military question, that it is a very great disadvantage to troops to separate them into garrisons consisting of a single company, and that that disadvantage is not to be overcome by multiplying the rank and file. You must have the number of officers to perform the duties that devolve on commissioned officers, and cannot be intrusted to anybody else. To maintain discipline and to perform the duty in a responsible manner, you require at least the number of officers that will be afforded by two companies. You cannot, therefore, double the size of a company without injury to the public service, relying on one company to constitute a garrison instead of two.

That is one reason. Another is, that by increasing the number of companies, you give that advantage which the Senator from Texas [Mr. Houston] has illustrated as his opinion of the present defect in the Army—the want of an opportunity of promotion and inducement to the rank and file. These additional companies not only increase the number of non-commissioned, but also the number of commissioned officers. They give an opportunity to worthy men, who enter the ranks of the Army by enlistment, to rise to the grade of commissioned officers. They give a nucleus on which, in time of war, you can aggregate the raw material of recruits, and increase the power of the standing Army of the United States.

Here I would say to the Senator from Texas, that he was egregiously mistaken in his argument that a law had grown up of usage, which, for the benefit of the graduates of the Military Academy, now excluded the rank and file from promotion in the Army. He said it was not now as it was in the war of 1812. I wish to correct that error; for, in the wisdom of Congress, upon the recommendation of so humble an individual as myself, the two Houses, not long since, adopted a provision, for the first time in this Government, which made it quite easy for the Administration to provide for the certain promotion of a non-commissioned officer who proved himself worthy. For the first time, I say, since the organization of our Army, the last Congress did provide for conferring brevets on non-commissioned officers, and thus made them certain of promotion, though the graduates of the Military Academy should be equal to all the vacancies which should occur within the year. The Senator, I say, therefore, was egregiously mistaken in assuming that the door to promotion had been closed against the rank and file of the Army. It has been opened, sir.

Another Senator, (the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] I think it was,) asserted that, for a great number of years, no such promotions had occurred. There the mistake was equally great; such promotions have been made from time to time.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is mistaken; I expressed no opinion on that point.

Mr. DAVIS. It was not the Senator from Georgia, but somebody else; but as I am making points, not on individuals, but on the merits of the question, it makes no difference who it was. Very probably it was the Senator from Texas; but I say, whoever it was, it is equally erroneous, because such promotions have been made by brevet, to await vacancies. Promotions of that kind have been made by nominations to the Senate, and confirmations by the Senate. Sergeants were raised to the grade of commissioned officers in the new regiments that were provided for three years ago; and never before, in the history of the Army since I have known it, has the rank and file had so wide and open a door to enter into the grade of commissioned officers as now. This is but widening that door which admits the rank and file to rise to the grade of commissioned officers. It is but increasing the number of commissioned officers who will serve in detached posts, thus relieving them from the danger and the toil of a responsibility which they cannot probably meet, if reduced to the small number of two or three, to perform, not only their regular duties, but all the staff duties of a garrison at a frontier post.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate, if they think that the addition of the thirty companies and the increase of the maximum of the strength of each company to ninety-six, will give more troops than are required, will prefer rather to keep down the maximum, as it is now, to seventy-four, and give the additional companies, because I believe it will create a more effective force than increasing the maximum of the rank and file of the Army, that maximum being a need which is rather upon paper than in the field. It is merely the mode by which you will fill up a company to a strength from which it will waste away on a distant campaign or at a distant post. It will have really but very little effect, on account of the power of the War Department to send out unattached recruits, and thus bring them to the distant posts at a time when the company has been wasted below the maximum of seventy-four.

If, then, the purpose of the Senate be to limit the size of the Army to any certain standard, I appeal to them that they shall, in consideration of the great interest which is involved, strike from the bill the second section, taking the numerical strength away which that would confer, and leave the first section, which perfects our system and enables us to occupy the great number of posts we now have with our small Army, without reducing the number of commissioned officers at each post below that which will enable them efficiently to perform every duty.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have desired, sir, to say something, not much, on this subject. I am apprehensive that this recommendation of the President has not received that sober and direct consideration to which it is entitled. The debate has been principally occupied with stating objections to standing armies, objections to an increase of our Army because of the emptiness of our Treasury, objections to it because of the apprehended misuse of it which the Executive may make, and other reasons of this sort. But, with the President, it seems to me, that if all these objections be admitted, (and many of them are well founded objections to standing armies,) still the question comes up, whether the proposed or any increase of the Army of the United States is necessary for the public service, or would be useful for the public service? That is the question. If it would be so, we ought to grant that increase, although we admit every objection and every danger that is attendant on the measure.

It is said we ought to be jealous of standing armies. So we ought. I honor the sentiment, and concur in it. It is said we ought to be regardless of the condition of the Treasury. So we ought; and its present condition demands our serious consideration in every question of expenditure. It is said that the President of the United States may make an ill use of this increased military power which you are giving him by increasing the Army. It may be so. There is no power granted to the President that he may not abuse; but there is no power that he can abuse with less probable success than the command of such an army as we now have. What can he do with it? Is it a standing army within the compass of that wise jealousy which we have been warned to entertain against standing armies? This warning is said to be hereditary to us, impressed on our minds by the teaching of our forefathers. Be it so; but while they warned us against standing armies, they meant such standing armies as were useless in time of peace. Notwithstanding all their teachings, they knew and recognized the absolute necessity that every Government like this should maintain some permanent military force. That did not contradict their warning, in the proper sense of the term, against standing armies. The necessity of preserving a force of this sort was always recognized by them when this Government was poorest and weakest, and least able to maintain an army.

The only question for us now really is to decide whether the proposed increase is one required by the public service, or will contribute to the promotion of the public interests. That is the question. If it be, we must encounter the expense. If it be, we must hazard the danger of the abuse of this increased military power by the Executive. We must always do it. Every power you grant him is liable to abuse, but none so little liable as the command of twenty thousand men in this country. He cannot use this power to any great extent to the detriment of the public. All his misuse of that power must be open, and flagrant, and notorious. The public will be warned of that, and that warning will be enough to divert any danger that it might occasion. There are other powers of the Executive more liable to objection on this ground. His power of patronage is susceptible of a much wider range of injurious and corrupting and dangerous influence, than any which he can derive from the command of such an army as ours, even when it shall be increased as proposed. That patronage in its influence may work secretly and privately; the public cannot see it; the public are not permitted to hear it. It works its dangerous and winding way in secrecy and darkness. You do not take away that power from him because it may be abused; but this other power which it is said he may abuse, the command of a military force, cannot be made use of to any improper or injurious purpose, without its becoming open and notorious to the public. The fring of his cannon will be heard all round about, and the country will be put on its guard and warned to inquire what is this for, and why is it, and what law warrants it.

The question is plainly one of military calculation. What army is necessary to perform the great military police duty of this country? We have had a standing Army, if you please to call it so, for this purpose from the origin of the Government. The only increase which I contemplate voting for would raise your Army to an amount not exceeding twenty thousand men. Is that too much? Let gentlemen decide. My knowledge of the particular services and exigencies of this great and wide country is not sufficient to enable me to determine, with any sort of precision, what is the force that is necessary. I know that, according to all experience and my own convictions, some force is necessary. That has been admitted by all. How much, exactly, is a subject, I presume, not capable of exact or mathematical definition. You cannot define exactly the amount of force that is necessary, but we can look around our country; we can see generally the duties that this Army has to perform, and determine in some general way, each one for himself. But it is the business of the executive department of the Government, who manage this military force, who direct all its exertions, and place it wherever danger, or safety, or the public interest requires it, all over this country, to know and to make a calculation approximating, at least, to certainty as to the amount of force that is necessary. I cannot tell. I know we have a vast boundary. I know it comprehends many savage tribes who are necessary to be restrained for the protection of the rural and domestic people of the country. We have garrisons to maintain and man. We may have insurrections to suppress, though I throw them out of the calculation; they cannot amount to much. I throw out of the calculation any imaginary necessity for the use of the military force in Kansas. I cannot, however, altogether throw out of view the necessity there may be for troops to be sent to Utah, because that is a step the Executive has already taken; and we have there in those mountains now, surrounded by snows and threatened by enemies and rebels, some fifteen or sixteen hundred of our countrymen, sent there by the orders of the Government. This must have some consideration here.

All these things considered, can we say with assurance and satisfaction to ourselves that less than twenty thousand is an ample number? If I could say that less than that number was adequate, or the present Army in the service of the United States was sufficient, I would not vote for an additional man. It is not because a President has asked an increase, or a Secretary has asked an increase, that I would register their opinions as laws, simply because it is their wish and their judgment that it should be. It must have the corroboration of my judgment. Certainly, I think that, in legislating on this subject, a proper degree of deference, and a proper degree of respect ought to be paid to the opinions and judgments of the War Department, not because of any influence they are entitled to have over our judgment, but because, if they do their duty, they ought to know better, and be better informed than we are of the public necessities on this subject, and of the public force that is actually required to do the people's business, so far as that is involved in the military affairs of the country. That is my idea. I give them that respect, and no more. The President urges it; the Secretary of War urges it; the general commanding the Army urges it, a higher authority with me on such a question than any other; but I only admit that as an authority because it is an opinion on a subject that ought to be known to the individual who gives the opinion; he should be well acquainted with it, and I am not.

I think, therefore, that we ought to be very well assured that some increase is necessary; but how shall we give it? It is with great reluctance and diffidence, in my judgment, that I differ with my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Davis] on this point. Knowing his military experience and character, and his general ability, I differ from him with great caution; but I wish to make this increase as little expensive to the Government as possible. I should think that the little increase that may be necessary may be fully accomplished by leaving it to the discretion of the President, whenever he deems it necessary and proper for the public service, to increase the privates of every company now in the Army to ninety-six, on his responsibility. I think there can be no objection to that. The authority, if executed to the utmost, would give him an additional number of about four thousand three hundred men. There would be no additional expense for officers. It would be merely an increase of privates by adding to the number in each company now in the Army. I am willing to do that; and then the President should say not, that the public service has been neglected or done amiss because Congress would not give the necessary force. Here you have put at your discretion a body of four thousand three hundred men, to be added to the Army whenever you shall think the public service demands it. I am willing to vote that; that is the second section of the bill; and when the bill shall be (as it may easily be by a little change or transformation of its language) reduced to that, I am willing to vote for it. That is all the increase my judgment can be made to approve of; and in adding that I do it not so much because I perceive the necessity for it, as because to that extent I am not willing to oppose my own judgment to the judgment of those whom I acknowledge ought to be better acquainted with the subject than I am.

Much has been said on this subject that goes altogether beyond the scope of the bill which is presented to us. My old friend from Texas [Mr. Houston] has taken the widest range. His views are usually of a very catholic and general kind. He is opposed, I believe, to the whole standing Army; and he thinks the military genius of the country would be better promoted and more excited by appealing, whenever public service of a military character is necessary, to the militia or volunteers—appealing to the courage and to the genius of the country. That seems to be the gentleman's great object—to patronize and encourage the general genius of the people. If I understand him, he would also be willing to see abolished the Military Academy at West Point. In both these particulars I differ with great diffidence from him on military subjects, because he is a veteran and a warrior; but I find these peculiarities in his opinions naturally resulting from the condition and circumstances of his life. He has fought his battles; he has won his victories; he has won his laurels, fighting with militia and volunteers. He has been associated and identified with them in the whole long career of his distinguished military exploits. This gives a bias to his mind.

But, sir, all experience has determined, as I before said, that, while we have an everlasting and all-conquering force in that resource of going to the body of our fellow-citizens for great military power, when the country shall require it, some regular army is necessary. I can concur in all his eulogiums upon our citizen soldiers; but, while I do that, I must differ from him as to the policy and propriety of maintaining a permanent military force to some extent, to be always ready. They are always necessary for some occasions. For the protection of our fortifications and frontiers, for manning those fortresses which we have erected for the protection of our great cities, we must have some troops; and that is not a service in which volunteers will engage.

Besides, you must not only cherish, as the gentleman proposes, the native military genius and spirit of the country, but you must cultivate and preserve, at least, the science of war. Untaught bravery, untaught genius, will not supply the place of that military experience and that military knowledge which is necessary to insure success. We must cultivate and educate them. I look on West Point with the greatest possible favor. There is a nationality about it that I like. There our young men learn that they belong to the same nation, though they come from all its different portions. All idea of sectionalism is lost; their ideas are concentrated on a common country; they are educated by that country; their common gratitude is directed to a common object; their fidelity to their country is secured in early life by the very terms of their education.

All this is very desirable to one who would wish these sectionalisms and every sort of sectionalism entirely effaced and made to give way to more generous and more national and more patriotic feelings. I admire it as an institution to be cherished. The country is already much indebted to it. Is there such a class of army officers in any part of the world, of the same chivalry, of the same honor, of the same intelligence, of the same intellect, that occupies the humblest ranks in your Army? Not in the world. They are a class of officers that must insure victory to your standard whenever you fight on anything like equal terms with any enemy that this world can bring to confront you. Instinctively military, brought up scientifically to all its work and to all its arts, and each one fighting with the zeal and spirit and hopes of a republican citizen, what can resist them? Nothing. The world presents no such motives to the soldiery of any country on earth, nor do the armies of the world present men so well educated and prepared to occupy any station. There is hardly from that institution any second lieutenant in the Army who could not command his regiment, if the casualties and misfortunes of the day required it, and take the command instantly—not one. There never was such a little Army.

What does it do? Gentlemen say they see nothing particularly requiring an increase. Well, I ask gentlemen to look at what this little Army of ours performs. Take any single regiment of it. Let any gentleman who happens to be acquainted with its movements trace where it has been, what it has done, within any period of time to which he chooses to limit his inquiries, and he will find the same regiment to have been fighting at one time in the swamps of Florida; he will find that same regiment a year afterwards, perhaps, in Oregon or in Washington Territory; he will find it afterwards at San Francisco; he will find it again at Fort Leavenworth, fifteen hundred miles from New Orleans on the Missouri river, on the Indian frontier, engaged in an Indian skirmish, or an Indian pursuit. Was there ever an army in the world that performed the labor of this Army? I think there is not, within my knowledge, an army of twice its number that performs the same amount of labor in any part of the world that this little Army of ours does; and that, I presume, is one reason of the great, alarming, expense which is brought upon us by our soldiers. We are told that, according to a capitation division of the cost, they cost us a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars each. They are constantly in motion, and always on the frontiers of the country, where everything that is necessary for the soldier is dear; where everything costs a great deal by reason of the distant transportation you have to make of whatever feeds him, whatever clothes him, and whatever arms him.

That must be one reason why this expense has been rendered so great. And how have they performed the duties assigned them? I have spoken of the mere labor which is thrust upon them, beyond that which I believe is thrust on the officers of any branch of the public service. There are no clerks in the Executive Departments; there are no officers here, that perform the same amount of public labor and public service as the soldiers of our Army do; and how do they perform it? Like soldiers, like American disciplined soldiers, obedient to your first word of command, performing the most perilous duties without a murmur; nothing but discipline, and courage, and firmness and devotion manifested in the whole course of their military operations. Whatever may be your orders and the command of your Government, they execute unhesitatingly. Look at the little inglorious war carried on by them in the swamps of Florida for a long time, wading through swamps and marshes in the pursuit of Indians, perishing with disease, perishing with inglorious wounds received from an enemy in ambush, and dying there without a murmur, and without a groan to disturb the tranquillity or the happiness of their country. So it is wherever they have served.

How did they serve you in Mexico? How was it that they were always victorious? Could you have expected to accomplish such results with untrained troops? Certainly you could not. Could you have expected with such troops to have accomplished such a work, unless you had your ranks filled by the young officers that came from West Point. No, sir. There is the secret of our wonderful success—that, and the ability of the general-in-chief, and our generals, who controlled and directed it to its proper objects, and their courage and discipline. Are we not satisfied? Does not our great experience satisfy us that we have had a good return for the expense we have had for our permanent military force? Your triumph in Mexico, your speedy and glorious termination of that war, was the work of the men you had been sustaining and maintaining as a permanent military force. I believe we ought to value this little Army of ours at a high rate. There is no other such in the world. There is no other where the feeling of patriotism, and where the feeling of citizenship still survives every other consideration to the same degree that it does in our Army. There is no other army of the same amount of force, that has ever performed what your Army has performed, and is daily performing. I regret to hear gentlemen here say they are willing to abolish this Army. I am not. I believe it is necessary; and at the same time I perfectly sympathize with most of the opinions which have been uttered here, inculcating a jealousy of standing armies. Any idle, useless army, for which the public has no service, I call a standing army; but a mere military force of twenty thousand, which performs only a sort of police duty, cannot awaken alarm. I cannot fear it. I do not; but upon principle, I will not increase it a single man, if I know it, beyond what the public service and the public good actually require.

Entertaining these views, Mr. President, I must vote to strike out the first section of this bill, which, I believe, is now the question, because it proposes to increase the Army by additional companies, and I shall limit myself simply to voting for an increase by additional privates to each company in the Army, which, I think, will give an adequate force for the service of the country, so far as I am informed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I did not think that it would fall to my lot to stand here to represent the views of the Administration on this question; but as none of the friends of the Administration have done it, and as I am fully advised of their views, though not by any private conference, I shall state, in behalf of the Administration, that they do not want this bill to pass. They are opposed to it; and I will read to you an article from a newspaper of this date, which speaks by authority on this subject—the Washington Union; of February 10. There is in the article a little censure for the Military Committee of this body, which I shall not read, but merely allude to. It is an intimation that, if they had done their duty, this matter would have been disposed of long ago; and I now come to this part:

"The inference is irresistible that the theory, organization, and efficiency of the Army are better known at the War Office than at any other Department; and when that office asks an increase by regiments, in the nature of things Congress must infer there is good reason and sound policy in that request, as far as the form of increase is concerned especially. There is, then, manifest wrong in the present bill before the Senate."

That is what the Administration say—"manifest wrong"—I knew it before I saw it in this paper, [laughter,] but I suppose some on the other side did not—"to add companies instead of regiments;" and now the paper goes on to tell the reason why it is wrong:

"We are probably safe in the assertion, that not one in twenty members has reflected carefully upon Army organization, or the theories on which it is based."

It is not strange that the Senate committee have run wild, and got wrong, when not one in twenty members of Congress has recollected it. Again, this paper—I am not going to read the whole—says:

"It is, therefore, clear to our mind"—

I agree to that when the writer says "our;" he means him and me. [Laughter.]

"It is, therefore, clear to our mind that the proposed addition of two companies to each one of the regiments of infantry, cavalry, dragoons, and mounted riflemen, now in service, would go to change the whole Army system of the Federal Government; and as the militia system of the States is based on this, it would throw the whole militia system of the Union into a confusion."

Think of that, sir. [Laughter.] It would throw the whole militia system into confusion! You could not have a regular muster after that! [Laughter.]

"Additional companies are not contemplated in the constitution and theory of the Army, as it now exists, is instructed, and drilled. They would be wholly supernumerary, and without a fundamental change in the system, could not be ingrafted on the old established regiments. But the mischief, we repeat, would not end in deranging the fixed Army basis, but would result in fundamentally changing the militia organizations in all the States of the Union, as they have adopted the Army plan, and must always look to it for its system of drill and instruction. Here would be incalculable mischief and confusion!"

Now, sir, the Administration tell you that incalculable mischief will result from this bill. I am not converted to all the doctrines of the Administration, and I am not requested by them to say what I do in their behalf, [laughter:] but when they have put out their views so plainly and so palpably, I felt called upon, as a man who likes to see fair play, none of the friends of the Administration having come forward with their views, to lay them before the Senate, and to say that so far as their policy is to kill this bill I am with them, entirely with them, and I think they are wise.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, it was not my intention to make any further remarks on this bill in addition to those which I hastily offered a few days since; but the allusions which have been made to me in the course of the debate seem to require some vindication of the positions I then assumed; and it may be possible for me to illustrate them by examples which may be instructive in their character.

That there may be no misapprehension of my estimate of the regular Army, I will say with cheerfulness that I am not opposed to the Army, and I am not disposed to reduce it much. Perhaps I might vote to repeal the law creating the four regiments which were added a few years since; but beyond that, I should not be in favor of reducing the Army. I wish to have a force for maintaining our sea-board defenses, and for the purpose of preserving the arms of the Government and maintaining such fortresses as are permanent and necessary in their character. I would have no further permanent force than is necessary for these purposes. I do not wish to be regarded as an enemy to the Army, though since the remarks which I made the other day, I am the more convinced, if that were possible, of the truth of the apprehension I then expressed of the potency of the Army, for I find that my remarks have exasperated greatly the officers of the Army, who, I presume, anticipated promotion; but of that I have no certainty; and they not only regard me as hostile to it, but have displayed hostility to myself and other Senators who have dared to express similar opinions to mine on the subject. I am sent here, sir, to vindicate the nation, not a privileged class; and I am ready to combat the young monster as I would the old one of despotism. Never again, while I live, will I vote in time of peace to increase the regular Army one man. This is a fundamental principle with me. It is not that I apprehend danger from their bayonets or their swords; but it is rather the imperitiveness that arises from idleness and want of employment in individuals whose time ought to be given to the line of their duty in the service.

But, sir, there is a political influence growing upon the country in connection with the Army which I described the other day. Its inception is at the Military Academy. The inmates of that institution are the bantlings of the public. They are nursed, fostered, and cherished, by the Government; and when they graduate they must be provided with places in the Army. It is their vocation by education, and they must be provided for; the Army must be increased to accommodate the number of graduates whom the Military Academy may turn out annually. Places must be made in the regular Army to supply with positions the cadets who graduate at that institution. The danger is, that, as they multiply and increase, such will be the political influence disseminated through society that it will become a general infection, ruinous to the liberties of the country, and to the deliberations of the Congress of the United States. This is the danger which I apprehend from the growth of the regular Army.

I have bestowed some thought upon military matters. I have had some connection with the Army. My honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] for whom I feel so much kindness, and, if he will permit me to say so, I will add even veneration—for when I was in a subordinate station in the Army, he was in this Chamber a Senator—has misapprehended my training as a soldier. My service has been in the regular Army—never in the militia.

Before I attained to adult years, I enlisted a private soldier in the regular Army, the old seventh regiment. There I learned the rudiments of soldiery. For six months I was in the ranks, and I learned my duty there. Obedience was inculcated, and I imbibed readily the instruction accompanying it. I was then promoted an ensign, and every step of rank I acquired from that time, until I ceased to be an officer in any army, I acquired by dint of service. My promotions were purchased by what I deemed a fit recompense in service. It was alone in the regular Army that I was instructed—not in the militia. Five years of my soldier drilling was in the old regular régime—in the seventh, the thirty-ninth, and the first regiments. I learned, whilst there, to appreciate properly the regular Army duties of a soldier. I learned, too, that he was better capacitated for command when it was conferred upon him for meritorious conduct, than if he had gratuitously received it without learning the duty of a subordinate, or to pay obedience to a superior. Thus it was inculcated most instructively to me. It was not merely the result of observation, but in the school of experience I was taught.

Mr. President, you might as well tell me that you can take the dunghill fowl from its walk, or the young nestling, and rear it in an eagle's nest and make an eagle of it, as to tell me that you can place at the Military Academy one who has no military genius, and create him a general or a military man. You might as well tell me that you can educate a Shakespeare, a Burns, or a Byron, as to tell me that you can educate a general. You may teach a man the routine of platoon, of company, of battalion, of regimental or of general drills, but you cannot place in his head that strategy which is necessary to success; that high design and enterprise which are necessary to enable a general to bear your banners in triumph, and wave them above a conquered enemy.

"'Tis education forms the common mind."

But there are attributes of character that are not common, and they are not to be formed by education. Was Washington educated at a military academy? Were those glorious generals who seconded him so educated? Was Jackson, or Brown, or any of the men who so proudly vindicated our flag, and added to our national glory in the war of 1812, educated at a military academy? No, sir; they were from the school of nature, taught by nature's great teacher, God. You may make a mechanical soldier at the Military Academy; but if he has not genius to stir him on, let not Congress legislate to make him a place.

But, sir, I should be glad to know when it was that a regular force has ever given protection to a harassed frontier in this country? Tell me an instance of retaliation inflicted on an Indian tribe by a regular force, after the Indians had made incursions? I do not know it. I have not heard of it. Have chastisements taken place; have reclamations been made; have Indians been pursued; their villages destroyed; and they humbled or harassed in that way until they became amicable or receded from our frontier? If it has been done, it has been by volunteers who turned out for the occasion, or by rangers who were selected for that purpose, and for the protection of the frontier, and were not stationary in garrisons. Who ever heard of a garrison giving protection to any place, unless it was in time of alarm, when women and children might flee to it for refuge? A nation that keeps its men always in garrison will be easily conquered in the field. Are Indians going to march up to a fortress? Will they not pass miles around it, and march upon the settlements, and knowing its locality, easily avoid it on their return, after having depredated on the inhabitants, or stolen their property? and there is no one to pursue them. An infantry soldier is a very inefficient enemy to the Indians. But try your rangers; their impulses will keep them in constant exercise, moving from place to place. They feel the excitement of action, and there is nothing lethargic about them to enervate them and make them desire repose, tranquillity, or idleness. They would seek activity. Why? Because they are from that portion of the community where they have been inured to activity and toil from infancy. They are efficient men. So far as the fortresses are necessary to be kept up, let the regular soldiers do it. Whenever the emergency of the country calls for it, call on your volunteers, and they will rally to their country's call. These are the men I would depend upon. They are the men with whom I would hazard my life in full confidence that, so far as depended on their gallantry and valor, I would stand intrenched in the midst of a fortification of gallant hearts and brave arms. I never will vote for an increase of the regular Army, because it is useless. I would rather make ample provision for the Army we have; give them such compensation as will enable the officers, if they come in contact with the officers of other nations or our own citizens, to preserve a genteel and respectable appearance; and I would make the soldier comfortable, and supply him with everything useful for his position. I would rather maintain handsomely a small army than burden the Treasury with a numerous one.

The four regiments which were raised some three years ago have cost, up to this time, just about the $20,000,000 for which we have been obliged to resort to a loan, and what have they done? Are your fortresses better defended? Have you added victories to your account of national triumphs? Have they subdued any tribes of Indians? Have they given peace and security to our frontiers? What have they done? They have cost us millions of dollars of money, and that is the whole story—a short history of a glorious design. I was opposed to the creation of those additional regiments, and I believe my position at that time was considered to be a little heretical. I have heard gentlemen here speak of reading people out of the Democratic party. I did not know for what I was read out, nor did I care. I never inquired. If I had felt more interest, perhaps I should have inquired; but I never asked. Seeing that it did not affect my spirits or impair my general physique, I did not think it was so bad a thing. I saw that gentlemen were taking what I considered a wrong road, and I opposed them on the great matter now agitating the country, and I opposed them in regard to the increase of the Army which was made three years ago. My views on those points were not considered orthodox, and it seems that I was read out of the party. In parting company with gentlemen, I did not part from my principles. My principles from the beginning were those of Andrew Jackson. I challenge any man to show the slightest discrepancy between those principles which I now cherish and ever have cherished, and the sentiments of Andrew Jackson. His doctrine was, "principles without a platform;" but now the Democracy to a great extent is resolved into a platform without principles. I stand where Jackson stood—upon principle.

After the digression, I come back again to the Army; not that I expect to find any refuge or protection there, because I think it is a very harmless concern. [Laughter.] If I could really believe that it was the earnest wish of the Executive and the Secretary of War, based upon thorough information and a critical examination of the subject, that the Army should be increased as now proposed, I should regard it with a degree of seriousness which I cannot now attach to the proposition. How, in point of fact, do such suggestions originate? A lieutenant in camp in idleness may make a suggestion to a captain or a higher officer, for they form their associations, and the notion may be taken up and be generally dissemi-inated throughout the Army. Some point is settled upon; some achievement is to be accomplished; some change to be effected. They press their influence upon the Secretary of War. He takes it for granted that they are military men and must have digested the matter carefully, and he is ready without investigation to yield his assent to their recommendation. He brings the matter to the notice of the President, and the President, satisfied that the officer having charge of the War Department has much less to do than he has who supervises the whole, defers to his suggestion, and the measure is recommended to Congress. When it comes here, our duty is to investigate it with the best light we have, and to make our decision accordingly. We are responsible; not the Executive, not the Secretary of War. If those officers had investigated the matter thoroughly, and had made this recommendation for examination, it is as much our duty to investigate it and to yield or withhold our concurrence, according to our judgment, as if they had made no recommendation at all. The responsibility of its adoption devolves upon us, and not upon the President or the Secretary of War. We are sent here to act, as substantively as the President or the Secretary of War. I have no hostility to either of those gentlemen; but a fair, just, and excellent appreciation of them; yet I am not willing in opposition to my principles to yield my concurrence to any recommendation of theirs which I do not readily adopt on the information before me.

These are my views in relation to the Army; and until I have some evidence before me that I have not yet had, I shall continue to believe that those gentlemen have not had an opportunity of investigating this matter thoroughly, so as to justify us in following their recommendation, and increasing the Army to the extent proposed.

I shall not allude to the condition of things in Kansas, although it has been introduced into the debate. That is a subject which I have not allowed myself yet to investigate. The period was, when in perspective I saw all the calamities that have fallen on this nation—distracted, ruined, or almost destroyed liberties—by the adoption between midnight and dawn of the measure which repealed the Missouri compromise. On the night of its enactment, I stood on this floor appealing to Senators to preserve the peace and vindicate the Union and the national faith; but I was laughed at. They have not laughed since. I have avoided touching that subject, and I shall not do it now. I hope the opportunity will be afforded before I quit this Chamber, which will allow me to vindicate myself and the course of principles on which I stood, and then I will lay bare the iniquity, as I conceive, of the repeal of the Missouri compromise. I shall not allude to the use which has been made of the Army in Kansas; I have already expressed the opinion that the President had power to use it there, and as to the mode in which he has used it I shall say nothing.

If this increase of force is supposed to be needed for a Mormon war, or an Indian war, that is an emergency which cannot be of long duration. For such a service, I prefer volunteers, who can march to the scene of action promptly, who go on their own responsibility, and can be there almost in the twinkling of an eye. If you adopt the system of raising regulars, you will not in less than two years have raised your regular force of men for that purpose; and when raised, they will be utterly inefficient and unqualified for the service. If, however, you take volunteers, in sixty or ninety days or less, from Missouri, from Iowa, and I would say from Texas, troops will go there and settle the business very speedily, if war be necessary; but I doubt whether, unfortunately, men have not been there in former times who were worse than the Mormons themselves, and whose moral texture and complexion might reflect disgrace even upon the Mormons. It may be that such persons incited these men to desperation, and led to the statements which have induced the present Executive to act as he has done, when, perhaps, there would not have been a necessity for that action if the truth had been before him. If, however, you wish to subdue the Mormons, it can be done by volunteers in sixty or ninety days; but if you undertake to do it by regulars, and increase your Army for that purpose, you will not be in a situation to commence operations efficiently in twelve months.

It is said that volunteers are very expensive, and that it is more economical to employ regular troops. I do not see how they can be more expensive than regulars. You can get mounted volunteers as cheap as you can infantry soldiers of the United States—men who will provide themselves with their cavalry, and not exhaust the Treasury in purchasing it.

For the reasons which I have stated, I shall oppose everything like an increase of the Army now and forever, in public and private life, at home and abroad, in word and in action. As a matter of principle I am conscientiously opposed to increasing the Army in time of peace. I am not inclined, however, to disturb the present Army, but let them realize whatever may be expected from men who have given their lives to the service of their country.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of attention and a great deal of interest to the discussion of the question before the Senate; and I desire, without protracting the debate, simply to say a few words in reference to what influences my own vote.

I regard it as one of the highest duties of a country to provide for the due protection of its citizens; and I am convinced, from the investigation which I have given the subject, that, for protection of the character we are now called upon to give our citizens, no force is so economical, none is so efficient, as the Army, as it is organized by the laws of the United States at present. Upon this point of economy, there is something before the Senate besides mere figures of speech. There are figures here running back twenty years. If authority is wanted, we have before us a statement of the money we have paid; and we find, by the report of Mr. Poinsett, that he, in submitting the question to the House of Representatives, when he was Secretary of War, estimated the expense of volunteers, as compared with the regular Army, as four to one. That was in 1838. If we bring the expense of volunteers down to this time, the present Adjutant General says the ratio will be increased, and the disparity shown to be greater. Therefore, as a question of economy, if we are guided by a sense of justice in that respect, everything dictates that we should go on with the organization of the Army we have now.

Is there a necessity for an increase of the Army? Where are we to look for reasons to support this necessity? Gentlemen here say they have seen nothing before the Senate to justify an opinion of this kind. I regard the facts set forth in the report of the Secretary of War, unless they are answered, as furnishing all the grounds for that necessity. He shows the possible standing of the Army under existing laws, including the increase of the rank and file by the act of 1850, according to the urgent necessity under which that law was passed, to be seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four men as posted, but the actual strength on the 1st of June was fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty-four. He goes on to show that these troops have garrisoned sixty-eight forts and seventy other posts where the Secretary of War deems the presence of troops absolutely necessary. These forts and posts extend, according to his report, over an area of three million square miles, requiring thousands of miles of journey to reach them. In another part of his report, he says:

"These lines are very long, and are now extremely important, whilst every year renders them more and more so. From our western frontier of settlements to those of northern Oregon the distance is about eighteen hundred miles; from the same frontier to the settlements of California, via Salt Lake, is eighteen hundred miles; from the frontier of Arkansas, at Fort Smith, by Albuquerque or Santa Fé, to Fort Tejon, is about seventeen hundred miles; and from San Antonio, by El Paso, to San Diego, near the borders of the white settlements, is fourteen hundred miles; constituting an aggregate line of six thousand seven hundred miles, which ought to be occupied, and which we pretend in some sort to keep open and defend."

If the Army had given no other evidence of its utility, the fact that it had occupied this line would be sufficient to show its activity. True, the Army has not illustrated the country's glory by brilliant victories; it has not been called on to do so in time of peace; but in this extended frontier of over six thousand miles, it is an arduous duty, which it has performed, of keeping off the incursions of the Indians.

In voting for this bill, I put out of view entirely the question which has been mooted here, as to the employment of the Army against the Mormons. I noted the remarks of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foot,] yesterday evening, and I agree with him, to some extent, that if we leave these people to themselves, in the second or third generation the peculiar tenet of Mormonism will fade out. I believe, if left to themselves, dissension will grow up among them, and I cannot be convinced that an institution of this kind in the nineteenth century can stand in the face of Christianity. But, sir, we must bring the Army or we must bring Christianity in some shape in contact with them, where a parallel can be drawn. We may not fight them; but they lie directly in our path of emigration to the Pacific, and as long as they intrude on the path and violate the laws of the country, we must either surrender or find some other route for our emigrants; we must find other lines for our communication, or we must quiet them in some way. I should do almost anything in the world, but fight them.

Now, sir, in relation to volunteers, I concur in all the encomiums that have been passed on the service of volunteers by the Senator from Kentucky. I know something of that service; and I know that when there are emergencies which will call the volunteers of our country into the field, they are the troops on which we are to rely; but, if a standing army be necessary at all, we must have an army in contradistinction to volunteers. If you do away with your Army, the volunteers must become the standing army. You cannot get any force so efficient as the Army according to its present organization.

I understand that the present legal standing of the Army (apart from the act of 1850, by which the President is authorized to swell it in emergency) is about twelve thousand men, and if this bill passes now, according to the opinion of the Secretary of War, there will be no more men employed in the service (looking at the recruiting service, and the ability to obtain men at the present rates) than are absolutely wanted for the defense of our frontier without regard to the Mormon difficulties. I have looked over the report of the Secretary of War; and I have not seen any attempt to answer his positions. I have not seen his figures contradicted. I have heard no gentleman take up the report and discuss it, proposition by proposition, to show where an error is made; and if I follow out the report I come to the inevitable conclusion that the increase is essential. To say that we should not proportion the standing army of the country to the population of the country, is a proposition, in my opinion, untenable. Because the standing army may have been established in times past at six or twelve thousand men is no reason why that should constitute the standard for all time to come, irrespective of the wants of the country.

I have no fears of a standing army in this country. A standing army of twenty thousand men would be swallowed up by a single ward of one of your great cities. Notwithstanding it has never reached nineteen thousand men under the present organization, we cannot get a sufficient number of artillery forces together to drill according to the artillery arm of the service. This Army is scattered through all the forts and posts of the country; you scarcely ever hear of an entire company together. They are employed principally on the frontier.

But, sir, I am not in a condition to speak further on the question, and I will not detain the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am very much inclined, in all the business of the Senate, to look practically to the subject which is before it. When I rose this morning, and addressed some remarks to the pending amendment, and confined myself strictly to that subject, it was because I supposed it was not probably the wish of the Senate to go into general debate. Since that, however, I understand, from the remarks made to the Senate, as well as some made to myself, that explanations are expected on the whole bill, rather than remarks addressed to the pending amendment.

I have also been instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to announce to the Senate, in conformity with the opinion which I expressed this morning, and which was the opinion of the committee, as I was aware, that, should the Senate think proper to retain the first section of the bill, then the committee will move to retire the second section, so as simply to provide for the addition of the thirty companies. Believing that there is some objection to the paper increase—and it is merely on paper—we will withdraw the proposition to increase the maximum strength of the company to ninety-six, leaving it as it now stands, at an average of say fifty-two, for it varies in different arms, with authority to the President, in certain contingencies, to raise it to seventy-four. That is the present law, by the act of 1850.

On account of the statements which have been made in relation to the strength of the Army, so greatly exaggerated beyond the reality, I have thought it necessary to make an exact statement of what the Army is. It is now composed, including all arms of the service which go into the field, (not including engineer soldiers or ordnance soldiers,) of one hundred and ninety-eight companies, which, according to the fixed establishment of the Army, to be found in a table in the Army Register of this year, at page 41, gives a number of privates equal to nine thousand and sixty-six, supposing every company to be full up to the organization of the peace establishment; adding non-commissioned officers and musicians, you get the total of enlisted men eleven thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight. In 1850, on account of the necessity of troops on the frontier, Congress provided that at distant stations, and on the emigrant routes, the President should have authority to increase the privates in any company so employed to seventy-four; and this is the number which is taken from the Secretary of War's report. It is not the peace establishment; it is not the fixed establishment of the Army; but it is the temporary increase authorized by Congress to be made in certain contingencies. That gives a possible number of seventeen thousand five hundred and two, exclusive of the three or four hundred men who belong to the engineers and ordnance, and who, being added in the report, confuse the view which has been taken. That possible increase of the Army, it being now stationed almost entirely on the frontier, brings it up to that number. If every company in the Army was on duty, or in campaign, there would be a still higher possible number. It might in that contingency go up to about nineteen thousand.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I have an authentic statement from the Adjutant General's office, showing the present numerical distribution of the Army by military departments. The department of the east, including forts and fortresses, has eight hundred and sixty-nine men; the department of Florida, three hundred and thirty-seven; Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Arkansas, three thousand six hundred and seventy-six; the department of Texas, two thousand and forty-nine; New Mexico, two thousand two hundred and forty; the department of the Pacific, two thousand five hundred and seventeen; the army of Utah, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven; making the total of the Army of the United States at present only thirteen thousand five hundred and seventy-five. That is the whole Army at present.

Mr. DAVIS. That is in consequence of the wasting which occurred after the month of June, when the actual force was stated in the report of the Secretary of War, which has been so often read to the Senate. The actual number is a fluctuating number; and the only thing upon which any calculation can be made in relation to the broader question of the policy of the Government, is your fixed or legal establishment—not how many men may happen to be in the service to-day, or may be to-morrow, fluctuating under the sliding scale established by the act of 1850, but what you will have for a permanent peace establishment. That can be determined by principles of statesmanship much broader than the mere question of how many men are necessary to chase down some Indian tribe. The policy of our military establishment was framed by men who stood upon a higher pedestal, and looked over a wider sphere. It was carrying out the policy proclaimed by Washington, "in peace prepare for war." It was enabling our Government to move step by step, and keep easy progress with foreign nations with whom we might be involved in war.

In the mean time, a certain portion of the Army was from the beginning employed in the defense of our frontier settlements, then an easy task. As that task increased in difficulty, the Army was increased, and every reduction proved an unfortunate reduction. It has been very well established that the war with the Sacs and Foxes, commonly known as the Black Hawk war, which extended over two campaigns, resulted from the fact that we had not a sufficient number of troops in a position to punish the first acts of aggression. It finally involved both parties in open hostility. It has equally well been established in regard to that long and vastly expensive war in Florida, where each Indian's head cost a sum that I would be afraid even to state, where, per capita, more money was expended than one would deem it possible could have been fairly expended on a worthless Indian tribe. I say it has been established that if one, or at most two regiments had been in position when the first inception of that movement commenced, those expensive wars of 1833 and 1842 might have been avoided.

But, sir, our predecessors had a wiser policy, I say, than merely protecting the frontier settlers. They had the policy of keeping our Army instructed in all that belongs to civilized war; training artillery, training all the various arms of service in the science of war which is not to be learned merely by campaign duty—that is the practice, not the science of war.

The necessities for frontier service, with the augmentations of the Army which have been made, have caused its whole disposable force to be thrown to the exterior of our line, and scarcely any are left to hold the great fortifications along the sea-board, and there to learn those lessons in artillery practice that would be so essential to us in war. We have no dragoons or cavalry in any schools of instruction or practice. They are kept constantly on the frontier; and only so much as may be learned in occasional encampments—so much as may be learned in hot pursuit with jaded horses, is all that can be taught the cavalry arm of the United States. This is the great departure; not the increase of the Army, but the refusal to keep up those garrisons where military instruction may be perfected, is the great departure from the policy of our fathers.

According to the report of the Secretary of War, we now have one hundred and thirty-eight posts. According, also, to his report, we have an exterior boundary of eleven thousand miles; and of emigrant routes requiring military supervision by the military force, we have six thousand seven hundred miles; giving a total of seventeen thousand seven hundred miles. From this aggregate is excluded the whole amount of our Indian frontier, being two lines, extending from our northern to our southern boundary, and the whole amount of the reservations where, by the reports to the Secretary of the Interior, from his agents in different parts of the country, it is made apparent that the fulfillment of our obligations to the Indian tribes require the establishment of new posts. This may be taken as quite equal to the amount stated in the report of the Secretary of War; and then we have seventeen thousand seven hundred miles stated, which may be considered as about half the demand; and for which we may possibly have, by posting them as stated, an army of seventeen thousand five hundred men, or less than one man to the mile; or if you include the Indian frontier and the Indian reservations, less than one man to two miles. That is the Army the augmentation of which is considered so great as to become dangerous to the peace and liberty of the country! Taking the posts at merely the number we now have, one hundred and thirty-eight, and the companies of the Army being one hundred and ninety-eight, it is apparent that you have not companies enough in the Army to establish two companies at a post, and less than two never should be the garrison of a post. It destroys discipline; it impairs responsibility; it greatly depreciates from the efficiency, and I might say respectability, of the troops, to segregate them into such small detachments and leave them there to wear out like mere policemen stationed on a wharf.

The main argument in opposition to an increase of the Army, as I understand it, has been that there has been no showing of the necessity. I have, therefore, referred to what is to be drawn from the report of the Secretary of War, and I have also indicated the report of the Secretary of the Interior; but without wearying the Senate to read from it extensively, I will merely allude to a single passage at page 62 of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, where he announces the number of Indians at three hundred and twenty-five thousand, of whom three fourths belong to the hostile and roving bands. Two hundred and forty-three thousand five hundred of our Indians belong to that roving and hostile character which requires the interposition of military supervision. Where Indians of friendly temper have been drawn into reservations, I have, in looking hastily through this volume, found, in a great majority of cases, that the report of the sub-agent superintending the reservation says there is a necessity for the establishment of a military post to perfect the purpose of the Government to bring these Indians to an agricultural condition, and to give them that protection which is essential for their future progress. This is all in addition to what is contained in the report of the Secretary of War. These reports, too, are further sustained by the report of the Commanding General and of the Adjutant General, and in each of them it is shown, as I think, very conclusively, that the necessity exists for a force greater than we now have, and that, economy considered, is best to be obtained by increasing the regular army of the United States.

I have said before, and I repeat, that in urging this measure I do not make it rest on the necessities of the expedition against Utah, nor the necessity of keeping troops in Kansas. I did not say, as I have been sometimes represented, that no troops were necessary for Utah, or for Kansas. I assumed no such position. I say, I am not asking for troops for that purpose; because I believe if those difficulties were ended to-day the troops would be necessary. I believe that if the troops are used in one or both places for a time, at the end of that time they will be necessary for other purposes; and now they can be used in one or both of these places, only by withdrawing them from other purposes for which troops are required. I have not said, and I hope again that I shall not be misunderstood, that I deny the necessity for the use of troops in either of those Territories. That belongs to the Administration. I have no disposition to enter into the question as to whether the campaign should have been commenced against the Mormons or not.

I hope the anticipations of the President, as in a contingency which he expects soon to occur, troops will no longer be required in Kansas, may be realized. I may say, from my knowledge of the personnel of the Army, that there is no duty which could be more disagreeable—I may say more odious—to them, than interference with citizens of the United States in the Territories, or elsewhere. The maintenance of civil order is the last duty that any soldier would like to perform; but, at the same time, I deem it due to candor to say that I do not entertain the hopes which the President expresses. I have seen no evidence that the reign of terror in Kansas is to terminate in any contingency which I now foresee. I believe those lawless men who have been brought into conflict there, are to continue their collision; that men are to be intimidated for political ends, their houses to be burned, and assassinations to occur all over the Territory, the moment the strong arm of the Federal Government is taken away. I cannot go to the extent of the Senator from Georgia, and say that I will not give a man to preserve peace. I cannot go to the extent which would declare that I prefer that civil war should rage in the land, rather than to increase the Army and maintain order by the presence of troops in the Territories of the United States. It is no part of my feeling. In the first place, I should be willing to use troops anywhere to put down civil war and insurrection against the United States, when a contingency, such as is contemplated by the law, arises.

In the next place, I do not hold that the Territories occupy the same position as States. I do not admit, as I have never subscribed, to the doctrine of squatter sovereignty, that the Government of the United States has no more power in a Territory than in a State. I hold that the Territories are dependencies of the Federal Government; they are in a condition of pupillage, to be governed by the States; the property of the States; and that if men, either foreign or native, should aggregate themselves upon a Territory of the United States, and raise the standard of rebellion against its Government, and in defiance of its laws, it is not only within the power, but it is the plain, palpable duty of the Government to put down such an insurrection, and to compel obedience.

I am at a loss to understand how any one entertaining, as I do, the doctrine that this Government has power to acquire new territory, can at the same time deny that it has power to control it. We acquire a Territory with a population not comprehending our institutions, having no attachment to them, and we admit at the same time that we have no more right to use coercive measures within the limits of that Territory than in one of the equal States of the Union! It would be the Dead Sea fruit turned to ashes. The population might at once erect a government, not only anti-republican, but destructive of all the great principles that lie at the foundation of our Constitution. They might build up a monarchy. If you were to acquire an island, or a Territory, or a State, the whole population of which had been reared in subordination to monarchical education, and then at once to say, after we had expended thousands of lives and millions of treasure, these men are allowed to do what they please within their own limits, and the Government that has acquired the Territory by conquest or by purchase has no authority to exercise any authority over them, I think it is an absurdity on its face, and only has to run to these remote consequences to become apparent to every one.

Then, sir, I say the use of troops in a Territory of the United States does not stand in the same relation to constitutional questions as the use of troops in a State of the Union. I deny, as emphatically as any one, the power of this Government to coerce a State. That is a question which was discussed in the convention that formed the Constitution, and which was so powerfully stated by Mr. Madison to be a proposition, not to form a Union and preserve the States, but to provide the means for the destruction of the States. A State may, through its Legislature or its Governor, invoke the aid of the Federal Government, and of the other States; but the Federal Government has no power to invade the limits of a State, there to attempt the coercion of its people.

With this broad distinction I think the whole argument falls, except in the minds of those who still insist that the inhabitants of a Territory have all the political rights of the people of a State. I belong not to that school.

Then the argument is made, as a natural consequence of denying the right to use the troops, that in a period of profound peace, and of financial embarrassment, the startling proposition is made to increase the military establishment of the United States! Peace, it is true, exists between our country and all foreign countries, and I hope long may continue; but, in the mean time, we are engaged in a constant succession of border hostilities. All around that vast territory which lies between the Pacific settlements and those of the Mississippi valley, is a constant succession of hostilities with roving bands of Indians. If this is peace, when but eight hundred and sixty-nine men, officers and enlisted soldiers, can be left to garrison all the great fortifications on our sea-board, what, I pray, would be war? That proportion was left during the war with Mexico; and that proportion would be required in a war with any country, even if we were the invading Power; and that proportion of troops is altogether inadequate for the purposes for which those fortifications were built, in the case of any sudden surprise. It is not a state of peace so far as the Army is concerned.

The financial embarrassments of the country, the diminution of revenue because of a failure to pay the duties on imports, constitutes in my mind no difficulty at all to discharging any of the duties that belong to this Government. I wish that source of supply to our Treasury was cut off forever. I wish your great army of retainers and your numerous palaces for customs purposes were all disbanded, all evacuated, and we went back to that simple process of collecting money upon the people themselves, and let the people themselves look to the mode in which it was expended.

Then, sir, proceeding to answer the objections as they have arisen, as nearly as I can, in their order, the next was, that the Indians, by removal to the west of the Mississippi, had had their strength broken; that they had no power to resist us; and the next, in connection with it, was, that by the improvement of communication twenty-five thousand men had been made equal to what one hundred thousand were twenty-five years ago. Is it true that the concentration of the Indians on the west side of the Mississippi has diminished their strength? Is not the reverse true? When they were separate tribes, living surrounded by an active, intelligent population, driven themselves, by the small amount of territory they inhabited, to agricultural pursuits, when they lived in towns and villages where they could always be found, when they were dependent on their crops, the destruction of which must always bring them immediately to submission, it was an easy matter to control them, compared with the condition in which they now exist. On a wide extent of territory, brought into contiguity with each other, no longer surrounded by white population, driven to the chase for subsistence, returning every year more and more to their roving and original habits, these people have not only been made stronger, but they have been made more disposed to hostility than they were in their former position.

Again, by the acquisition of territory, and the extension of our settlements into territory long since acquired, we have been brought into contact with those tribes which, heretofore unacquainted with the white men, must go through the same process, the same series of conflicts and subjugation which had rendered the eastern Indians, before their removal, harmless in their contiguity to the whites. Not only this, but our population has poured over the mountains, and commenced extending from the Pacific as a front; our people have pressed the Indians back from the fertile valleys they inhabited, and from the soft climate where they were reared in proximity to the coast, and have driven them into the mountains—into a country so arid that a large portion of it can only be cultivated by irrigation. They have thus again reduced them to the chase for subsistence, and those Indians may well look on the valleys, and, like the Gaels in the Highlands, claim the right to redeem from the plain and the valley, as long as one sheep shall stand on a portion of their own heritage. These forays have been perpetrated, and they are to be perpetrated, until a new state of things shall be brought into existence. During that period of transition, when the Indians may be gathered from these vast hunting grounds on reservations which they will and can cultivate, it will be necessary to preserve a military force sufficiently large to rule them by coercion; and this is the opinion of every intelligent sub-agent whose opinions I find recorded in the volume which contains the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

These things are facts on which I should think the Senate might reach the conclusion that the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of War have not been made without some due consideration. These volumes have been but recently printed, and laid on the tables of Senators. I trusted that as they progressed in the examination of them, many of those objections and doubts which were expressed two or three days ago would vanish. I believe that the increase which is proposed by the committee to be the least which the present exigencies of the country will permit. If the Senate had indicated a purpose to adopt the recommendation of the Secretary of War, the committee were ready at any time to withdraw their bill and allow the Senate to pass the other; but on the vote it was made apparent that that was impossible; it was not within the view of the Senate, getting but eight votes, and some of them hostile; and, therefore, the committee feel that it is their duty to urge the adoption of the bill which they have reported as a means absolutely necessary to the performance of these duties unless some substitute can be provided.

I know that the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houston], whose familiarity with Indian character I do not doubt, has proposed to us a remedy which every man's heart would respond to as much more desirable, if it were attainable. He proposes an Indian policy which is to substitute kindness, justice, and generosity; and one might suppose that the Government had pursued a different policy; but his remarks put it out of the question that he meant the Government had pursued any other policy than this, except through the regular Army. Now, sir, I believe that the argument of the Senator from Texas is somewhat answered by the argument of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr.

TOOMBS.] The Senator from Georgia says that the regular Army is entirely harmless as against Indians; so that if the Senator from Texas thinks they are dangerous, I must refer him to his friend from Georgia, who assures him that the Army is quite harmless in relation to the Indians.

This being out of the way, he appeals to the high motives and the generous character of the Indians to remove the necessity for any military force. In the first place, Indian agents do not seem to entertain that idea. In the next place, the officers of the Army are frontier men, and they know more of the Indians than anybody else; and much as the Senator himself has seen of Indian tribes, I should say he had not seen as many weeks of Indian service as every field officer of the Army on the frontier has seen years. I do not think, therefore, his opinion is to be put in opposition to that of the sub-agents of Indian affairs, and that of military officers whose acquaintance with the Indian exceeds that of any other class of our population.

I have no confidence in the high principles that are ascribed to the Indians. They have a certain sort of morality—a certain sort of religion, if you may so call it—and in that there are some things good. Perhaps no body of men is wholly bad. Take them as a class, they are as deceptive, as blood-thirsty, as treacherous, as cowardly a race of men as I believe are to be found on the face of the globe. If our frontier inhabitants have sometimes committed aggressions on them, where is the frontier settlement that does not record the most cold-blooded and cowardly murders of women and children? Where is the frontier settlement that does not bring with its tradition torture at the stake of a prisoner when he stood powerless, at the hands of a hostile savage band? Are these the high principles to which the Senator appeals? Are these the noble qualities that are to make the Indian an exception, and lift him at once out of barbarism by holding to him something like an example of those qualities which he may perhaps possess when the millennium shall come? In the mean time, I rely, as everybody else connected with the Indians, as every frontier inhabitant whose wife and children are exposed to be tomahawked by these Indians, relies on force of some kind as the only means for giving that protection which the Government owes to its people.

Thus, then, we proceed to inquire what the character of the force should be; and, in this connection, the regular troops of the Army have been pronounced as ineffective. It is said they are ineffective, and do not kill the Indians; but that the volunteers become excited, and do kill them. The Senator from Texas says that if regular troops endeavored to pursue the Indians, they might become excited and possibly do the same thing. I am not to be put in the attitude of depreciating the volunteer force of the country; nor shall I engage in recrimination against the volunteers. My relation to the volunteers and the regular troops is the same. At one time or other, in the course of my life, they have both been my companions. My remembrance of both brings to mind many associations, the dearest to me in my life. I have seen all that ought to crown the American soldier in the ranks of both regulars and volunteers. Why should this war exist between these forces? Shoulder to shoulder they stand upon the battlefield; together they bleed, even exchanging men from one kind of force to the other, when it is necessary. There, when the flag of their country required them to do their utmost in the presence of a hostile foe, these jealousies and depreciations of one by the other did not arise. They were left for the debate in the Senate, and for a time of piping peace, and for places remote from the battlefield where they fought for a common cause, inspired by common sacrifices for a common country.

But the Senator from Texas says, surely with entire sincerity, that he has not heard of any pursuit of Indians by regular troops; that all that has been done has been by volunteers. Well, sir, in the volume which has been laid upon his desk, the report of the Secretary of War, he will find some cases cited—not all, but some which have been cited because of their prominence. They have been cited to show that the Army as it now exists is not on a peace establishment, to show the constant active service on which it is engaged. Not only is it to be found in this volume, but it has been circulated over the country in general orders from the head-quarters of the Army as long ago as November 13th last. Not only that, but some of the significant acts of service therein recited, occurred within the limits of the Senator's own State. Let me read some of these instances from the general order to which I have referred:

"I. On the 17th of February, 1856, Captain James Oakes, with a part of his company C, second cavalry, from Fort Mason, Texas, after a pursuit of six days, and on the ninth day from his post, overtook a party of seven or more Indians, killed one and wounded several others; capturing all their animals and other property; sergeant Reis and private Kulin, severely wounded. The troops were exposed to very cold and wet weather, and for more than seven days subsisted on two days' allowance of bread and coffee, such game as they could kill, and the flesh of horses they were obliged to abandon."

That sounds to me something like pursuit; and it was a pursuit of a party that invaded the Senator's own State. Again, the seventh case recited in this order is:

"VII. On the 13th of April, 1856, a party of fifty-five Indians were overtaken on the head waters of the Nueces, by detachments from companies B and D, mounted riflemen, and F, first artillery, from forts McIntosh and Duncan, Texas, under the command, respectively, of Captain Thomas Claiborne, junior, and Brevet-Captain George Granger, mounted riflemen, and Second Lieutenant George H. Elliot, first artillery. One Indian killed and four made prisoners, their camp and all their animals captured."

"The vigilance of the Indians, and the character of the country, which enabled them to discover pursuit at a great distance, prevented a more complete success. In this case, from the time of leaving their posts until the termination of the pursuit, the troops marched three hundred and fifty miles in eight days. They suffered from want of water; and for four days, two in the pursuit and two after its termination, had no provisions but a small allowance of rice and coffee, accidentally obtained in crossing the El Paso road. The mayor of Laredo, Señor Don Santos Benevidas, Mr. Edward Jordan, and some twenty-five other citizens of that place, participated in this pursuit, and are represented as having rendered valuable service."

Again:

"XII. September, 1856. A detachment of troops from Fort Clark, Texas, commanded by Captain Charles C. Gilbert and eighteen men of company B, first infantry; Second Lieutenant Henry W. Closson and twelve men of company I, first artillery; and Second Lieutenant James B. Wetherill and thirty men of company C, second cavalry, penetrated the country between Fort Clark and the mouth of the Pecos, western Texas, hitherto not visited by troops, and considered very difficult of access. The expedition was conducted with so much judgment and energy that, in the operations of a day, three parties of Indians were surprised between the Rio Grande and Pecos, near their junction. Four of the Indians killed and four wounded. Their animals and other property taken or destroyed."

The Senator from Texas knows Indians well enough to know the difficulty of surprising an Indian camp. He understands that men who are ignorant of the frontier and its service, as he described the Army to be, would never surprise an Indian camp, and yet here is a gallant soldier who three times surprised Indians in one day. Then again:

"XIV. November 30th, 1856. A detachment composed of men of company G, first dragoons, and company C, mounted riflemen, in all twenty, commanded by Second Lieutenant Horace Randall, first dragoons, followed a party of fifty warriors of the Gila Apaches, and after a chase of three hundred, and, in one day, of eighty, miles—going over mountains and plains of snow, the trail frequently obliterated, without water for three days and nights—overtook the enemy and attacked and drove them from the position of their own selection, recovering all the captured animals."

That sounds something like pursuit—a pursuit in which fortitude, skill, and all the knowledge that could enter into such service, were exemplified in the highest degree, and that too by one of those very young men against whom so many of the Senator's remarks this morning were directed. Again:

"XIX. April 4th, 1857. First Lieutenant Walter H. Jenifer, second cavalry, with thirteen men of Company B, of that regiment, after a search of thirteen days, and a march of nearly three hundred miles, came upon a fresh trail of Indians, near the head of the north fork of the Nueces river, Texas; and, as the trail led into a rocky country, almost impracticable for cavalry, he dismounted, left his horses with a guard, and continued the pursuit with only seven men. After a tedious march of four miles, he suddenly came upon a camp, occupied by from eighty to one hundred Indians. Approaching it, under cover, to within two hundred and fifty yards, and he and his little party being discovered, they were attacked by all the warriors in the camp, and threatened, at the same time, by a party returning to it with horses. He repulsed the Indians, with a loss to them of two killed and one wounded. It being then night, he withdrew his men, rejoined his horses, and returned to the attack the next day; but, in the mean while, the Indians dispersed. For the last three days this detachment had no rations, having been out seventeen days."

I could go on with these instances. I have other cases marked which I might cite. There are twenty-five recited in this single order—one of them a case where the Indians were drawn up in position, and waited to receive an attack of cavalry, when they were gallantly attacked by Sumner, leading his men, charging them in the same manner in which he charged the Mexican forces at the time of the confusion thrown into our troops at Molina del Rey, equally followed by a dispersment. He drove them from the field, and their safety arose simply from their ability, with their light horses, to cross a stream, the bed of which was composed of sand.

The Senator, then, has done injustice; and if he will take this order, I will give it to him, that he may see how great is the injustice he has done to the Army in thus proclaiming to the country that they have rendered no part of that duty which devolves upon them for the protection of the frontier. If he will read the report of the Secretary of War, he will find that this is but one of the two orders that recite such deeds, illustrating the services which have been rendered by our gallant little band on the frontier, answering the reflection which the Senator has, I am sure unconsciously, cast on those who are mean time encountering service more severe than I have ever known volunteers to bear.

Then the Senator, in the course of his remarks, (for I find that, as my opponents are pressed to a change, I must change also,) took the ground that, on one occasion, the Army had been effective; for, said he, they had killed one hundred and thirty women and children; and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] on the intimation perhaps of the Senator from Texas, said dragoons had been raised under the pretext of defending the frontier against the Indians; and all he heard of their doings was the killing some squaws and children. I do not know what number he meant, whether the same one hundred and thirty or not; but he explained that he meant the same place. The report of General Harney, in reference to the action referred to, is to be found in the second volume of the President's message and accompanying documents for last year, at page 49. He sets forth the whole case; and, according to his report, and the accompanying reports of the officers who were serving under him, the number of killed was eighty-six; and wounded, five—not one hundred and thirty women and children; but eighty-six Indians were killed, and five wounded; about seventy women and children captured, and fifty mules and ponies taken, besides an indefinite number killed and disabled. In a report made by Colonel Cooke, which I shall not weary the Senate by reading, he explains that the women dressed and armed so much like the men as sometimes to be almost undistinguishable from them. They fired upon his men; and, in one instance, wounded a sergeant who had passed a woman because he perceived she was one.

Then, again, the report of Lieutenant Warren, who was the topographical engineer accompanying the expedition, gives distinctly the whole circumstances of the ground which caused the killing of, I think, seven women and three children. After the first attack on the Blue Water, a part of the Indians escaped across the plains, and were pursued by the mounted troops. A part of them being on a hill had fled into a sort of a cave, where the rock hung down near to the ground, and furnished a loop-hole through which they fired upon the troops as they approached. This fire was returned by the troops. After a cry was heard from the interior of this cave, one of the interpreters, coming up, said there were women in it, and the officer who commanded them (and who, by the way, the Senator from Maine would have found, if he had inquired, was a worthy representative of his own State) immediately halted, told the interpreter to advance, and called on the women to come out. They did come out; they were surrendered; they were not hurt; and all that were killed were those who had been shot in the cave where they could not be seen, and that, after a fire from the cave had been made. That, according to the history of the case, as far as I have been able to learn, is the foundation of this charge of killing one hundred and thirty women and children.

The commander of that expedition, General Harney, might compare his knowledge of Indians and of Indian character favorably with the Senator from Texas, or anybody else. That stroke which he gave the Indians on the Blue Water was the most successful blow that was ever struck on that frontier for the preservation of its future peace; and if peace shall be enjoyed by the people of Nebraska, it will be attributable more to that one great movement of Harney's than to anything else which has ever happened there. Then, moving on, with that knowledge of Indian character, and that intrepidity and devotion to his duty which characterizes the man, he went forward, disregarding all difficulties, until he reached the Missouri river, and there held a council with the Indians, formed with them an agreement, which stands in my judgment as a model for all treaties with Indian tribes. He there established among them an organization, which, if anything could be effective to preserve these restless people in order, would conduce to that result. It has had the good effect, so far as I can learn, thus far, to keep the Indians who had hitherto been hostile, in a state of peace, and approximating to that end of which the Senator speaks.

But, sir, in answer to some remarks which have been made by myself and others, replies have been offered which would indicate that there had been an intention to signify that volunteers were wanton, and were cruel. I have no disposition to shrink from the responsibility of what I said; or if I did not say it, what I thought. I thought, and I now say, that if you bring men out with border animosities, men who have had past injuries, who come with grievances to redress, they will exceed the limits of justice; they will exceed the limits of humanity and forbearance; they will kill without justifiable cause. I have no disposition to cite cases, though it would be easy for me to do so. Volunteers—I use the word because others use it; militia is the strict term—the militia are the people of the United States, and so are the soldiers of the regular Army. They are all volunteers. Thank fortune we live under a Government where all who enter the military service do it voluntarily. Militia may be coerced by draft; the regular soldier is always a volunteer. It is always a voluntary enlistment, he is emphatically, under all circumstances, the volunteer. But using the term in the sense in which it has been used of militia, I say the militia, if drawn from a distance, would be exactly like those who had been enlisted in the regular service; the whole difference being the degree of discipline, and that disparity constantly vanishing in the progress of a long campaign, bringing them at last to precisely the same standard; being the same material at the start, and reaching the same result if they are carried through the same process. If you take men away from the border; if you take the citizens of the State which my friend before me [Mr. CLAY] so ably represents, Alabama, and move them on to the frontier of Texas, or of Oregon, they would have no animosities to gratify; no past grievances to redress; their conduct to the Indians would be marked by the same lofty generosity and forbearance which is to be found in men from any other quarter.

The whole of the cases which were referred to, and which have been somewhat warped in the argument, were those which resulted from border animosity and from partisan feeling. I think I said—and if I did not, I intended to say—that if the militia of California were called out against the Mormons, coming there with their hostility towards them, the result of their contact with them, justifiable, if you please, but coming with that preconceived hostility, they would have a severity in their treatment of them which would not belong to men brought from a distance. That is my opinion. I think it very likely, that if the appeal was made to the men themselves, they would say: "Yes, that is true, we do feel it; and we are likely to exercise it." I am sure I have never seen a body of militia in the field, called from the neighborhood of a settlement on which Indian depredations had been committed, that did not come with the spirit of extermination, and justified themselves by arguments drawn from what they had suffered.

We have also had the argument presented to us, that the militia will always respond to the call of the country; that they always have been the effective force which has fought the battles of the country; and that they are the reliable strength of the country. Grant it. Who denies it? The militia have responded, and they always will respond, when there is occasion; but the militia never have been called out to hold frontier posts; and they will be found to be very restless troops if they should ever thus be employed. It would be at a great sacrifice of the other interests of the country if the militia were so called out. Men useful in the ordinary avocations of life, detached from them and from their families, to perform the duty of private sentinels at a frontier post, would be such a waste of valuable material that it would deserve to be called anything else than economy, even if it did not cost a dollar.

But, sir, as to the relative efficiency of the two species of troops, I have some brief points to which I will refer; and the first is the "Vital Statistics" of Dr. Coolidge, a review of which work will be found in the American Journal of Medical Science, for January last, and a table from the work to which I alluded, will be found at page 92 of the Journal. It is a table showing the proportion of the invalid and disabled troops in the different services. First, he takes the British army, giving a percentage of 0.65 per month; then the regular Army of the United States, giving a percentage of 0.53; and then the additional force raised in the war with Mexico, being regular troops, 0.52; then the volunteers, 1.25 per month. That is to say the men who became diseased and disabled by the contingencies of the camp, were about double in the volunteer forces what they were in the regular army. Why was this? In the first place, the volunteers did not know how to take care of themselves; they did not know how to shelter themselves; they did not know how to cook their provisions; and in the next place, their habits were suddenly changed, and this waste of life was the result of the sudden change before the animal economy had been accommodated to it. If you were to take an Osage and put him on a simple rice diet, you would as surely kill him as if you were to take a Hindoo and put him on a meat diet alone. Either of the two extremes would bring about the same result, and be destructive to the efficiency of the Army. The same law is found in operation among the brutes.

Next I refer to the report of the Surgeon-General of the Army, of November 9, 1846, in which he says:

"From the best information which has been received at this office, it is believed that the extent of sickness among the volunteers on the Rio Grande has been fourfold to that among the soldiers of the regular Army, with a corresponding excess of mortality in the ranks of the former."

"But this is not all; the presence of a numerous body of invalids seriously embarrasses the service; for, besides consuming the subsistence and other stores required for the efficient men, they must have an additional number of surgeons and men to take care of them, and a guard to protect them, which necessarily lessens the disposable force, the available force, for active operations in the field."

These are the two statements on which I would rely as to the relative efficiency of the two species of troops; and these reasons apply with fourfold force to the circumstances of the expedition to Utah. They will be there further removed from civilization; they will be there more deprived of the comforts to which they have been before accustomed. The casualties resulting from the employment of militia in such a service as that, by their being disabled by disease, exposure, and the vicissitudes of the camp, will greatly exceed anything we have heretofore encountered in the cases from which these results have been drawn.

There might, however, be circumstances which would justify us in meeting all these objections. If I believed, with the Senator from Texas, that the cavalry of the United States Army was necessarily wholly inefficient, a mere tax that never did and never would do anything, certainly I would say we must look out for some other character of troops; but some of the hard rides which I have read to him to-day, some of the successful pursuits, defying all privations of food, cold, and thirst, should somewhat convince him that the Army may be effective for the purpose for which he proposes to employ a volunteer force. He says he wants troops; but he wants a different kind of troops than the Army can furnish; he wants men who are able to take care of their horses; men who know something about frontier service. Where will he find them out of the Army, comparable to our dragoons? Where will he find men who have so often encamped under the blue vault of heaven, and relied on grass to support their marching column, as in the Army of the United States? Where will he find men who know so much of the topography of the country? If his objection be that the recruits are not sufficiently instructed, the remedy is to give us more force; not to require that every man, the instant he is enlisted, shall be thrown on to the frontier for immediate service; but give us enough troops to keep some in camps of instructions and in schools of practice, where they may be educated for those duties which the Senator desires to have them perform.

But he makes the argument of economy in that connection, and he uses it in several other connections; and among others, the Senator from Georgia first asserts and the Senator from Texas indorses it, that Texas used to be better protected by four companies of rangers than she is now by five regular regiments. To that, I have two answers to make: First, there are not five regiments there; and second, if Texas ever was protected by four companies at the early period referred to, those four companies might have been quite adequate to protect the settlements which, at that time, were not equal to one twentieth, or perhaps one hundredth part of what they are now. Four companies were sufficient to protect a single ranch; they were more than sufficient to protect a single man; and they may have been sufficient to protect the whole amount of border settlements Texas then had.

It is further to be remembered that the Indians then lived upon fertile valleys with abundance of game, and that the prosperity and progress, which to me is most gratifying, of the people of Texas, has now driven the Indians from the fertile plains into the arid region where but little game is to be found; and now, by necessity, they commit forays for plunder in order that they may obtain food, which is not to be found in the haunts to which they have been driven.

Then, again, it is to be remembered that Texas did not occupy to the boundary of the Rio Grande. I contended in 1850 that that was her territory. I contended for it a great way up the stream; but nevertheless it is true that she did not maintain posts on the borders of that river overlooking the territories of Mexico. A portion of the force in Texas is to be accounted for by manning those posts which mark the boundary of the Rio Grande, and which Texas never occupied with a regular force.

Now, sir, the question of economy is to be answered in several forms. As I understand the argument, the basis of it, and it was so stated by the Senator from Georgia, is, that the cost whilst in the service, of a militiaman and of a regular is the same. He made some slighting remarks about the skill of regulars in making out accounts, to which I have no reply to make, but he said the pay and allowances were the same. He overlooks the fact that the more frequently you change the force the greater its cost. He has neglected the law which gives to the militiaman fifty cents a day for his own subsistence, and twenty-five cents for that of his horse, whilst he is going to and getting back, and twenty-five cents for the use of his horse while he is in service. It is a fact that we have been able to get very few volunteers otherwise than mounted. It has become more and more so, and steadily more so with each year. The late Adjutant General Jones used to say to me that he recollected the time when the song was that a man was to shoulder his musket and march away, but now it was to get upon a horse and ride away. His complaint was then that he could not get militia to serve on foot. He could not get militia in Florida to serve on foot. It was not so much that they required to ride, as that they would not serve for the poor pay you give to the private soldier of the United States; they required the pay of mounted men, pay and allowances for their horses, and the indemnity for their horses which always follows in a heavy train just behind the allowance for permission to use the horse at all.

All these matters have been reduced to calculation; we have had reports on them. It is hardly necessary to argue that the traveling allowances, the clothing which is on the ratio of the first year's services, and the pay for the use of the horses, constitute the items that make up the very great expense of the employment of volunteers. These have all been stated in tables, which have heretofore been prepared, presented, and published for the use of the Government. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] this morning referred to the letter of Mr. Poinsett. That letter communicated a report of the Paymaster General, who goes beyond the limits of the then Secretary of War. He refers to the disparity between the cost of the two forces as nearly six to one, because, he says, the horses that are employed are merely to carry the men from place to place, and really impede the march of the column. Then he goes on to state that—

"This enormous disparity in the expenses of the two forces is not owing to the extravagant allowances made to volunteers; for, except in the article of clothing, they are not better paid than regular troops, and altogether insufficiently compensated to reimburse them for the pecuniary sacrifices they make in leaving home and employment, to say nothing of the danger and hardships they encounter. It is caused principally by expenses for traveling to and from the place where the services of the volunteers and militia are required; to the hire, maintenance, and indemnity for horses; and to furnishing them a full supply of clothing as a bounty, without regard to length of service. The statements also show the expense of volunteers serving on foot, and of militia. The term of service of the latter never exceeds three months, unless specially provided for."

"There is one comparison that would place the contrast between the expenses of regular and irregular troops in a much stronger light, if I had the data to enable me to state it in figures; and that is, the comparative loss and destruction of military stores and public property by the two forces."

He presents his tabular statement in which he shows, on the basis of the companies, that for six months the cost of a company of United States dragoons was $13,573, and for the mounted volunteers $22,575. That is the ratio to which I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia before he again assumes the position that the expense is the same.

The Senator announced, in the course of his argument, I think, that the cost per man of the Army, was $1,000 per annum; but the Senator from Maine, I think, says it is $1,500. The Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] says it is $1,000; and thus it seems to be a question between the gentlemen whether it is $1,000 or $1,500. I am quite at a loss to know by what process of calculation they reach that result. Surely the Senator from Georgia, when he states the cost per man during the time Mr. Calhoun was Secretary of War, to be $273, has not based his calculation on any data which will lead him to decide that $1,000 is the cost of a man now. Whatever process of calculation is adopted, it must be different for the one case and the other to reach these results. It is utterly impossible to obtain them by any one process of calculation.

Mr. TOOMBS. I can refer the Senator to my authority. In 1842, the Secretary of War, Mr. Spencer, of New York, I think, was called upon to compare the estimate of expenditures. He puts it at that amount on the same basis by dividing the expense by the number of men and officers. The report I stated from recollection was that it was $273. That is where my information is derived from.

Mr. DAVIS. The report of 1820 is to be found in the American State Papers, volume 2, pages 46-7; and in it is stated the strength of the Army at different dates, and the annual expense per man, including officers; and this report states it to have been, in 1809, 1810, and 1811, $383 60; in 1820, $336 56, per man; and that reduction of nearly fifty dollars has been ascribed, and I think with much justice, though I do not believe it is wholly due to that cause, to the increase of the Army which, in the mean time, had taken place. The Army had been increased on the peace establishment to six thousand men, and the expense per man had sunk nearly fifty dollars per capita.

Now, sir, I have had a calculation made on the present basis to ascertain what a regiment of infantry will cost; and I have asked that it shall be a regiment of infantry to be raised, including the whole expense for recruiting, the first years' clothing, all the camp and garrison equipage, so as to bring it as nearly as possible into a fair comparison or parallelism with a volunteer force raised for the same time. It is the same table which I think was furnished to the Senator from Texas; but I suppose it was not in his possession when he made his remarks. The pay during twelve months of a maximum infantry regiment, eight hundred and seventy-eight strong, (that includes all the field and staff, and includes the additional men granted by the act of 1850,) including officers, subsistence, clothing for their servants, and forage for the horses of the field and staff, subsistence of the enlisted men at the price which has been estimated for the Utah expedition, clothing for the enlisted men, with camp and garrison equipage for the officers and men, make the total amount of maintaining for one year a maximum infantry, eight hundred and seventy-eight strong, $293,784 39. If to this be added the maximum cost of raising such a regiment, $14,630, we shall have an aggregate of $308,414 39; and this divided by eight hundred and seventy-eight would give us the cost per man for the first year, $351 24. The cost of raising a regiment would of course be excluded from all subsequent calculations. The estimate for clothing would be greatly lessened the second year; and the estimate for camp and garrison equipment would disappear.

We have had an estimate lately sent in to us, of $385,000 required by the pay department alone for twenty companies of volunteers for six months. That would be equal to ten companies for twelve months; and taking it and comparing it with this estimate of a regiment for a year, adding the cost of rations, which are $77,015, it would give a total of $462,015, instead of the $385,000, (adding merely the cost of rations to the pay,) or $526 21 per man. It follows, then, that a regiment of volunteers would, for one year, cost more than a regular regiment of the same strength, $153,600 61, or an individual volunteer during the same period, $174 97 more than an individual regular soldier. It will be remembered, however, that these volunteers are mounted.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In my statement as to the cost per man of the Army, I took from the estimates submitted by the War Department what the Secretary of War himself states as to the expenses of the Army proper. I find the estimates as follows: First, expenses of recruiting, transportation of recruits, &c., $110,000; next, pay, commutation of officers' subsistence, commutation of forage, payments to discharged soldiers for clothing not drawn, payments in lieu of clothing for officers' servants, subsistence in kind, clothing of the Army, supplies for the quartermaster's department, incidental expenses of that department, barracks, transportation of officers' baggage, transportation of troops and supplies, purchase of horses, contingencies of the Army, medical and hospital department, contingent expenses of the adjutant general's department, expenses of the commanding general's office,—the whole making, together, as the expenses of the Army proper, $14,776,619 49.

Now, if we take, according to the statement of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the cost of raising a regiment, and count that only as added to the pay and rations, undoubtedly he may bring the expenses per man to four or five hundred dollars; but have we any assurance that all the other expenses and all those other branches of the Army service are not to increase proportionately to the Army, and consequently that the sum total of the appropriations will still remain about a thousand dollars per man? I do not profess to be acquainted with these details, but I take the report of the Secretary of War, and he says he wants $15,000,000 for the Army proper, which now averages about fifteen thousand men, making $1,000 per man.

Mr. DAVIS. I am obliged to the Senator from Louisiana for his explanation. I think it is easily answered. It is a process of calculation which always leads to error. There are some methods of computation which will occasionally be right, and sometimes wrong; but that is a process which is always wrong, and cannot be right. I will put the two cases that result from that process. I will suppose that fortifications cease; that the manufacture of arms ceases; that your staff is disbanded; that you swell the companies to the maximum limit; that you have additional regiments; that you raise an army to that magnitude which might even frighten the Senators who have spoken of the dangers of a standing army; and yet, according to this process of calculation you would bring forward a beautiful sheet of economy. You would have lopped off the vast expenditures which do not depend on numbers; you would have multiplied the lower grades where the smallest pay is received, and, per capita, you would bring up a sheet demonstrating a most economical administration. Now, let us take the other case; that following in the footsteps of our fathers and profiting by the experience of the time which has intervened from their day to this, we think proper to maintain in time of peace a large staff; we think proper to go on with fortifications for the contingencies of war; we think proper to go on with the manufacturing of arms, so that the whole militia may be supplied at any moment; we think proper to cut down the companies to the small number necessary for duty in time of peace; we think proper to maintain a large number of regiments in proportion to the whole number of the rank and file; and then, per capita, you have the greatest expenditure you could possibly show, and yet you have the wisest economy, according to the theory of our military system, which you could adopt.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In the list of expenditures to which I have just referred, I carefully excluded everything having reference to the manufacture of arms, and to fortifications. That list has no reference to them at all. They are excluded. If we include these and other items, the expenses would reach twenty millions.

Mr. DAVIS. But you include all the vastly expensive portions of the Army in your estimate. You include the staff, which would be increased by adding to the number of men, and which, on our theory, is maintained in time of peace because it is essential in time of war; because it is a part of that arrangement by which you may accumulate a large army in the field and have it effective with the small nucleus you preserve in time of peace.

Besides, it will be remembered that by special legislation you have sometimes increased the pay of particular officers, general and staff; you have raised it to a magnitude which bears no relation to that of the soldiers; and this is an argument adduced against the increase of companies, against the increase of privates in the Army; but it has resulted from the pay which you have bestowed with a liberal hand on some officers in the service. I say such a process of calculation leads to error, and cannot lead to any other result. It never can evolve the truth. It may vary the one side or the other, just in proportion as the Administration multiplies the troops and diminish the size of the staff, or the reverse; but it is false, work it out as you may.

In the argument of Mr. Calhoun, in his report of 1820, in answering then the very same objections which are made now, as to the expensive character of our peace establishment, he pointed out the unfairness of including the staff in such an argument, and running a parallel between the staff of our Army and others. A nation of Europe keeping on her peace establishment an army equal to her war purposes, and having it concentrated, and with a staff exactly commensurate to the size of that army, forms no standard of measure for a country like ours and an army like ours, where we preserve, in time of peace, a staff suited to the vast augmentation of our force, by bringing the militia into the field in time of war. The same argument which he made then is applicable now; but I shall not detain the Senate longer on this point.

I am not arguing that the expense of our military establishment is not great, or I should say more properly the expense of protecting our frontier. I am arguing rather that the whole theory on which the opposition rests is wrong. They contend that in proportion as you increase the number of men, you will increase the expenses of the Army. It is not so; because, if you use one regiment to perform the duty of five, you add to the expense of that regiment the transportation of moving it to the places where five would be stationed, and you increase the expenses of that regiment just in proportion as you move it over great distances. Then the expense comes in, as this year, in the form of transportation. It comes in exactly as that deficiency which was cited by the Senator from Maine, and which he argued should be included in the expense per capita. That is an expense which is proportionately great as you reduce the number of men. The transportation increases from the want of your ability to station the men wherever you need them, and you make up for that by taking the same man and using him at a number of places. Never in the history of any nation were such extensive marches and movements made, and that over plains so desert and so totally destitute of all supplies by the way, as our Army has made in the last two or three years.

This brings me to the argument of the Senator from Georgia, that on account of the improvements which have been made, an army of twenty-five thousand men is equal to what one hundred thousand would have been twenty-five years ago. Sir, twenty-five years ago we had none of these long marches to make which are reported by the Secretary of War. Twenty-five years ago our Indian frontier was within reach of supplies which could be sent on navigable water. It has been since that time that our Indian frontier has been pressed outward, the settlements advancing from navigable waters, throwing our military operations into a country where everything has to be transported at a vast expense, and where nothing is to be obtained, either on the road or at the place of destination. These are the elements of increasing expense, and the expense is not to be put down by making speeches about what has been done in former times, and what might be done now. It requires the coöperation of the legislative and executive branches, to reduce the expenses of the Army, or any other branch of the public service. Reforms have been asked, from year year, to improve the administration of the Army, but they have not been granted. The last two Administrations, as well as this, have recommended to Congress changes in the organization which would be conducive to economy and efficiency. Congress has not heretofore responded. Whilst it does not so respond, it seems as idle as it is easy to make declamation against the expenses of the military establishment.

We are told by the Senator from Georgia that he takes the standard of Mr. Calhoun, and he made the argument, which I am willing to pass over, that Mr. Calhoun left ten companies to the regiment, and therefore he was retaining the theory of Mr. Calhoun, against the invasion of that theory by the proposed bill. Sir, the theory of Mr. Calhoun was not any certain number of officers to the regiment; it was not any certain number of men to the company; it was not even any certain number of officers to the Army. He says, in his report, that those were things which varied with different countries, and must vary in the same country, at different times. He presented what he believed to be a good organization of the staff. What I claim respect for in relation to Mr. Calhoun's theory of organization, is the great principle on which it rested; not the details, which were to vary with circumstances, but the mighty truth, which his mind, contracting all light like a moral lens, brought on the subject. It was the truth of this theory of a skeleton army, in time of peace, for purposes of instruction and organization, with a staff adequate to the vast number of militia which would be called into the field whenever we should be engaged in a foreign war.

That theory he presented; that theory he defended; that theory has been justified by the practice and the experience of the establishment from that day to this. That theory is not violated by changing the number of men in a company, or the number of men in a regiment, or the number of companies in a regiment. The number of companies in a regiment varies from twelve to eight. It is not violated by increasing or reducing the Army. It would only be violated by establishing as a rule that we would on our peace establishment keep a certain number of companies required for frontier service, and swell them up to the war or maximum standard, and then, when we get into war, be compelled to meet its contingencies by raising new troops, or, as Mr. Calhoun said, introducing a new element instead of expanding the old one.

The Senator from Texas says there is a want of respectability in the rank and file of the Army, and he draws that want of respectability from their inability to obtain promotion. I answered him on that point this morning, and showed him that, at least, recent legislation had removed his argument, had opened the door wider than ever before, and the rank and file were in a better condition now than they were at the time to which he referred, so far as promotion was concerned. I endeavored—I will not say successfully—to controvert his idea that the present object was to diminish that opportunity. I sought to show, and I must say I believe I did show, that the first section of this bill was to increase the opportunities for the promotion of the rank and file, both to commissioned and non-commissioned officers.

But he repeated this morning something like the argument he made the other day when he averred that there was an impassable barrier between the rank and file and the commissioned officers, and he ascribes it all to the Military Academy as the root of the evil. He says these are political appointments. He seems to have a very bad opinion of a man because he has been instructed in a particular branch. He seems to reach the conclusion that it follows as a necessary consequence that if a man has been educated for a particular profession he is utterly unfit for it. Therefore, the lawyer who gets a license must be unfit to go into court; the surgeon who has walked the hospitals must be unable to perform an operation. It seems to me that the test to which they are applied ought to bring anybody's mind to a different conclusion.

I propose to notice that in connection with his arguments that this is political favoritism. I claim that on the theory which at present exists, we have the most democratic basis which could be incorporated into the Army. How are your cadets appointed? It is true the law leaves to the Executive the power to appoint; but it is well known that the practice is, and for many years has been, for the members of the congressional district in which a vacancy occurs, to nominate whomsoever he pleases from that district, and the Secretary of War always appoints the person so nominated. Then these appointments are political only in the sense that they represent every shade of political opinion which is represented in the House of Representatives, and that every political party which can have a voice in the House of Representatives has a representative in the Military Academy. Is that objectionable? If so, how is it proposed to be cured?

Then, again, the large number appointed, say one hundred per annum, exceeds the number who are commissioned, say forty or fifty, more than two to one. Thus double or more than double the chances are given to the youth of the country to get into the Academy that are offered to get places in the Army. I say you multiply the opportunities; and how is this brought to bear? From each congressional district a nomination may be made. The cadet so nominated enters the Academy, and there it depends on himself whether he shall go through and obtain a commission or not. When he attains that commission, he feels that he has something which he has won by his own effort; something he does not owe to the favor of any one, save so far as he may run back to the early favor he received from the member who nominated him to an office which was so small that the member had probably forgotten it. If, then, I say, there is any mode by which you could leave the officer of the Army without any political bias of character; any mode by which you could leave him independently to feel that he might entertain whatever opinions he pleased, it is that which you have adopted, and which enables him to reach a commission by his own effort, in contact with the struggling many by whom he is to be surrounded.

If you were to increase that Academy twofold in number, you would but render its principles more democratic; you would but increase the chances to youth to get position; you would but increase the struggle which would be required to obtain a commission, and give him additionally to feel that whatever he attained he owed to his country, and not to man; to himself, and not to mere political favoritism.

Several SENATORS requested Mr. DAVIS to yield the floor, as the hour was late.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I will conform to the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I appeal to the Senator from New York to withdraw that motion to permit me to move for an executive session. The public business requires it.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; the doors were closed; after some time they were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM PINKNEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill (No.

45) further to amend an act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask the gentleman to allow me to introduce a joint resolution providing for a mail route, for reference merely.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will it give rise to debate?

Mr. DAVIDSON. Oh, no; I merely want to have it referred.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will yield for that purpose.

POST ROUTE IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAVIDSON then introduced a joint resolution instructing the Postmaster General to establish a certain mail route; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask that the joint resolution be read for information.

The joint resolution was read. It instructs the Postmaster General to establish a mail route from Lavonia, via the new road or court-house of the parish of Point Coupé, to the landing on the Mississippi river known as the Point Coupé post office.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late.

Mr. HOUSTON. I objected as soon as I could hear the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. It was the second reading of the resolution.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRINTING OF THE PENSION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] desires to make a motion to print his pension bill. I have no objection to that, and yield for that purpose.

Mr. SAVAGE. I have received a large number of applications from members of the House, and from other quarters, for copies of the pension bill which I reported the other day from the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but I have been unable to supply those demands. I move that that bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMPHIS AN INSPECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. AVERY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill providing for the establishment of an inspection district at the city of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHILDREN OF EDWARD HARRIS.

Mr. HILL asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Pensions be instructed to deliver to the chairman of the Committee of this House on Revolutionary Claims, the original papers and documents on file in his office, appertaining to the claims of the children of Edward Harris and of Elizabeth Harris, his widow; and also to send to said committee all of the original papers in his office belonging to the claim of the children of Elizabeth Wilson, widow of John Wilson, deceased.

Mr. SEWARD. The resolution asks for the withdrawal of original papers from the Pension office. I think that it is not proper for us to grant leave for the withdrawal of original papers when copies can be supplied. I hope my colleague will amend his resolution in this particular.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the papers he refers to will be surrendered on application of the committee.

Mr. HILL. I withdraw my resolution. Copies will not answer the purpose I have in view, or I would be content with them.

RESOLUTIONS OF ALABAMA.

Mr. CURRY, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, in favor of the establishment of an armory in Shelby county in said State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTION OF TENNESSEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Governor of the State of Tennessee:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, February 4, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit through you to the House of Representatives, a joint resolution, passed at the present session of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

ISHAM G. HARRIS.

Hon. JAS. L. ORR, Speaker of House of Representatives.

The resolution inclosed was read, as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our Senators in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives most respectfully requested, to use all reasonable diligence and exertion to secure the passage through Congress of a bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war 1812, and the various Indian wars in which the Government has been engaged; and that the Governor of the State be respectfully requested to furnish copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress.

"Adopted, January 7, 1858."

On motion of Mr. SAVAGE, the communication was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, containing a statement of contracts made for 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, containing a list of clerks, &c., employed in that Department during the year 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, resumed the floor.

CLERK TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to give way for a moment that I may enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote of the House yesterday laying on the table the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] authorizing the special committee on the Pacific railroad to employ a clerk.

The motion was entered.

TENNESSEE RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow me to introduce a bill for reference to his own committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is it? Mr. MAYNARD. A bill of a local character merely.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection.

Mr. MAYNARD then, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to liquidate the unadjusted contracts of the Tennessee river improvement; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill which has been postponed until to-day for the consideration of the House, is a bill amending the act of 1852, entitled "An act better to provide for the security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam." It is not my purpose to go into a detailed explanation of the bill. I know how restive the House always becomes at hearing these detailed explanations; but I will endeavor to state briefly some of the most important provisions.

I will, however, state, in the first place, that at the last Congress a bill upon this subject was agreed upon by the Committees on Commerce in both Houses of Congress, on consultation with many gentlemen in the different parts of the country, and with the Secretary of the Treasury. That bill failed for want of time. At the commencement of the present session, I introduced a bill nearly identical in its provisions with that agreed upon at the last Congress. Two other bills for the same purpose were introduced, one by the gentleman from Louisiana on my left, [Mr. TAYLOR,] and one by the gentleman from California, [Mr. SCOTT.] They were also referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the three were taken up by the committee and a substitute agreed on, which I shall offer for the consideration of the House.

I trust it is not necessary for me to impress upon the House the importance of further legislation upon this subject. I think, from what we have all seen within the last few years, and the last few months, that we are admonished far more strongly than by any language I can use of the necessity there is for some action upon the part of Congress upon this subject. Sir, the recent terrible disaster to the steamer Central America, which has wrung so many hearts, and carried sorrow and desolation into nearly every family in the country, calls to us in the loudest tones to act in this matter, and endeavor, if we possibly can, to provide some regulations of law by which a recurrence of these terrible disasters may be prevented hereafter.

Now, sir, I propose to explain briefly the principal provisions of the bill. The bill itself, with a report of some eighteen pages, which have been printed, will prevent the necessity for explaining all the provisions in detail. I trust, if the House will give me their attention for a few moments, they will be satisfied that the bill ought to pass into a law. We have brought within the provisions of this bill steam ferry-boats, tug-boats, freight-boats, and other craft which were not included in the act of 1852, and upon which some of the most terrible accidents have happened in consequence of their not having been included under the provisions of the law of 1852, and of their not being subject to the inspection of the supervisors under that law. In this bill we bring within the law these boats, and place additional restrictions upon their carrying oil of turpentine, spirits of turpentine, vitriol, gunpowder, and other combustible and dangerous articles, and inflict additional penalties for carrying them.

We provide penalties for inscribing upon steamers false names. There is a law requiring the names of all vessels to be painted upon their sterns; but it has been the habit, in some of the large cities, while the regular name is painted upon the stern, to paint upon the wheel-houses, or in some other conspicuous place, some other name, by which the public are deceived. We inflict a heavy penalty for this offense. We provide further for the more complete and thorough inspection of steamboat boilers, and for carrying lights on sailing vessels. And there is another very important provision to which I wish to call the attention of the House. We provide that all these ocean-going passenger steamers shall be divided into watertight compartments and bulkheads. We provide for the proper number of boats, and determine how they shall be used. We also limit the number of passengers which shall be carried upon these ocean-going steamers. It has been found necessary to interpose the strong arm of the law against the cupidity of steamboat owners who have loaded their vessels going from this country to such an extent as to make a passage in them worse than the middle passage.

We provide for the removal of planks after the vessel shall have been built a certain length of time, so that it shall be determined whether the rot has gotten into her. We provide, also, that station bills shall be posted up in all the passenger steamers, in which shall be entered the names of all the passengers, and of the officers and crew of the boat, designating the station or part of the steamer assigned to each passenger and person on board, to prevent confusion in case of accident.

We provide, further, against granting certificates to any vessel or boat in which the inspector shall be directly or indirectly interested, and inflict a large penalty on them for doing so. We provide for an additional supervisor and inspector on the Pacific coast. At the time of the passage of the act of 1852, it was not considered necessary; but at the present time it is conceded that the appointment of a supervisor and inspector on that coast is necessary. We provide further.

We provide for the performance of the duties of inspector in certain specified cases—as where the regular inspector is sick, provided that in such cases where inspection is necessary, other parties may be called in, under certain restrictions, to make the inspection. We then regulate the salaries of local inspectors, and provide for the summoning of witnesses before the inspectors, and compelling their attendance.

We provide, further, that when an accident shall occur, there shall be made a full and complete report by the officer or person in charge, or, in his absence, by some licensed officer, to the first custom-house officer that can be reached. This report shall contain everything connected with the accident, shall be made under oath, and shall be made a matter of record, to which reference can be had for authentic information in regard to the accident.

There is another section, which is not in the printed substitute, but which is in the substitute which I shall offer, which provides against conspiracies or combinations on the part of pilots and other persons, the tendency of which is to obstruct commerce on the different rivers.

I will say, and it will conclude all I have to say, that the steamboat law of 1852 is nearly self-sustaining. I understand, from the parties who are engaged in its execution, that the fees of inspectors and other officers amount to what it costs the Government; and, sir, the additional salaries of additional boards of inspectors will be more than paid by the additional amount of fees to be paid by steamboats to be brought within the operation of this act.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAYLOR] has submitted a bill which would change the entire system. One of the provisions of that bill we have incorporated into the pending measure. The other provision we did not incorporate. We thought it would be unsafe to adopt the principle which it embraced, at this time. Although we concede to the gentleman great ability and great legal acumen, yet, as his proposition changes the entire principle of the law, we felt constrained to object to it. The gentleman, however, can have an opportunity of taking the sense of the House on the question, by moving it as an amendment to my substitute. I understand that the gentleman desires to submit some remarks on the subject. The gentleman from California [Mr. SCOTT] also desires to be heard. After these gentlemen have been heard, unless there shall be a strong desire on the part of other gentlemen to address the House, I hope the House will second the call for the previous question, that we may come to a vote upon the bill to-day.

Let me say, in anticipation of a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the plea of perfecting it, as it is called, that I would much rather that the House would lay the bill upon the table, and at once kill it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the gentleman's particular objection to a reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Because, to make that reference is to give the bill a lingering death.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I propose making some remarks in relation to the bill which is now before the consideration of this House, and shall confine myself more particularly to that portion of it which has reference to our ocean steamers. On the 20th of January I introduced a bill "to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of steamers navigating the ocean propelled wholly or in part by steam." That bill was read twice, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed. The committee, after due deliberation, and after a thorough consultation with persons who were considered experts in such matters, have reported favorably, and incorporated my bill in the one which is now before this House.

I know that many high and important questions, of a national character, are now absorbing not only the attention of this House, but the entire country. Already the great eye of the people is turned with a painful anxiety, and with a deep solicitude to our future course—to that vexed and threatening question, Kansas; and scarcely will the wild, fierce, and turbulent waves of sectionalism be settled by a proper adjustment, before another will again be presented, to agitate and distract this body, in the imposing form of the Utah and Nicaraguan difficulties. While I am free to confess, that, in each and all of these questions are involved great principles, requiring the combined wisdom of this distinguished body to fairly and justly reconcile, I nevertheless believe that the bill which is now before us is only secondary in importance to any measure, saving those which I have already alluded to.

It is true, sir, that no partisan press has heralded forth its advent. It is true that no popular tumult has given it a noted and a wide-spread reputation; its object and its purport have only been advocated periodically, when some sad, afflicting, and dire steamboat calamity was visited upon us.

Then there would be a spasmodic action on the part of the public sentiment and the public press to prevent these steamboat abuses, which would scarcely last longer than the dying groans of those who had fallen victims either to the avarice, cupidity, or criminal negligence of the steamboat monopolies that are now looming up in our midst, and who, by their ill-gotten gains, have finally become so wealthy, so powerful, as to deal with impunity in the safety and life of all who may, by force of circumstances or by chance, commit themselves to their care.

Now, sir, whilst this whole Union is mourning over those who have fallen upon the battle-field of Kansas in the advocacy of their respective doctrines, whilst morality and decency are crying aloud and calling for redress against the polygamy of Mormonism, whilst the avowed advocates of law and order are fiercely denouncing filibusterism, and lamenting over the sad fate of those who have fallen bravely and gallantly upon Nicaragua's soil, where has been the tear yet shed, the sympathy yet manifested by this body, for those who have been consigned to the watery caverns of the sullen deep?

Coming from a constituency that is immediately and directly interested in this subject, who are compelled alone to confine themselves to an oceanic route for the want of a better, I conceive it to be a duty which I owe them as their Representative, to place the object and intent of this bill in a true and proper light before you. I shall, therefore, briefly review those provisions which have reference to ocean steamers, and endeavor to show the effects and consequences that have already ensued for the want of proper congressional legislation on this subject, and the benefits and advantages that will inevitably follow by the passage of the bill. In doing this, I will have to ask your kind indulgence, as these matters are not surrounded with the fascinating charms of a political or constitutional question, but are merely statistical and dry in their character.

I will go back as far as the year 1851, and will enumerate a number of steam vessels that have been wrecked, lives that have been sacrificed, and treasures that have been lost, all attributable, as I sincerely believe, to the want of such a bill as is now before you.

Making the aggregate amount of treasure and property lost in five years on the ocean, $17,750,000 in steam vessels alone; and the number of persons who have thus perished amount to over two thousand human beings. In addition to this, if we examine the loss of life and property on our lakes in the years 1854, 1855 and 1856, we find that it amounts to $5,258,625, and six hundred and forty-four lives; which, added to the losses on the ocean steamers, amounts to the enormous sum of $23,008,625, and over three thousand lives.

Now, is not this startling, and does not this state of facts loudly and imperatively call upon Congress to pass some law, so positive, so stringent in its character, as to stay this reckless, this inhuman and indiscriminate sacrifice of life, and wanton destruction of property? We have discovered that, in the short space of six years, over twenty-three million dollars have been consigned to the sea, and over three thousand souls have been buried in the "deep bosom of the ocean," by what we believe to be negligence, or a willful mismanagement on the part of those who own and who are interested in steamboats in this country. Now, this bill proposes to remedy this evil by making it the legal duty of all steamboat owners so to construct their steamships hereafter that in the event of their meeting with the dangers and perils that are incidental to the sea, they will be able to contend with and overcome them; or, if by accident the ship is lost, this bill amply provides, in my estimation, for the preservation of life, and for the security and safety of the treasure which may be on board.

Some of these provisions may appear to operate with severity and a degree of hardship upon the companies owning these vessels, on account of the expenses necessarily incurred in carrying out their requirements. In answer to any such objections, I would simply state that I believe that before the expiration of a year after the passage of this bill, they will be as much benefited as those whose lives are saved and whose property is preserved by its just and humane operations. For by its passage the risk that they incur of losing their vessels will be largely diminished, and the rates of insurance will decrease in a corresponding ratio, thus saving the owners of steamers a heavy tax as insurance money, whilst their receipts will be heavily increased when the traveling community receives the assurance that there is safety on board their steamers.

The thirteenth section of this bill provides "that all passenger steamers navigating the ocean shall be furnished with at least three watertight cross bulkheads, forming separate compartments." As regards this provision, I have been informed by numerous gentlemen, competent judges in such matters, that the expense of constructing these cross bulkheads in vessels already built will be attended with but small cost, whilst the additional guarantee of safety, both to life and property, will be almost incalculable.

This is no vain and empty assertion; and in order to satisfy this House of its truth and correctness, and also to demonstrate the immense superiority that a vessel that is constructed with these cross-bulkheads has over one that does not possess them, I will cite the melancholy loss of the Collins steamer Arctic, which came in collision with the French steamer Vesta. The Arctic foundered immediately after she struck, whilst the French steamer Vesta, reached a harbor with her bows almost out of the water. Why was this? Because the Arctic was not constructed with these compartments, and the Vesta was, and consequently owed her safety in reaching port to that fact, and that fact alone.

Again, another case which has occurred more recently, illustrates the necessity of having our steamers so constructed. I allude to the Sarah Sands. She caught fire in the Indian ocean, with several hundred troops on board. This steamer was nearly destroyed and partly blown up by gunpowder, but being constructed in the manner prescribed by this section, she reached the Isle of France in safety. Here, then, is practical evidence of the utility, the efficiency, in fact the emphatic necessity of three compartments. Had the San Francisco, or Central America, and many others, been so constructed, we would not now be moaning over their sad and lamentable fate; neither would the destiny of the Pacific or the President be now clothed in an impenetrable mystery, of which no human mind can know more than that they are lost, and lost forever.

This bill also provides, in section fourteen, for a certain number of boats and pumps. There certainly can be no objection to that provision; for every steamboat company ought and should be compelled by law to look out for the safety and security of the lives of their passengers in the event of accident; and the only way that their lives can be preserved in such cases is, by having ample means, such as boats, pumps, rafts, and other appliances, to assist them in the hour of danger and in the time of peril. What was the situation of affairs on board the Central America, at the time when she went down on the 12th of September last? We find, from the evidence in this case, elicited by the committee of investigation of New York, that there were six hundred persons on board of her, and that she only had boats sufficient to carry one hundred and twenty persons in fair weather; we also find her pumps inadequate and insufficient for the occasion, and that she could have been easily and readily saved, if the necessary appliances which this bill provides for had been on board of her. Why, the Eldorado, Captain Burt, ran within fifty yards of her stern. If she had been in possession of a mortar and a life-car, as provided for in this bill, she could have shot a line on board of the Eldorado, made her fast by means of a hawser, and every human being and every dollar of treasure could have been conveyed from the Central America to the Eldorado. Unfortunately, and to our shame be it spoken, the law did not require her to have these on board, and the Eldorado, a small schooner drawing only seven feet of water, drifted some six or seven miles to leeward of her by morning, and was entirely incapable of rendering that service which the dictates of humanity demanded, and which her captain and crew were desirous of affording.

Section sixteen provides "that no steamer shall be permitted to carry more than one person for every seven tons of lawful tonnage measurement." I deem this a most wise and salutary provision; for I have traveled several times on the ocean steamers plying between the harbors of New York and Aspinwall, and from Panama to San Francisco, and I know that the companies now owning these California steamers are accustomed to crowd passengers on their vessels without regard to the safety of life, and utterly regardless of comfort and health. The European steamers seldom carry more than prescribed in this section, whilst I have seen six to seven hundred persons on a vessel of two thousand tonnage, and one thousand to twelve hundred on a vessel not over three thousand tons, which vessels did not have boats enough to rescue one sixth of the persons in the event of fire, leakage, or any other accident which might have compelled them to resort to the boats. I never yet have seen on these vessels a life-car or a mortar, articles that I conceive to be indispensable, and which are provided for by Government at the various "life-boat stations" on the coast.

As regards the "removal of two outside and two ceiling planks from each side of the vessel every five years," as set forth in section eighteen, is very important in its nature and object, and should be rigorously enforced; for past history on this subject shows conclusively that such a removal should be made, if we wish to avoid rotten hulls and unseaworthy vessels as a means for transportation of life and treasure. As an evidence, I point you to the steamer Illinois as one of the many cases. This steamer, carrying the United States mails, and commanded by a naval officer, was, a few weeks since, on the eve of her departure from the harbor of New York, when, by the merest accident, she was found to be so badly decayed as to render it necessary to remove some fifty feet of her outside plank. Had not this timely and most fortunate discovery been made, we would have had the sad and painful duty of again recording the sacrifice of a few more hundred lives, either to the culpability, cupidity, or carelessness of these steamship companies. And in addition to the above case, I here offer, in testimony of the necessity of this provision, the names of a list of vessels that have rotted within the period of five years from the time of their construction.

Again, there is another provision in section twenty-second that I consider very important, and to which I wish briefly to call the attention of this House: it is in relation to steamboat inspectors, and whilst it is far from my intention to cast any reflection upon the character, the standing, or integrity of these gentlemen, I nevertheless believe that according to Scripture, "a man cannot serve both God and mammon;" hence my desire to prevent these inspectors from being in any way connected in any manner, shape, or form, with steamboats or steamboat companies, so that their inspections may be fair and impartial, and not swayed or influenced by pecuniary motives. If interested parties are to pass judgment upon their own interest, or part owners of steamers are to certify to their seaworthiness, the whole matter becomes a grand farce, and the traveling community becomes a prey to a combination of steamboat organizations, of agencies, inspectors, Government officers, whose immediate and direct interest will be to shield the enormities and offenses of these monster steamboat companies, and to perpetuate a system of duplicity and fraud upon the innocent and unsuspecting traveler, that only assures to him a sure and speedy death by intrusting his body to their kind and tender mercies.

Again: section nineteen provides that all authority shall be vested in the captain of the steamship, and that he shall have entire control over every department of the ship. This may cause some surprise, as it is enunciating an old common-law principle; but investigation of the loss of the Central America revealed the astounding fact that chief engineers were not under the control or subject to the command of the captain. Now if this state of affairs be true, we find an imperium in imperio on board of our steamers; and that where there should be but one head in the hour of danger—when human life and property are involved in the great stake, that disorder and confusion will inevitably prevail, from a conflict of opinions arising from having two commanders, who may differ in regard to the best method of saving the ship. To obviate this, the provision vests all power in the captain; and to him, and none other, is intrusted the fate of the ship, and to whom all shall bow in implicit obedience.

I have thus briefly and hastily as possible reviewed the various provisions of this bill relating to ocean steamers, and have arrived at the conclusion that it is sufficient and adequate to meet the present demands and requirements of the country, by insuring and guaranteeing by its operations better security to the lives of the traveling community. If steamers are compelled to have water-tight compartments, to have boats sufficient to carry each, all, and every passenger; if they have a mortar and a life-car, by which they can communicate and become connected with another vessel at sea; if they will have pumps, to be worked by manual labor, and donkey-pumps to be worked by steam; if they are inspected every five years, in order to ascertain their soundness; if they are intrusted to able and efficient commanders, who shall have the whole, sole, and entire control of them; and, above all, if they are inspected by local and supervisory inspectors, who are purely actuated by conscientious motives of official duty; I ask, in the name of common sense and common justice, if the fearful, and I may truly say, almost appalling risk that is now incurred, will not be greatly diminished?

Why is it that we do not hear of these frightful losses of life on European steamers? It is from the simple fact that ample means are provided by law for their prevention, and for the insurance of human life. Examine the laws of England regulating her ocean steamers, and it will bring a blush of burning shame to the cheek of every one who is capable of feeling, when we compare them with ours, and discover how infinitely superior they are. The utter recklessness on this subject which is now and has heretofore been manifested by the "universal Yankee nation," cries aloud for a remedy; and our national character as a humane, benign, and Christian people, demands that we should pass some law by which this wholesale butchery and indiscriminate slaughter of men, women, and children, upon our ocean steamers, shall be stayed. When we do this, we will have performed an act which will elevate us in the standard of the civilized nations of the globe, and will add additional reputation to us, as being among the first in the great commercial and maritime world.

I cannot conclude my remarks without alluding to the deep interest which the State which I have the honor to represent feels on this subject. The flag of our country announced, on the 10th of July, 1846, the conquest and occupation of California by American valor. Gold was soon discovered; and scarcely had the wonderful tidings been borne by the gentle zephyrs of the placid Pacific to the stormy shores of the boisterous Atlantic, when, as if by magic, the love of enterprise, the spirit of adventure, so peculiarly characteristic of our hardy and intrepid countrymen, was fully aroused, and thousands left their homes and their firesides to visit the golden land—

"Bearing their birthrights proudly on their backs,
To make a hazard of new fortune there."

Obstacles almost insurmountable seemed to arise to arrest their onward march; the cold and threatening Horn, the trackless desert, the boundless plain, the fatal rencontre, the tomahawk of the relentless savage created no fear in the stout hearts of these hardy adventurers, but like the old guard of Napoleon, in their ruinous retreat from burning Moscow, their courage only increased with the surrounding dangers. It is these men who have borne in triumph through every danger, every difficulty, and every hardship, the free and enlightened principles of republicanism to the far-off shores of the Pacific, and have so nurtured and cherished them that they now spread their benign and genial influence over the oppressed of every clime. It is these men who now stand in this Hall to-day, and ask you, through their Representatives, that, in the name of their past services, by the recollection of their past deeds, and by the remembrance of the present ties that bind them to you, you will save them from being sacrificed and immolated on the selfish altar of these steamboat monopolies.

The California of to-day is far from being the California of 1846; for then she had only twelve thousand beings, save the degraded aborigines; now she has over a half a million population, and her sea-going tonnage, in and out, is only surpassed by New York, Massachusetts, and Louisiana. Every avenue of her glittering domain is crowded with the sturdy sons of every clime; whilst every State in our Confederacy has furnished her quota. Few may be aware of the number of passengers and the amount of treasure that are annually shipped from the harbor of San Francisco to New York. From information, through a letter and statistics, kindly furnished me by the distinguished collector of the port of New York,

I have been able to ascertain nearly the precise amount.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, NEW YORK.

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, January 22, 1858.

Sir: In reply to the inquiries contained in your letter of the 19th instant, I have the honor to submit the following:

The total number of passengers sailed from New York for San Francisco, in steamships, from January 1, 1856, to January 1, 1858, is 20,095. The total number of passengers arrived at this port from California, during same period, is 17,161. The total tonnage of steam vessels running between this port and Aspinwall is 16,747 tons. No treasure has been exported from this port for Aspinwall during the above period. The total amount of specie arrived at this port in steamships from Aspinwall, during same period, is, as per inclosed statement, $72,951,363 68.

I have no means of ascertaining the tonnage of the steam vessels employed in carrying passengers between Panama and San Francisco, but I have no doubt you can obtain that information at the Treasury Department. I shall be happy at all times to furnish you with any additional information you may desire, if in my power.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AUGUSTUS SCHELL, Collector.

Hon. C. L. Scott, Washington, D. C.

From this we find that the total number of passengers from New York for San Francisco, from 1st of January 1856, to 1st of January, 1858, is 20,095; the total number arrived at this port from California during the same period, is 17,161; making the aggregate number going to and fro in two years, 37,257. Now, it is reasonable to suppose that one fourth of that number have gone by the way of New Orleans, Charleston, and Havana; which amounts to 9,314; which, being added to 37,257, makes the whole number 46,671, which is annually 23,285 passengers. As regards treasure, $72,951,363 68 has arrived at the port of New York from California; and acknowledging that one fourth or fifth of the above amount has also been shipped by the way of New Orleans, Charleston, and Havana, it amounts to nearly ninety or a hundred million dollars that has been shipped from California in the last two years; and in this calculation we do not include the millions that are brought here by private individuals on their persons.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say truly, and without the fear of contradiction, that upwards of fifty million dollars is annually transported from the shores of my State to the Atlantic States; and that nearly twenty-five thousand persons are conveyed over the oceanic route that is traversed by the United States mail steamship and Pacific mail steamship companies semi-monthly.

With these facts before us, does it not become our bounden duty to throw some safeguard, to give some protection, to this mighty interest, both in human life and property—equal to any with which this great Union is prominently and immediately interested in, and directly identified with? I shall not now array before the bar of this House either the United States mail or the Pacific mail steamship companies; but the day is not far distant when, if an opportunity offers, I will certainly avail myself of it, and hold them to a strict accountability for the deep wrongs and injuries which they have already inflicted on my State.

When I reflect upon the loss of that ill-fated ship, the Central America, how deeply impressed I am with the urgent necessity of the passage of this bill. I cannot refrain from paying a passing tribute of respect and reverence to the memory of those who perished on that sad and ever to be remembered day. Courage is indeed a noble quality, and none other elicits stronger admiration. Many have immortalized themselves, and have written their names high on the scroll of fame by their deeds of valor amidst the din and carnage of battle and the roaring and crushing cannon; but the truest, the noblest, the purest courage, is when the soul of man quails not, but looks death calmly in the face solely to maintain a principle or to advocate a right.

You may search the annals of history through, and tell me where you will find a case on record that will compare in heroism and true manly courage to that which was exhibited by those four hundred brave spirits that stood on the sinking deck of the lost ship, the Central America. There, far, far away from the distant land, with the wild, surging, roaring waves dashing against their frail bark, with the dark, gloomy, and lowering storm-clouds casting the somber hue of a mighty pal over them, did these men stand firm and undaunted, resolved to save the weak and terrified women and helpless children. They are gone, gone to that bourne whence no traveler returns; no marble monument marks the spot where they sleep, for the fathomless depths of the dark caverns of the deep is their grave, and the chilly waters of the restless ocean is their winding sheet. The eternal heaving of the moving waves of the Atlantic chants forth their funeral dirge, whilst the low, whistling, and sad moaning of the ocean winds sings a solemn requiem in honor of their burial. Peace, peace be to the respected and revered dead; for there is not a mother, a wife, a sister, or one who bears the name of woman, who will not drop a tear of sympathy for these noble spirits, who perished in such a holy cause.

They were our countrymen; and as such they have added new and fresh laurels to our national reputation, which each and all of you can appreciate and admire in common; but to me they were bound by stronger and more affectionate ties: they were Californians; and as such a generous State weeps and moans over the loss of her dead, whilst she points with the finger of pride to their noble deeds, and challenges the heroes of every land and every clime to emulate them. God forbid that ever the like should occur again; and it is for you to say to-day whether you will shield and protect such gallant men, by passing laws that will prevent the repetition of such a calamity, or whether these steamboat companies shall have unbridled license to run their steamers, regardless of life. If you adopt the latter course, the day is not far distant when many of you will have to mourn over the untimely end of some relative or dear friend, as I do to-day over the loss of a host of friends.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am not certain that the condition of my lungs will enable me to be heard by the House, or that I shall be able to say what I desire upon the subject before the House. Before I commence my remarks, I submit the following amendment to the substitute:

Add, as additional sections, the following:

That no insurance upon any vessel propelled wholly or in part by steam, and carrying passengers out of any port of the United States to any port of a foreign nation, or between two or more of the several States, or between a State and Territory of the United States, or in the Territories of the United States, or upon the freight to be earned by said vessel, shall be effected by any owner of such vessel, or by any person for the benefit or advantage of any owner of the same, until all the provisions of law in relation to the build, machinery, and equipments of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers, and intended to guard against loss or danger from fire or the explosive force of steam, to prevent accidents tending to the injury or loss of passengers, and to aid their escape upon the occurrence of accidents, have been fully complied with; and that if any insurance shall at any time be effected in violation of this prohibition upon any such vessel so carrying passengers, and such vessel be lost or suffer injury upon the voyage from any cause whatever, that then and in that case, if the said provisions of law had not in point of fact been complied with, and the said vessel was not in the condition prescribed by law as to build, machinery, and equipments at the time of leaving port when the voyage began, the said contract of insurance shall be, and the same is hereby, declared absolutely null and void, and no right of action of any kind whatsoever shall be had thereon.

And be it further enacted, That no person who was, after the passage of this act, as engineer, in charge of an engine on any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers as aforesaid, at the time when an explosion of the boiler or boilers on the said vessel took place, which caused loss of life to any of the passengers; that no person who was, after the passage of this act, as pilot, in charge of any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers as aforesaid, at the time when a collision between the said vessel and any other vessel took place, which caused loss of life to any of the passengers on said vessel, or which caused loss of life to any person on the vessel come in collision with; and that no person who, as master or captain, was, after the passage of this act, in charge of a vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers as aforesaid, at a time when a fire broke out on the said vessel which consumed the same wholly or in part, and caused the loss of life to any of the passengers on said vessel—shall be employed in any capacity whatsoever on any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers as aforesaid, by the owner or owners of the same, or by their agent or agents, until the said person or persons shall have been tried, according to law, upon a charge of manslaughter, and shall have been found not guilty, and, in addition thereto, been declared, by a special verdict of a jury, to have been entirely free of all censure for misconduct, negligence, or inattention in relation to any matter or thing leading to said loss of life: Provided, always, That the said prohibition shall not attach to any person in any case in which a grand jury may investigate the facts connected with any loss of life as aforesaid, and shall refuse to find any bill of indictment against such person, and declare, by a written report accompanying their finding, that the said person was free of any misconduct, negligence, or inattention in the premises.

And be it further enacted, That if any person shall be knowingly employed on board of any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers as aforesaid, by the owner or owners of the same, or by their agent or agents, to discharge the duties of engineer, pilot, or master, or captain, and the said vessel should be lost or suffer injury while any one was actually employed thereon in violation of said prohibition as aforesaid, then and in that case any policy of insurance on the said vessel, taken out by or for the benefit and advantage of the owners of the said vessel, shall be, and the same is hereby declared, absolutely null and void, and no right of action of any kind whatsoever shall be had thereon.

And be it further enacted, That the master, or the owner or owners of any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers as aforesaid, shall, prior to the departure of such vessel on any voyage from any port of the United States where there is a collector, or any officer performing the duties of a collector, make and deposit in the office of the said collector or other officer performing the functions of collector at said port, a statement in writing, and under oath, of the names of the persons employed on the said vessel as engineers, pilots, masters, or captains, and mates, for the said voyage; and that for every failure to make and deposit such statement in writing and under oath as aforesaid, the master or the owner or owners of the said vessel shall be liable to pay a penalty of five hundred dollars, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction from the said master; or, if the payment of the same cannot be enforced against him, then to be recovered in like manner from the owner or owners of said vessel.

And be it further enacted, That whenever any accident shall happen to any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers as aforesaid, by which there is loss of life to any passenger on board of the same, or to any person on board of any other vessel, it shall be the duty of the master of the said vessel to report the same at the first port at which the said master of the said vessel shall land or arrive after the said accident, within twenty-four hours after his said landing or arrival; and the said report shall be made to the collector of the customs, or other officer performing the functions of collector, if the same be a port of the United States or its Territories, or to the consul or vice consul of the United States, if it be a foreign port. And the said report shall be made in writing and under oath, and shall contain a statement of the name of the vessel, the port from which she cleared or took her departure, and the port she was bound to; the names of the officers of said vessel, and, as near as may be, the number and names of the passengers on board of the same; the nature and cause of the accident; the place and time when the said accident occurred; the number of passengers lost or injured, and their names, as far as may be, and the extent of the injury done to the vessel. And any master who shall willfully fail or neglect to make a report and statement as aforesaid shall be liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and to be imprisoned not more than three months, at the discretion of the court.

And be it further enacted, That if an accident should occur to any vessel as aforesaid, and no report of the same should be made, as required by the preceding section, to the collector or consul of the port at which the passengers and crew first land and arrive, as aforesaid, either because of the loss, physical disability, or willful default of the master of the same, then it shall be the duty of the collector or consul of or at the port aforesaid to ascertain the facts connected with the said accident from the survivors, all or a part of whom shall be called before the said collector or consul and examined on oath; and the said collector or consul shall, from the facts ascertained by them, make out a statement in relation to the same, as nearly as may be, in conformity with the one provided for in the preceding section.

And be it further enacted, That the said collectors and consuls shall file all original statements made to them in relation to accidents as aforesaid by the master of any vessel as aforesaid, as prescribed in the fifth section; and all statements prepared by themselves, as prescribed in the sixth section, in their respective offices, where they shall remain on record.

And be it further enacted, That the said consuls shall, immediately after filing any statement as aforesaid, make out two copies of the same, one of which shall be transmitted at once to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other shall be transmitted to the collector of the port from which the said vessel, the subject of said accident, was cleared; that the said collectors, or other officers performing the functions of collectors, at the ports of the United States or in the Territories of the United States, shall, immediately after filing any statement as aforesaid, make out two copies of the same, one of which shall be at once placed in the hands of the district attorney of the United States for the district, and the other shall be forthwith transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury; and that the said collectors shall, in the like manner, make one copy of any statement sent to them by any consul of the United States, and place the same at once in the hands of the district attorney of the United States for the district.

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall file the said statements transmitted to him by the said collectors and consuls, as aforesaid, in his office, and that he shall, from time to time, as they are received, cause the same to be printed, and printed copies of the same to be sent or transmitted to all the collectors or other officers performing the functions of collectors, one of which shall remain in their respective offices for reference to be by the owners or masters of vessels, consignees, insurance companies, or underwriters, and others having an interest in the matters set forth in the same.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the collector, or other person performing the functions of collector, at any port of the United States, or in the Territories of the United States, in which a statement was filed as provided for in the — section, prior to the departure of the vessel subject to the accident described in any statement transmitted to him by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the voyage during which the said accident occurred, to compare the names of the officers of said vessel, as set forth in the two statements; and in the event of any discrepancy between the two statements, to give information of the same, and wherein it consists, to the Secretary of the Treasury forthwith, who will, if in his judgment it may be necessary, give public notice of the same by a circular letter to all whom it may concern.

And be it further enacted, That every case arising under the provisions of the second section of this act, where there has been a prosecution according to law, which has been terminated by a special verdict of a jury, or a report of a grand jury, declaring the person proceeded against to have been entirely free of all censure for misconduct, negligence, or inattention, as set forth in said section, shall be immediately communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury by the clerk of the court in which the said proceeding was had, by transmitting to him a copy of the indictment therein and of the verdict of the jury on the same; or, when the grand jury refused to find an indictment, by transmitting a copy of the charge preferred and of the report of the grand jury thereupon. And it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the same to be printed, and to send copies thereof to all the collectors of the United States, or other officers performing the duties of collectors, who are hereby directed and required to file the same and keep them of record in their respective offices for the inspection of all having an interest in the same.

The subject before the House, Mr. Speaker, is one of the most important that can engage its attention. It is one which contemplates the exercise of the constitutional power of this Government to regulate commerce, for the purpose of throwing additional security round the lives of passengers on board of steam vessels and steamboats. It is well known that accidents have been of perpetual occurrence on board of steamboats and steam vessels navigating our western lakes and rivers and navigating the ocean. From day to day, for years, the public mind has been agitated by accounts of the most extraordinary and of the most shocking accidents; accidents which have been attended with a great loss of life, under circumstances which were calculated to harrow the feelings of the survivors, as well as to give additional pangs in their death to those who were the victims.

It is well known to this House that in 1838, for the first time, the power of the General Government was invoked for the purpose of attempting to establish some system, adopt and enforce some regulation, which would have the likelihood of lessening the frequency of these catastrophes. A law was passed at that time making provision in relation to the mode of building boats, establishing rules with respect to the arrangement of the machinery which should be employed on board of them, with a view to guard as far as possible against accidents, and pronouncing penalties against those who were in their charge for negligence or the result of inattention. This did not have the effect of preventing a recurrence of those accidents. From year to year, after the occurrence of some accident of extraordinary magnitude and attended with great loss of life, Congress has again and again had its attention directed to the subject, in the hope of applying a remedy to the evil. Again and again it has exerted its power with a view to extending protection to those whose necessities or whose pleasure make them passengers on board of these vessels.

The provisions of all of these laws are of the same character. These provisions were of two classes, and were intended to operate on all the causes tending to occasion loss of life. The first class of provisions was intended to operate upon the owners of vessels, and by compelling them to conform to certain rules in the construction of their vessels, in the character of the machinery, and in the equipments which they put on board of them, with a view to the saving of life in the event of accident. The other class related to the action of those who were in charge of these vessels, who were responsible for their navigation, and upon whose care, upon whose attention in the discharge of their duties, the lives of passengers depended. This bill proposes additional requisitions of the same character; the imposition of penalties of the same description. But, Mr. Speaker, experience has shown that all previous requirements of law, all such penalties have been unavailing; that the requisitions made upon the owners of boats in relation to their construction, to their equipment, to their machinery, and to the means and appliances of escape in the event of accident, have not been complied with. Experience has shown, too, that again and again accidents result from the inattention or the negligence or the gross misconduct of the officers in charge, without their being subjected to any penalty. It is not the fault of the law, because the law contains provisions which are ample. If the owners of boats comply with the law, the chances of accident are diminished; and in the event of the occurrence of accident, the chances of escape are multiplied. If they fail to comply, the policy of the law is not carried out; and when the accident occurs, the lives of our citizens are sacrificed. It is the same with reference to the officers charged with the conduct of these vessels, and upon whose care and skill depends the safety of the passengers on board. The penalties pronounced against their want of care are severe; but they, too, go unwhipped of justice.

It has been my fortune to have been several times present to witness the sad results following upon the explosion of boilers on steamboats. I have seen again and again the mutilated remains of those victims of negligence, the torn bodies of those whose forms were shattered and torn asunder by fragments put in motion by the explosive power of steam. It has been my fortune to have been on board one of our lake steamers when a catastrophe of that kind occurred, and I there saw the dead, scorched, and burned by that dreadful agent, heated steam. I saw there, too, numbers in the pangs of death from injuries and scalds, shocking to behold, and heard their shrieks in their last agonies.

In consequence of my having been present in the midst of such scenes, my attention has been much directed to this subject. Upon that occasion, though it was my conviction, though it was the conviction of every passenger upon the boat, that the catastrophe occurred through recklessness upon the part of the officers in charge of the vessel, and the most shameless recklessness on the part of the engineer in charge of the engine, not only were none of the penalties imposed by law inflicted, but there was no inquiry. Why? The vessel which was the scene of this disaster was encountered upon the broad lake, a wreck, by one of the steamers engaged in the same line. It was taken in tow, and carried, not to the port of destination or to the port of departure, but into one of the smaller ports along the lake shore. When it arrived there, the passengers departed as suited their convenience. No inquiry was instituted. It was the pecuniary interest of no one to engage in an investigation; no one had the power to enter upon the matter and compel a thorough investigation; and the consequence was, that in that instance, the criminals went unwhipped of justice. It is the experience of every one who has had any acquaintance with these matters, that the law is not enforced; that in a large majority of instances investigations are not undertaken, and that when they are, they are ineffectual; because there is no individual, except the public officer, to conduct the investigation. There is the stimulus of interest upon the part of the owners of the boats; the stimulus of interest upon the part of the officers whose criminal negligence might have led to the catastrophe, to prevent an investigation; or, when undertaken, to prevent its being made effectual; while, on the other hand, there is nothing but official duty to encounter those efforts prompted by the most powerful motives that can operate on the human mind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am persuaded that no matter how proper may be the provisions of law adopted in relation to the building of steamboats; no matter how proper are the provisions of law in regard to the construction of machinery, and the adoption of safeguards to prevent accidents; in regard to the provision of means of escape, and to preserve life when these accidents do occur; no matter how violent and extreme the penalties that may be pronounced upon individuals for want of care and for inattention; they never will be enforced, and the safety of individuals will never be secured, until we travel out of the beaten track, and invoke some new principle; unless we introduce into our legislation some new feature. It is the object of the amendment which I have had the honor to submit, to invoke and put into action that new principle.

I will now proceed to display to the House, as briefly as possible, the features of this proposed change of policy. I have said that the laws are not now enforced because all the pecuniary interests are arrayed, either in preventing investigations, or, when they are undertaken, in defeating them; that they are not enforced because the burden of proof in relation to the misdeeds of those in charge of the engines, those in charge of the boats as pilots or as captains, is thrown upon the prosecution. They are not punished, because they always have the advantage of those principles of law which make it the duty of criminal courts, when there is room for doubt, to excuse the one accused of crime.

Now, the object of our legislation on this subject is not to punish crime. The object is simply to secure passengers on board of steamships, so far as human care can do it, from the effect of accidents fatal to life. In order that that may be effected, the national Legislature interferes for the purpose of saying what shall be the construction of vessels, what shall be the particular plan of the machinery, what shall be the safeguards against the explosion of boilers; and it also interferes for the purpose of saying to the engineers, the pilots, the masters of vessels, that they shall exercise every care that man is capable of exercising to insure the safety of those who are placed under their charge.

Now, sir, the bill which I present proposes to bring into play the pecuniary interests of men; to make those interests agents in enforcing the law; to array in support of the law the strongest motives which can operate upon the human mind. That is attempted to be accomplished by two classes of provisions. One provision, contained in the first section of that act, proposes to declare that no insurance shall be effected upon the hull of any steamboat carrying passengers, or upon the freight to be earned by that steamboat, unless the owner has complied with the requisitions of the law in relation to its construction, its machinery, and equipments. That is, it is intended to make it the interest of the owner to comply with the law; because, if he fails to do so, he necessarily incurs the loss of his property if it be destroyed by an accident; for the section goes on further, and provides that if a policy of insurance be taken out upon the body of the vessel, or upon the freight to be earned by it, in behalf of the owner, or for his benefit; that if it shall turn out that at the time of leaving port, when the voyage began, the law had not been complied with in relation to the construction of the boat, its machinery, and equipments, designed for the safety and preservation of passengers, then, in the event of accident, if the vessel be lost, and the fact is shown in a court of justice, any such policy of insurance shall be absolutely null and void, and give no right of action to the owner or any one in his behalf, or for his benefit.

And, Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this section are right. They are founded upon this principle: that when the law commands that certain things shall be done in the public interest—that certain things shall be done for the security of the life of the citizen—if a man whose duty it is to obey that command fails to do so, the law will not extend to him its aid to enable him to repair the loss he may have incurred whilst violating the law. I conceive there is no man who will not admit that that is a sound and proper principle. And what will be its effect? It will have the effect of arraying the interests of the whole mass of underwriters in aid of the enforcement of the provisions of law, adopted for the purpose of securing human life, for the purpose of preventing those terrible catastrophes that again and again, and every day, afflict this community. Why, sir, since these very bills have been reported to the House, there have been many accidents of this character, some from collisions, three from fire, in which there has been a loss of nearly a hundred souls, and three or four from explosions of steamboat boilers. I conceive that it is eminently proper and right that human interests should be invoked and called into play for the purpose of protecting human life, and that it is not only the right of Congress, but that it is the duty of Congress, to make use of every means for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of these accidents—accidents that shock the public mind, and fill homes throughout the length and breadth of this land every week and every day with mourning.

But, sir, there are other provisions in this bill. This to which I have referred relates to the owners of the vessels. It visits them, if they disobey the law, with no personal penalty, no imprisonment; but it visits them with one single penalty; and that is, that the aid of the law is refused to them to enable them to repair their losses growing out of the destruction of the property with respect to which they had not obeyed the law.

There are other provisions that relate to the officers of boats. It is well known to this House that the various acts which have been passed upon this subject have regarded want of care, lack of attention, and misconduct on the part of the captains of vessels, of the pilots of vessels, and of the engineers of vessels of this description, as of so heinous a character, that in the event of there being an accident by which loss of life was occasioned, those individuals who have failed to make use of the proper care, who have been guilty of inattention or of misconduct, are pronounced by law to be guilty of the crime of manslaughter, and they are subjected to the punishment of manslaughter upon conviction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not the object of human laws to inflict a penalty. Legislators do not act from a spirit of vindictiveness. They only inflict penalties for the purpose of preventing the crime. In this instance, the penalty is inflicted—or rather is pronounced, for practically it has never yet been inflicted; it is pronounced with a view to prevent inattention, negligence, or want of care; but all know that it has been pronounced in vain; that the law is not enforced; that its provisions are ineffectual; that there are scarcely ever any investigations into questions of this character; and that when there are, they are lamentably unsuccessful.

Now, sir, my situation has made me acquainted with an occurrence, within the last two or three months, which illustrates, in a degree as remarkable as it is possible to imagine, this fact. On the coast of Louisiana, upon the route between the port of New Orleans and the port of Galveston, in Texas, which is one of the great routes of travel, one on which steamers are running every day, carrying great numbers of passengers, an accident of the most frightful character occurred, in which there is no man living that will not say there was the grossest want of care, the grossest negligence, the most shameful misconduct on the part of the officers of the two boats. There were two boats, belonging to the same line, one the steamer Galveston, the other the steamer Opelousas; one was coming from the port of Galveston, bound to Berwick's bay, the terminus of the railroad connecting with New Orleans; the other had left Berwick's bay, and was bound for Galveston. On a starlight night, when it was as clear for the purpose of navigation as at noon-day, those two boats, belonging to the same line, running in opposite directions, came in collision. One went down, and numbers of men, women, and children, sunk in a watery grave. Prosecutions were, for a wonder, instituted; and what was the result? Criminal after criminal—perhaps I am wrong in saying criminal after criminal—but accused after accused was arraigned and tried, and one after another all were acquitted.

Now, sir, under a state of law which leads to such results, when we find that penalties are not inflicted under provisions of law adopted with a view of securing a great public benefit, and carrying out a proper public policy; when it is obvious to all that the laws have been violated with impunity, that they have not secured the object aimed at, it is to my mind clear that it is necessary to take another step and attempt to find a remedy for the evil—a means of carrying out the policy—by introducing some new principle, some new feature, into the law.

Mr. Speaker, it is a principle in the commercial law, that when the common carrier receives on board his vessel, and grants his bill of lading for goods, wares, and merchandise, he is responsible for the delivery of that merchandise in the same condition in which it was delivered; and that, in the event of his failure so to deliver it, he is not to be excused from the responsibility he has assumed, unless this failure has been caused by the act of God or the public enemy; and the burden of proof is with him to show that he has used all possible care, and that he has exercised every possible diligence for the purpose of carrying what was intrusted to him in safety.

But, sir, that principle has not yet been invoked for the protection and safety of human life. This bill, however, proposes to invoke that principle which has been recognized for centuries, and been in operation with respect to goods, wares, and merchandise; it proposes to invoke it, and put it in action for the protection of human life. Now, sir, when men engage in carrying passengers, they contract as common carriers, just as when they engage in carrying goods. They contract and bind themselves to use every possible care—to leave no human means unused to carry safely the passengers whose lives are intrusted to their custody. If they fail now, they are not punished, because they are to be visited with a pecuniary penalty, or with imprisonment. They are to be tried by juries, and they come under the principle of criminal law which requires that if there be doubt, they are to have the benefit of that doubt. But, sir, that is in direct opposition to the principle of commercial law with respect to carrying goods. Under that, the person who has failed to carry the goods intrusted to his charge is obliged to purge himself from delinquency by positive proof; he must show that some overpowering force—the act of God or of the public enemy—has prevented him from carrying out his contract to the letter.

The other provisions of this bill are framed for the purpose of making that principle apply with respect to the persons engaged in carrying passengers, and who have an actual trust to discharge in regard to them. It proposes that when an engineer has been in charge of an engine upon a steamboat, and an explosion has occurred which results in the loss of human life; or when a pilot has had charge of a boat and a collision has occurred with another boat, resulting in the loss of human life, either upon the boat which he has in charge, or upon the boat with which his boat has come in collision; or if a master be in charge when a fire occurs which leads to the loss of human life—in any of these instances no owner of a steamboat, and no person engaged in carrying passengers, shall be permitted to employ that individual, until he has been tried for manslaughter and a jury has not only exculpated him from the criminal charge, but made a report in writing that he is free from censure—that he has not been guilty of negligence, inattention, or misconduct.

It goes no further than that. It proposes that instead of leaving the enforcement of the law in relation to the exercise of care, to the uncertain action of public tribunals, to make it the absolute interest of persons who are engaged in these walks of life to have an investigation, because their occupation is gone until there has been one. And then it proposes that they shall not be permitted to go on and continue their occupation or business in life until a jury of their fellow-men shall have said that "in relation to this calamity, your skirts are clear; your hands are clean."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other portions of this bill presented by me are designed merely to carry out that principle. They contain provisions for a report of these accidents. They contain provisions making it necessary that the names of all officers occupying these responsible positions shall be communicated to the proper custom-house officer before their departure on a voyage; and it provides for a communication to all the custom-houses of all this information as to the names of all those officers who sailed on board boats or vessels, and this information as to the persons who were in charge when the accidents occurred, making them matters of record in all the custom-houses, where they may be referred to by ship-owners, by steamboat owners, and by insurance offices.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am suffering from the exertion I have made, and I shall therefore not continue my remarks. But I will say this: if it be the design of this House to make effectual provisions against the recurrence of these accidents; if it is their serious design to put an end to these terrible calamities; if they wish to put a termination to these perpetual occasions of public and private mourning, they must depart from the beaten track, and add to our laws these or some other provisions, based upon a principle which they recognize, and which it is their object to invoke. They must call into play human interest for the purpose of neutralizing the improper action of human interest. If they wish to give safety upon all the means of public travel, they must make it the interest of the engineer, the pilot, and the captain in charge, to put in action that care which they contract to employ for the safety of those persons whose lives are intrusted to their charge.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The Committee on Commerce has devoted much time and attention to this bill—

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. If the gentleman from New York will allow me for a moment longer. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GROESBECK] asks what I propose to do to enforce that principle? I forgot to mention to the House, that one section of the bill, the third, provides that if the owner of any vessel should knowingly employ a person in violation of the prohibition in question, and the vessel on which he was employed was lost, that in that event any policy of insurance on the vessel should be absolutely null and void, and give no right of action. So that it would be made the interest of ship-owners to enforce this prohibition against the officers of vessels in charge, when accidents occurred occasioning loss of life, just as the other provisions of the bill make it the interest of the underwriters to enforce the various requirements of law against the owners.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Commerce summoned before them proficient and experts in steamboating and skilled in the art of engineering, and who were familiar with the practices of navigation. To the utmost extent of their ability they have been careful to reconcile all interests with a steady eye to those of humanity as the paramount interests to be protected. Their wish has been to present such a bill as the country can rely upon in perfect safety, and such a bill as, by its provisions, will accommodate itself to the commerce of the country.

Although the bill may, in many of its features, impinge upon particular interests, yet, in its whole scope, we believe that we have presented as ripe and as efficient a result as probably can be presented to this House now, or at any other time.

The provisions of this bill resolve themselves into two great classes: the precautionary and the remedial—precautionary against the occurrence of accidents, and remedial against the results of these accidents when they have occurred. In respect to the first, there is very little difference from those of the old bill, except that the precautions are more stringent and rigorous, and that the means to be employed are those recommended by the experience accumulated since the passage of the last bill; and, indeed, it is mainly in reference to accidents which have occurred in the interim that the bill has been framed, which it is now asked may be put on its passage.

In the first place, then, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed in a few moments to remark in respect to the precautionary provisions of the bill. At section twelve, it is provided that each steamer upon the waters of the United States, and upon the ocean running between ports of the United States and other ports, shall carry certain lights. I will be pardoned, I presume, if I read from the bill itself:

"All such vessels shall exhibit a bright white light, in a central position, in their after or main rigging; the said light to be carried at such a height as to be seen above all sails carried upon the vessel in the night, and when viewed from whatever direction. Such vessels shall also carry a bright white light on the bowsprit cap, or upon one of the head stays of the vessel, at a height not exceeding six feet from the bowsprit cap, and in all cases it must be so arranged as to show an unbroken light through an arc of the horizon of twenty-four points of the compass, viz: from right ahead to four points abaft the beam on each side of the vessel; and no sail shall be so set or managed as to screen or interfere with these signal lights to show as above described. It will also be the duty of all sail vessels, when steamers are meeting or nearing them, whether by night or day, to continue, if practicable, upon the course they may be steering until the steamer shall have passed them; and these provisions being complied with, the duty of avoiding collision will devolve upon the steamer. When any such sail vessel shall be brought to an anchor in the night season, the light to be carried in the after or main rigging, as above provided, shall be left standing as a warning signal to other vessels which may be approaching," &c.

If this shall become a law, there will be comparative safety upon our waters during the night; and we shall not, at least so frequently as heretofore, be afflicted with the wail of people descending to watery graves prepared by these accidents.

I will now allude to what, indeed, has been alluded to already by the gentleman from California, and to the fact that compartments in vessels are required to be constructed, and to the other fact in that connection, that if compartments had existed in the vessels which have been lately lost, we would not have been called upon to lament the heart-rending destruction of so many lives.

In section fifteen, there is to be found another important feature of this bill, which contemplates the provision of life boats and rafts. It is well for gentlemen to pay particular attention to this section, for upon it depends, I conceive, the very vitality of the bill itself, and on it rests its effective character.

Section fifteen provides:

"That all passenger steamers shall be provided with good and sufficient cables, anchors, hawsers, and other cordage; and all steamers embraced in the preceding section shall, in addition, be also furnished with all necessary carpenters' tools and materials, storm sails, spare spars, and lumber for the construction of rafts, in such number as may be certified to be necessary by the proper inspector, or inspectors; together with the life boats for the preservation of the lives of the maximum number of passengers to which the steamer is entitled; and, in addition to the buckets required by the law of the 30th day of August, 1852, they shall be provided with at least fifty buckets for steamers not exceeding the burden of one thousand tons, and ten additional buckets for each additional five hundred tons burden; said buckets to be constructed of wood or leather, and to be held in reserve in case of fire or leakage."

If this provision be embraced in any act which it is proposed to convert into law, there can be no question that passengers can, in comparative safety, trust themselves upon the great deep, and upon our inland waters, in steamers or steamboats.

In section sixteen I beg leave to direct the attention of the House to a provision which I do not think perfect, and to which perhaps I may offer an amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That no passenger steamer, embraced in the fourteenth section of this act, shall be permitted to carry more than one person, exclusive of officers and crew, to every seven tons of lawful tonnage measurement."

In this connection it is well that the House should be advised that while attending to the paramount interests of humanity it is necessary that we look also after those which tend towards the invigoration of commercial enterprise. If by attending exclusively to the one we shall prostrate and destroy the other, why, commerce itself languishes, and may be destroyed. If we pay such entire regard to the safety of life that commerce comes to be restricted and trammelled, every business communication of the country will be interrupted, and we will have arrived at that reductio ad absurdum in the pursuit of safety, that life, to be secure, must be guarded by close confinement. No one will question that the individual who is engaged is safer and freer from accident than he who is employed in ordinary pursuits, and so if we restrain commerce upon the seas by an over-careful attention to life, we may destroy the business and trammel the energies of the country, though, in truth, adding little or nothing to the safety and preservation of our citizens.

Now, in this connection, an objection has been taken that the maximum of passengers allowed will be so reduced that the business of carrying passengers will be unfairly interrupted, if not quite destroyed. In this sense, therefore, I believe that this section is liable to criticism, and that, when passengers are restricted in number to one for every seven tons burden, our steam lines on the Pacific will be obliged to be discontinued, and our steam lines to the isthmus and across the Atlantic may hereafter, very possibly, be interrupted. I should say that it would be better that we should adopt the rule of one passenger to every four tons. There are gentlemen upon this floor who represent portions of the great commercial mart of the country, who disagree even to that number, and are of the opinion that a still more liberal standard should be adopted, so that one passenger to every three tons may be the legal measurement applied.

I leave this part of the bill, with these remarks, considering that while we attend to the interests and lives of passengers, we should not disregard those of commercial enterprise. In section fourteen we find another feature of the bill which I deem of great importance. The section is as follows:

"That on all passenger steamers navigating the ocean, on a route exceeding four hundred miles in total length, in addition to the pumps required by the act of the 30th day of August, 1852, each compartment shall be furnished and fitted with two ordinary lifting pumps, each to be of a capacity at least equal to six inches diameter and ten inches length of stroke, arranged in a proper manner for being worked by manual labor upon the main deck. The pumps in each compartment shall be inclosed in a pump well of sufficient dimensions to admit the passage of a man, for the purpose of cleaning and repairing them: And it is further provided, That all valves to openings in the bottom and sides of the vessel, below deep water-line, with their connections, shall be inclosed in such manner as to admit the passage of a person to examine them, and shall be so arranged that they may be opened and closed from a point at least six feet above the top of the floor ceiling."

This provision is inserted to guard against the accidents which frequently occur to engines, and which, when they occur, arrest the action of the pumps attached to them. It guards against that difficulty not only, but it provides the means of exhausting the water from the compartments, when either one of the pumps shall have become useless, through the remaining pump.

At section twenty, appears a feature in the bill which it will be well for gentlemen to consider. I deem it one of the most important, and one which should recommend the whole bill to the attention and favor of this House, if there were none other in it worthy of their regard. It is this:

"And be it further enacted, That every master, or commander of any steamer, embraced in the fourteenth section of this act, shall, within twelve hours after leaving port, cause suitable station bills to be prepared, embracing all passengers, officers, servants, and crew, such station bills to designate the place or station of each and every person on board, in case of fire and other disaster. And there shall be at least three copies of such station bills prepared and posted up in conspicuous places on board such steamer, for the information of passengers and others; and for every failure of the master to prepare and post up such station bills, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of $500."

Now, under this provision, it must be apparent, that, in cases of the most appalling accident, the means of preservation are placed at hand and organized; for every passenger, and every man of the crew, and every officer, will have found, before the event, his proper station and position on board the ship. In such a case, a battalion of men are then furnished, ready armed with the necessary instruments of safety, and will ever be at hand to provide against disastrous consequences. In every such case discipline is required; and where discipline exists, panic is repelled. One great cause of the loss of life in the disasters which have occurred has been the panic, the blind fear of becoming victims to the disaster.

I would say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in reference to that which has been broached by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR.] His bill was before the committee; it was considered and fully discussed. Indeed, it was admitted that the end the gentleman had in view would be more certainly accomplished by the means he proposed than perhaps by the means contained in the bill which has been submitted by the committee to the House; but, on the other hand, we supposed, also, that while life might be more safe and secure from accidents through those provisions, yet it most certainly would occur that those interested in the carrying trade would be driven from their business by the adoption of so stringent a rule.

Perhaps the House may remember that it seemed, from the suggestion made by the gentleman, that in case of accident, from whatever cause, should it be proved afterwards to have happened in the absence of those precautionary measures recommended by him, the policy of insurance, covering either cargo or vessel, should be forfeited and become void. In view of such a consequence, I put it to the House how unjust, how improper would be the requisitions of a law that would devolve such a punishment, in such a form, in case of accident, which, by possibility, might not have been occasioned by an omission of the precautions required by the law? If the provisions of his bill had referred to an accident caused directly or remotely by any such omission, the defect possibly might have been cured; though even in that event I may ask the House to consider what a field of evidence, of examination, and uncertainty, would be thrown open to our courts of law. How many witnesses, think you, would be found necessary to the question whether the accident had occurred by reason of the omission to provide the means which the law required, or whether it was precipitated by some other and different cause? Gentlemen must see that there would be neither satisfaction nor certainty in the pursuit. There certainly would be no warrant of honesty in the result.

Again: should this provision be effected, should this burden be cast upon our marine insurance companies, I think it must be apparent to every gentleman that no company would give a warrant of insurance against the losses arising from such a disaster, for in every case litigation would ensue; in every instance those engaged would be reduced to a painful uncertainty, and in no instance would there be any security that the end of litigation would ever be reached.

I say, then, that it would be unwise in respect of the argument urged by the gentleman himself, to adopt the provision he has propounded to the House. And I certainly think it would be unwise to commit the safety of life upon the high seas to the custody of a law intended to disturb the principles of the common law, in the continuance of which I am prone to believe that we shall escape more serious disasters.

Thus I have run over the most important features of this bill. I do not deem it perfect, nor that it does not, in some of its parts, disturb special and individual interests; yet, in view of the great interests of humanity, in view of the safety of life upon the seas and upon our rivers and lakes, it is essential that some means be taken more rigorous and exact than any yet adopted for the preservation of human life, and for arresting that panic which even now prevails in the public mind regarding the dangers of the deep.

It is, therefore, I conceive, quite time that the House should proceed to action upon the subject contained within the sections of this bill. It is time, not only in respect to our obligations as legislators, but it is time in respect to the expectations of those who stand without, of the multitudes of those whose kindred or acquaintances have been, or who may be, subjected to the accidents against which they beseech us to guard; and I ask, therefore, that with all proper deliberation, to be sure, and with every opportunity given for gentlemen to express themselves upon the various provisions of this bill, we come to a speedy and final vote.

In accordance with my understanding with, and my promise to, the gentleman from Illinois, I move the previous question.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the previous question will not be sustained, until somebody has been heard upon the other side.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Do I understand my colleague to demand the previous question upon this bill?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do not desire to press it.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the demand for the previous question to be withdrawn?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Yes, sir, I withdraw it.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to make a very few observations in favor of that motion. My attention has been called to this bill within the past hour, and I must be at liberty to express my surprise that, on going about the House, I have been unable to find a single gentleman, outside of the Committee on Commerce, who has given the slightest attention to its numerous details. I must be permitted to express my surprise that legislation of this important character should be hurried through the House without that attention which I am satisfied it ought to receive from every gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think there has been any great degree of hurry in this matter. I do not think there has been any snap-judgment taken. The original bill was introduced some six weeks ago or longer. All these bills have been printed, and have been for several days in the boxes of members, and in the document-room, and every gentleman has had an opportunity to examine them who was disposed to do so.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. But lest there may be a snap-judgment taken upon a matter involving vast and material interests in every portion of the country, I desire to make a few observations, addressed to the serious consideration of the House.

I desire first, however, to answer the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, that this measure has not been sprung upon the House. This bill which I hold in my hand appears to have been reported on the 2d of February, 1858; and I am informed that the bill which it is now proposed to put upon its passage is a combination of two or three bills prepared by different gentlemen, each having different objects in view, each desirous to carry some particular measure, and no one of them, I apprehend—and I say it with the greatest respect—having paid that attention to the details of the bill which ought to be given to them before we make the innovations upon the commerce of the country which I know, from my personal knowledge, this bill contemplates.

I have not had an opportunity to read the bill, which contains twenty-seven pages; but I can call the attention of the House to two or three of its leading features, which will, I think, satisfy every gentleman that it ought either be recommitted to the committee who reported it, or be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The first section of the bill proposes to extend the provisions of the law of 1852—a law which, in its working, has been found impracticable, and which all men engaged in trade have for years admitted to be full of errors; it proposes to apply that law to every ferry-boat crossing any of the rivers of the continent. Now, I ask gentlemen of this House if they have given that attention to the provisions of this bill, in its application to the ferries across any of our navigable streams, which they ought to give it before it be put upon its final passage? There are very serious doubts whether that provision of the bill is constitutional; and, for one, I do protest against hurried legislation upon a matter involving such vast interests as I know this bill involves.

Let me call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the sixteenth section of the bill. That section provides that no passenger steamer shall be permitted to carry more than one person (exclusive of officers and crew) to every seven tons of lawful tonnage measurement. That is a very simple provision; but it is my judgment—and I speak as a man knowing something upon the subject—that it would confiscate $10,000,000 of property belonging to the city of New York. And that is proposed to be done with hardly an hour's consideration! I assert that, if this bill be recommended, I will prove by witnesses, that in the present state of the trade that provision would lay up at the wharves every steamer now engaged in the commerce of the ocean. One passenger to every seven tons! Why, sir, at the present rates of transportation in the California and European trade; that would not furnish money enough to pay for coal. Now, I ask my friends on the Committee on Commerce—I ask the honorable chairman of that committee—whether he is prepared, without further consideration, to strike this serious blow at the commerce of New York?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I answer that I am not prepared; and I supposed that I had sufficiently expressed myself on that point in the remark that I submitted, when I declared that it was my intention to move an amendment, so as to make it one person to every four tons, instead of one to every seven.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. That would hardly remove the difficulty.

Mr. LETCHER. Unless the chairman of the Committee on Commerce was for taking the bill precisely as it is without amendment, how came he to move the previous question?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I understood my colleague to move the previous question, and to withdraw it as a matter of courtesy to me. But, Mr. Speaker, knowing that gentleman as I do, knowing that he knows something of the interests to be affected by this bill, I think I can safely ask him to pause for another day, and then if I cannot demonstrate that the bill ought never to pass, I shall have nothing further to say.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. May I be permitted to say in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] that the motion I made for the previous question was in compliance with a promise previously given to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and with the intention, after having complied with the promise verbally, to withdraw it, as I did.

Mr. LETCHER. I am glad to hear the explanation of the gentleman from New York, but I think it places the gentleman from Illinois in rather an awkward position in trying to force this bill through when four speeches had been made in its favor and none against it.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I would like to ask my colleague if he is not aware that the steamboat law of 1852 has been found utterly impracticable, and that for several years there has not been any attempt to enforce some of its provisions?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will answer my colleague's question in the affirmative, with this additional explanation, that the provisions of this bill were designed to supply the defects in that law.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. And without any amendment of that law, it is applied body and soul, by the first section of this bill, to every steamer and ferry-boat in the American Union!

A MEMBER. And to every raft.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Sir, I must protest against the gentleman's conclusion, in charging upon the committee an attempt to apply an imperfect bill to a greater number of vessels than the original imperfect bill was applied to. It was the intention of the committee to supply the imperfections of the originally imperfect bill by making a strong bill in the present instance before extending it to other vessels.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I intended to imply no bad faith. I know that all the gentlemen composing the committee are incapable of it. But I submit it to the sober judgment of this House whether a bill which proposes to extend the power of Congress over the commerce of the country further than it has hitherto ever been extended; a bill which proposes to make these important innovations upon the business of thousands of men in the country; a bill which proposes to create, if I understand it, thirty or forty new offices; a bill which I assert confiscates millions of property—I ask if such a bill is to be put through this House under the previous question, when it was only reported on the 2d of February, 1858? Why, sir, it took me fifteen minutes to get possession of a copy of the bill when, about an hour ago, I sent one of the boys for it. I ask if this is not just one of those cases in which the interests of the country require that the bill should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

But it may be said, Mr. Speaker, that that course would defeat the bill. Well, sir, it is better to defeat the bill than to pass it without examination. But that is not the necessary result of the reference which I propose; because, if the bill is a proper one, if it will bear the investigation of gentlemen upon this floor, if it will bear the investigation of gentlemen in New York and other places interested in the commerce of the Union, and who will be here whenever they apprehend that it is proposed to pass any such bill as this, a majority of this House can call it up from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the bill can then be put upon its passage.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire for a moment to refer to one or two of the remaining provisions of the bill for the purpose of establishing the proposition for which I contend; namely, that however much this bill may have received the attention of the Committee on Commerce, it has not received the attention of the remaining members of this House, each of whom is certainly as much interested in examining the provisions of the bill, if not as competent to judge of it, as are the members of the committee.

The seventeenth section of this bill, to which gentlemen will for an instant refer, regulates the number of persons which passenger steamers shall carry; and it regulates that number, not according to the number of passengers carried, but according to the tonnage of the ships. The bill provides that every steamer of two thousand tons and upwards shall carry a certain number of boats, no matter whether she has on board thirty or five hundred passengers. I submit that it is most unreasonable, and that the regulation as to the number of boats should be a regulation, not in accordance with the tonnage of the ship, but in accordance with the number of passengers to be saved from danger in case of storm, or from accident. There is a very mistaken notion afloat in respect to this subject of boats to be carried upon a steam-ship. Boats were never designed to be a substitute for a sinking vessel, but they are designed to carry the passengers from a sinking vessel, or a burning vessel, to a place of safety. Now, how should their number be regulated? Why, in accordance with the number of passengers. The seventeenth section of this bill, when applied to such steam-ships as are now employed in the California trade and the European trade, will cause the deck to be so lumbered up with boats that the passengers can hardly move about.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the section now under consideration; and if I state it incorrectly, I desire to be corrected. The gentleman is aware that nearly every steamer which leaves New York for Aspinwall carries from five to six hundred passengers, and we find that each one of these steamers is provided with but six life-boats. We find that in the case of the Central America, with six hundred passengers, there were but six boats, capable of holding, in all, one hundred and twenty-five persons. Now, sir, the provision to which the gentleman from New York refers has been very carefully calculated and very thoroughly estimated. It compels each steamer to carry on board a sufficient number of boats to take off her passengers, and that the seat of each passenger shall be numbered in the boat the same as it would be at the dinner table in the cabin. Then how can you get at the number of boats required? You can only get at it by the number of tons. You can only say that a vessel—such, for instance, as the Star of the West—of two thousand tons, sailing from New York, shall only carry three hundred passengers, and shall have boats enough to take away these passengers. That is the proposition we make. We say that such a vessel as the Sonora, running from New Orleans to Aspinwall, of three thousand tons and upwards, shall only carry four hundred and fifty passengers, and shall have twelve boats, sufficient to save their lives in case of fire or shipwreck.

Now, sir, I tell the gentleman that whether this bill strikes down $10,000,000 of the property of the people of the city of New York or not, the lives of four hundred Californians are dearer to me than all the property it may affect.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I agree with the gentleman, that the number of boats on board should be capable of saving the lives of the passengers; and it is for that reason I ask that the number of boats shall be regulated, not according to the tonnage of the ship, but according to the number of passengers. Take, for instance, our European trade, in which vessels are employed of five thousand tons burden. Now, this law would require such a steamer to carry twenty-four boats, twenty-four feet long, and seven feet wide, whether she carried five hundred passengers or thirty. In the winter passages, when the number of passengers is sometimes reduced to thirty or forty, is it just that she should be compelled to lumber up her decks, and carry the same number of boats which she ought to carry in the summer season, when five hundred or six hundred passengers are found on board of her? It seems to me there can be no doubt that in that particular, at least, this bill has not been duly considered. But, sir, I did not rise to address the House on its merits, for I have never fully read it. I desire an opportunity of considering it, and I will be satisfied either by its recommitment to the Committee on Commerce, or by its being sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

But, sir, I must answer one suggestion made by the honorable gentleman from California, [Mr. SCOTT.] He has referred to the loss of the Central America, and he has referred to the fact that these California steamers sometimes carry five or six hundred passengers at the present time. Now, sir, is this legislation to meet a present emergency, or is it for all time? Is this a bill to be passed by this House in this hasty manner, because there was a shipwreck in September last? Or is it a bill that is to become ingrafted as part of the permanent settled policy of the country in connection with navigation interests? Is this a bill to meet a particular emergency at this moment? If so, it may be well enough; and if I could be assured it would operate for only a few weeks or months, there need be no serious opposition to it. But, sir, without further comment, satisfied as I am that this bill has not received that consideration which its importance demands, and that the parties in interest in New York and other cities have not had an opportunity of coming here and being heard, I ask in all sincerity that it shall be referred, either back to the Committee on Commerce, or be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that I, at least, may have an opportunity of scrutinizing every provision; for I think it is a bill which ought not to pass the House. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I am suffering from a cold, so that I will be unable to go into the merits of this bill as fully as I would like. I regard it as the most palpable violation of the Constitution, and of the rights of the States, that has ever been introduced into this House in the shape of a bill. I should desire to be heard on it for at least the time of one hour. What do they propose to do here? They propose to go into the States, upon the canals and navigable rivers, and wherever else steamboats, flatboats, barges, or any craft whatever is found, and there to place them under the control of inspectors, to be appointed by the Federal Government, who are to examine this craft and to prescribe the rules by which they shall sail, or steam, or be dragged, from one point to another. I ask where, before, in the history of this country, was such a power claimed for the Federal Government, to interfere with the rights of the States? I would ask gentlemen why they do not go a little further, and when they undertake to protect the lives of passengers on board of vessels, or water craft propelled by steam, or in any other way, they do not also undertake to regulate the number of passengers that should be carried in stage coaches or upon railroads?

Mr. EUSTIS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will call attention to section thirty-eight.

Mr. LETCHER. I will come to that directly.

Mr. EUSTIS. It may save the gentleman some trouble.

Mr. LETCHER. I have had my attention called to that part of the bill, and I assure the gentleman he shall hear from me on it before I am through. I ask, if you can go upon a canal or upon any navigable stream, and there, within the limits of the State of Virginia or Louisiana, regulate the number of passengers which shall be carried on a steamboat, or if you can direct that steamboats shall be inspected in a particular way, that the plank shall be taken out in a given number of years after the construction of the boat, why you cannot protect the lives of passengers in stage coaches and upon railroads, and in road wagons too? The case is stronger concerning passengers upon railroads and in stage coaches than this one, because the railroad and stage coach companies are the mail carriers, and directly connected with the Government by virtue of contracts; but, so far as these canal boats and barges are concerned, there is no connection between them and the Government in any way. Private individuals have invested their capital in them, and under the belief that they have invested it in a way that would be likely to give them what they consider an adequate return. Has the General Government the right to interfere here?

Let us look at this. Does it stop here? No, sir. They undertake to prescribe what shall be carried, and how it shall be carried. It is prescribed that gunpowder and the oil of turpentine, and oil of vitriol, and things of that sort, shall only be carried in a certain way pointed out by this act. What right have they to go upon the Potomac and undertake to control in this way the private business of individuals engaged in freighting? I do not state it in stronger language than it is. Here is the section:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall knowingly offer, or deliver for shipment, or who shall attempt to put on board, to carry or to be carried on any such steamboat carrying passengers, any gunpowder, oil of vitriol, oil or spirits of turpentine, or other like dangerous articles, contrary to the provisions of the eighth section of the law of August 30, 1852, or the fifth section of this act, shall, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and shall be subject to the penalties prescribed respectively in such sections."

I should like just here to put it to my friends from the South who are for this bill, whether, when they undertake to regulate these particular articles of freight, they cannot also undertake to provide that the species of property peculiar to the South shall not be carried upon these vessels at all? If they have power to regulate one, they have power to regulate and control the other, or indeed any species of property which may be transported. Any person who shall deliver such for shipment is to be taken and made an example of; if the owner of the vessel carries it. Then comes the eighth section:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That hereafter, whenever barges, or other craft, shall be propelled or towed by a passenger steamer, gunpowder shall not be conveyed on board such barges, or other craft, except with the same precautions, and under the same restrictions, and subject to the same penalties, as prescribed for such passenger steamer by the steamboat law of the 30th of August, 1852, and by this act."

It is not alone to steam vessels that it applies, but to barges, those wood yaws which are brought up to this city of Washington, and to every other vessel of that sort traversing the waters of the Potomac, if drawn or towed by a steamer of any sort.

Is not this a most direct interference? I have always thought that it was the policy and the duty of the Government to let the private citizen alone with his trade, to let him conduct it to suit himself; if he chose to invest his capital, and to risk that capital in the prosecution of any business, to let him judge as to the risk, to let him judge as to the compensation which he would receive by virtue of the contract with the party who should desire to intrust goods to his charge for transportation. Here again:

"That, for the better security of life and property, it shall be the duty of the master and owner of all said vessels of every description above the burden of twenty tons, whether on navigable waters within the United States, or on the high seas, or on the Canadian waters of the northern or north-western lakes and rivers, to comply with the following regulations in respect to carrying lights in the night season, viz: All such vessels shall exhibit a bright white light, in a central position, in their after or main rigging; the said light to be carried at such a height as to be seen above all sails carried upon the vessel in the night, and when viewed from whatever direction. Such vessels shall also carry a bright white light on the bowsprit cap, or upon one of the head stays of the vessel, at a height not exceeding six feet from the bowsprit cap, and in all cases it must be so arranged as to show an unbroken light through an arc of the horizon of twenty-four points of the compass, viz: from right ahead to four points abaft the beam on each side of the vessel; and no sail shall be so set or managed as to screen or interfere with these signal lights to show as above described."

In the same section it is provided that—

"It shall be the duty of the owner or master of every flatboat, keel-boat, canal-boat, barge, raft, or other river craft, exceeding the burden of twenty tons, in respect to which no different provision is made by law, when underway or being towed, or moved or at anchor during the night season, on any navigable stream, river, or waters within the United States, to exhibit a bright white light in such manner as to show the position of such flatboat, keel boat, canal boat, barge, raft, or other river craft, exceeding the burden of twenty tons; and it shall be the duty of the owner or master of every such sailing vessel, flatboat, keel-boat, canal-boat, barge, raft, or other river craft, exceeding the burden of twenty tons, when underway, or at anchor, or moored in the channel of any navigable waters of the United States, during a fog, snow-storm, or thick weather, when an approaching vessel or steamer cannot be seen at the distance of three hundred yards, to cause to be sounded, at intervals of not exceeding two minutes, a suitable bell or horn, as a warning to approaching vessels and steamers; and it shall be the duty of the master or owner of all steamers, when underway, upon any navigable waters of the United States, during such fog, snow-storm, or thick weather, to sound a proper steam whistle as a warning to other vessels, steamers, and craft; and when at anchor or moored in the channel of any navigable waters as aforesaid, to sound a suitable bell, at intervals of not exceeding two minutes, as such warning; and if any such owner or master shall neglect to comply with any of the regulations contained in this section, he or they shall forfeit and pay for every such offense a penalty of fifty dollars."

Is not this liable to the same objection? What do you want with a light like that described, upon a flat-boat, or upon a canal-boat, transporting flour, or something of that sort? And yet, all these things are to be, under this section, and these parties are to be subjected to inspection fees unless they have these arrangements all made.

If they do not do that, what then?

"And if, by reason of such negligence, loss or damage shall occur, he or they shall be liable to the injured party for all such loss or damage, and either penalty or damages, or both, may be recovered by action of debt in any court of competent jurisdiction."

I would like to know whether that power is not resident with the States now; whether, when a party carelessly does an injury to his neighbor's property, he is not subject to the jurisdiction of the State courts, and liable for that aggression? Here they propose to come in and take this right from the State and vest it in the Federal Government. Let us see how it will work?

Here, in Eastern Virginia, two courts are held; one at the city of Richmond and the one at Norfolk. The James river canal begins at the city of Richmond and runs to Buchanan, in the district of my friend over the way. What do you propose to do? You propose to send the parties along the line of this canal in search of their rights—either to Richmond or Norfolk, notwithstanding, under the State laws, they could get them at Wytheville, at Charlestown, at Staunton, at Wheeling, and at Clarksburg, as they should select. Is there, then, any necessity for such a provision as this? Does it do any good? Are not the rights of parties protected now in regard to any improper conduct or negligence on the part of other persons?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Has the gentleman calculated the number of new offices this bill will establish?

Mr. LETCHER. I will come to that after a little.

Here is the thirty-eighth section, to which the gentleman from Louisiana calls my attention:

"Sec. 38. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any craft employed exclusively in the internal commerce or trade of any single State, except when the same is employed upon waters which are navigable from the ocean by vessels registered or enrolled and licensed by the United States, or upon a lake or river whose waters are navigable by vessels registered or enrolled and licensed as aforesaid, and form the boundary or wash the shores of two or more States or Territories, or of one or more States or Territories, and a foreign country."

If that be so, will anybody tell me what they mean by applying it, as is intended in section twelve, to "the navigable waters within the United States, or on the high seas, or on the Canadian waters?" &c.

Why, sir, the two sections are incongruous, and you can never construe them together so as to make them harmonize. They must be in conflict—direct and palpable conflict—from the very language of the twelfth section of the act, and the language of the thirty-eighth section.

Mr. MILLSON. Will my colleague allow me a moment?

Mr. LETCHER. Let me first just make this remark: To any ferry-boat passing across the river from the State of Ohio to the State of Kentucky, this very clause of the law would apply as provided here, even according to the statement of my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. MILLSON. I certainly concur in the criticism of my colleague upon that portion of the bill which he thinks violates the Constitution. But I think he has not given due effect to the thirty-eighth section, if amended, as I believe it will be amended, by the consent of the gentleman who reported the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. How could I know that, when the gentleman was going to move the previous question?

Mr. MILLSON. I suggested to him, before the discussion commenced, the propriety of making that amendment, which I think will remove and ought to remove the objection of my colleague as urged just now.

It is unquestionably true that it is a matter of serious doubt how far Congress, which has power to regulate commerce between the United States and foreign nations, and between the several States, and with the Indian tribes, can regulate the internal commerce of a single State; and it was that very suggestion which led me to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois the propriety of amending the thirty-eighth section so as to strike out the words "upon waters which are navigable from the ocean by vessels registered or enrolled and licensed by the United States." If they are stricken out, then the operation of this law will not apply to vessels engaged exclusively in the internal commerce of any single State except when employed upon a lake or river whose waters are navigable by vessels registered, or enrolled and licensed, and which form the boundaries or wash the shores of two or more States or Territories. I consider it competent for Congress to apply the provisions of this law in all such cases. And I suggest to my colleague that the law already applies to vessels engaged in the navigation of the waters of a single State.

Mr. LETCHER. But that does not hit me, for I voted against the law.

Mr. MILLSON. I entirely concur with my colleague in a disinclination to extend this law further than it has already been extended; but I submit to him, if the amendment is made which I have suggested, it will remove his ground of objection.

I also say that it is a matter of very great importance that the provision which he has just now quoted in regard to sailing vessels should be retained in the bill; for it is known to me that it is a matter of daily and nightly occurrence that collisions occur in the Chesapeake bay in consequence of a want of lights in the night.

Mr. LETCHER. I would ask my colleague whether, with his construction, this law, with the amendment he proposes, would not apply to a ferry boat plying from Cincinnati across the Ohio river?

Mr. MILLSON. I think it ought to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would say that I propose to make the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Virginia; and I make this further remark, that this section was drawn up by my friend from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] in conjunction with the gentleman from the Buffalo district, New York, [Mr. HAVEN] last winter, and for the very purpose of curing that objection.

Mr. LETCHER. I would suggest a much better way of curing the objection—strike out the first thirteen sections.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We will try that.

Mr. LETCHER. I think that amendment would be a good deal more satisfactory.

Now I suggest that this, instead of being "A bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," should be "A bill to provide bread for hungry office-seekers who are not provided for here." Here is the twenty-third section:

"And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the nine supervising inspectors, the appointment of which is authorized by the eighteenth section of the act of 30th August, 1852, one other, of like qualifications, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the Pacific coast of the United States: Provided, That this additional supervising inspector shall not be under obligation to attend the meetings of the board oftener than once in three years, but shall, in the intervals thereof, communicate with the said board in writing; and in all his official acts and proceedings shall be governed by such rules and regulations as may be from time to time established by said board; and a certified copy of such rules and regulations, and all their proceedings, shall be forwarded to him by the secretary of the said board."

I had supposed that the object of constituting this board at all, was for the purpose of consultation; that the members who constituted the board might come together, bring their common stock of information, and lay it before the body, in order that they might come to a conclusion what means of protection, further than those provided for by the law, were necessary to preserve the lives of individuals upon these steamers.

The section proceeds:

"The compensation of such supervising inspector for the Pacific coast shall be $3,000 per annum, with traveling and other expenses as heretofore allowed; and for all other supervising inspectors $2,000 per annum, with traveling and other expenses as heretofore allowed."

That is a pretty good start.

And there is another provision of this bill, which says:

"That in case of one of the members of any local board becoming incapacitated for the performance of his duties by sickness or other cause during the absence of the supervising inspector from the port where such board is located, also in case a vacancy in a local board shall occur in consequence of death, resignation, or removal, the remaining inspector may call in proper and competent aid to assist in making inspections; and certificates of such inspections, made out by the remaining member of the board, shall be valid, and of full force and effect, and shall warrant the collector, or other chief officer of customs, in issuing enrollments and licenses, provided the reason of the omission of one inspector's signature upon the certificate be indorsed upon the same, with the name of the party who aided in such inspections; and licenses issued to pilots and engineers under the same circumstances and conditions, and having the signature of but one of the inspectors, shall be considered a valid license, and of full force and effect."

The twenty-fourth section provides:

"That, in addition to the local inspectors for the collection districts named in the ninth section of the act of the 30th day of August, 1852, there shall be a board of local inspectors for the district of Galena, at Galena, in the State of Illinois; also, a board of local inspectors for the district of Oregon city, in the Territory of Oregon; also, a board of local inspectors for the district of Paducah, in the State of Kentucky; also, a board of local inspectors for the district of Appalachicola, in the State of Florida; such inspectors shall be appointed in the same manner, and shall have such character and like qualifications and powers, and shall discharge the same duties as are required of the local inspectors now holding appointments under that act."

All to be salaried officers, and the salaries all fixed in this bill, as you will find on reference to the twenty-seventh section. The salaries there specified on the 20th and 21st pages of the bill, for one officer for each district, amount to $20,700, to say nothing about the assistant inspectors and those other officers provided for in the preceding part of this bill. Now, I would like to know from my friend from Illinois how much this thing is to cost when it is worked out?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In answer to the gentleman from Virginia I will say that the additional fees received by the local inspectors from boats brought under the provisions of this law, will far more than pay all the salaries; so that, instead of being an expense to the Government, it will not cost one dime.

Mr. LETCHER. Then why not provide to pay by fees, instead of a salary? Why make them all salaried officers here, charged upon the Treasury, no matter what the fees may be? And why provide that all the costs which may accrue in controversies which may spring out of this bill shall be paid out of the Treasury? Now, sir, if the gentleman believes that that will be the result, let us amend his bill in that way. Give them fees; give them their traveling and other expenses, and fix the maximum, if you choose, beyond which the fees shall not go. That will make the bill more acceptable to me than it is at present.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have another objection to the bill. The patronage of this Government, God knows, is large enough now. The whole tendency of public sentiment, the direction of the public eye, is to this Federal Government for the means of support. It is becoming a consolidated Government as fast as it can, and year after year we are breaking down the rights of the States, one after another, until those which are left are insufficient to protect the rights of the States against the grasping power of this Government.

But again, sir, my friends who have argued this question upon the other side have undertaken to present us with a very frightful picture of the sad disasters that have occurred to the Central America and other vessels, where lives have been lost, and we have been appealed to by every appeal which could be addressed to our sympathies to come up and aid in the passage of this bill—to aid in its passage at once, without sending it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it could be taken up section by section, where these sections could be amended, and the bill reduced to a shape that would give it something like perfection, or, at any rate, make it more acceptable to us than it now is. Now, I hope that it will go to the Committee of the Whole, and that we shall have a chance to consider it there. But here we are met by the gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. WASHBURN] with the declaration that if it goes to the Committee of the Whole, it will lie buried there, and you never will consider it. Why do you send your appropriation bills to the Committee of the Whole? Are they not just as important as this bill in regard to the shipping interest? They go to that committee; they are considered; they are passed. Why is it that this bill alone is to be made an exception, and hurried through within four days after it has been printed, and the House called upon to come up and register it as the exact bill, in all respects, which ought to be passed by this body?

Now, we have had hasty legislation enough, and I concur with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK,] that it is far better that we should have no legislation at all than to have it done without our understanding the provisions of the measure which we are called upon to vote for or against. I hope, therefore, that the House will give this matter consideration in Committee of the Whole. The remarks of the gentleman from New York in respect to the amount of property which will be confiscated in the city of New York alone, under the operation of this bill, ought to arrest the attention of the House, and induce members to give the bill that direction which the gentleman from New York seeks to give it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire, at this late hour of the day, to occupy the attention of the House for more than a very few minutes; but it strikes me, in reading over the bill, that the ninth section contains in it a fatal objection to the passage of the bill. I agree with those gentlemen who have examined the different sections of the bill, that, if these objections exist, fatal as they are to its practical success or to its successful operation, it ought to be more maturely considered than it has yet been. I will read the ninth section to which I refer, so that the House may understand my objection to it. It is as follows:

"Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That instead of the existing provisions of law relating to the use of fusible alloys upon high pressure boilers, there may be substituted fusible plugs, or rivets, of pure tin, of such dimensions, and inserted in such position, as shall be prescribed by the inspectors."

Now, I desire the gentlemen of the Committee on Commerce to inform me, and to inform the House, why they desire a repeal of the present law in relation to fusible alloys. By an examination of Bache's Chemistry, hastily made, I find that tin fuses at four hundred and forty-two degrees of Fahrenheit. To attain that degree of heat, the pressure upon the boiler would be three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch, and if any gentleman can pretend to tell me that a boiler will sustain that pressure without collapsing or without exploding, it is a matter of surprise and wonder. I find, in the same work, the examination of the principles of heat by a commission appointed by the Parisian Academy of Science, in which the celebrated Arago took a leading part, and I deduce from that that this pressure of heat upon the boiler must be three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch before these tin plugs or rivets will fuse. I am told, upon inquiry of some of the members of the Committee on Commerce, that this matter has undergone investigation, and that the result of the examination justifies this conclusion of theirs. Now, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce if he will be so good as to tell me which of the inspectors recommended these tin plugs instead of fusible alloys?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will give the gentleman some information upon that subject, if he will yield the floor for a moment.

Mr. FLORENCE. Certainly I will. I want the information.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am thankful to the gentleman for affording me an opportunity of exposing to the House this matter relative to these fusible alloys. When the steamboat bill of 1852 was before Congress, a private interest appeared—as it appears now, to defeat this provision—and that private interest was enabled to incorporate a provision into the law of 1852, compelling the use of these fusible alloys.

Every member of the Committee on Commerce who was consulted, was opposed to the principle of incorporating any man's patent right into the law, and compelling the use of any particular invention, to the exclusion of all others, and although this fusible alloy has, in the opinion of experienced men, proved an entire failure, yet the supervising inspectors were bound by the law to continue its use. We provide in this bill, not that it shall be entirely stricken out of the law, but we provide that if anything better can be discovered, it may be used. We do not deem it proper that Congress should tie up these matters, and prevent the inventive genius of the country from being felt in them.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not understand the gentleman from Illinois, when he refers to private interests, nor do I know to what private interest he refers. But I want him to tell me who were the supervising inspectors who recommended the substitution of tin plugs for fusible alloy?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman that I have seen nearly all the supervisors, and they have, without an exception, recommended the provision which we have reported; and I wish also to say further, in reference to these supervisors, that from my knowledge of them, and my intercourse with them, I know of no body of men more intelligent or better qualified to hold the positions they occupy.

Mr. FLORENCE. Who are they?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will look into this report he will find their names. I will refer the gentleman to Captain Shallcross, of Kentucky; and, sir, I need not tell any gentleman from Kentucky who Captain Shallcross is. He is a man who has run a boat for thirty-five years, and never cost an insurance company one dollar, or lost a life. I give you the name of Mr. Burnett, of Boston; and the gentleman will find the names of all the supervisors and inspectors, if he will refer to this report.

Mr. FLORENCE. Have they all been consulted in reference to this fusible alloy?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have seen nearly all of them.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, sir, did not they prepare this bill and submit it to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They did not.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the second section of this bill contains a provision which will enable the supervisor of New York to make one hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no doubt of it. It is this information that I desire to obtain, and I have no objection to consuming my hour in obtaining it. But, sir, I do not agree with the honorable and high-minded gentleman to whom the gentleman from Illinois has referred. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, or the committee itself, had called these same gentlemen before them and inquired as to the nature and impropriety of flues in boilers. In my opinion, the only way to get rid of the collapse of flues in boilers, is to get rid of the flues in the boilers themselves. If you were rid of the flues altogether, there would certainly be no collapsing of flues. Now, I will ask the honorable gentleman whether this was made a matter of investigation in the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The committee had that subject under consideration; and in connection with it they had also another subject under consideration, which was the creation of steam by cold water as a means of saving life. [Laughter.] But we found one difficulty, which was that no steam could be had from cold water, and that therefore no engines could be put in motion through the instrumentality of cold water. And we came to the same conclusion in regard to the flues. We found that it was essential that there should be flues within the boiler in order to raise steam, for the same reason that steam will come from hot water and will not from cold water.

Mr. FLORENCE. I believe, sir, that flues are used as a matter of economy to save fuel. If the flues were not in the boiler, it would require more fuel to raise steam. Now, gentlemen who have examined this subject, I suppose agree with me that there is danger from the flues in the boiler. If the water gets down below the flues there is danger of an explosion. Now, I ask the gentleman from New York where this tin plug is to be put?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I must confess my incapacity to inform the gentleman the precise locality where the tin plug is to be placed. I will refer for more particular information in respect to plugs, and the application of plugs, to my friend from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. Then the gentleman cannot answer the question. I take it for granted it must be somewhere below the flues in the boilers, because, when the water gets below those flues, there is danger of bursting, and I suppose that at about that time the tin plug melts. It is a mighty ugly plug anyhow; but I do not mean to say the "Plug Uglies" had anything to do with it. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I just happen to open a book before me. It is a recommendation of Evans's safety-guard, which I will read:

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that we are well acquainted with the principles and modes of operation of Evans's safety-guard, for the prevention of explosions of steam boilers. It is exceedingly simple, and not at all liable to get out of order. It prevents explosion from undue pressure, both by its action as a common safety-valve and by the action of the heat of the excessive pressure. But the great and most important principle of its operation is that the valve will open by heat alone, wholly irrespective of pressure. Possessing the above principles, it is an effectual guard against explosions, and we therefore recommend its introduction on all steamboats.

Now, one word in regard to the fusible alloy in its application to this safety-guard; and inasmuch as the subject has been introduced, I may be permitted to say that I have never known an instance where it has failed. I believe it is admitted that there has been no failure; and I just want to know what advantage is to be obtained by changing the use of the fusible alloy for this tin plug?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will refer the gentleman to the steamboat Colonel Crossman, which burst her boilers, a few days ago, on the Mississippi river, by which twenty-two persons lost their lives. This boat had one of these machines on board.

Mr. FLORENCE. It was tied down so that it could not work. Where it has had a chance to operate, it has not failed in a single instance.

Mr. LETCHER. If my friend will yield, I will move that the House do now adjourn. He can finish his remarks to-morrow.

Mr. FLORENCE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the House will not adjourn. If the House adjourns, in what position will this bill be?

The SPEAKER. It will come up as the first business in order in the morning.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman cannot expect to pass the bill to-night.

ACCOUNTS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER, before putting the question, laid before the House a statement of the receipts, expenditures, and appropriations, from 1789 to June 30, 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

And then (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 11, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. SEPTIMUS TUSTIN, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (No. 152) to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between the territories of the United States and the State of Texas, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of W

W. Bassett, late a master in the Navy, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of master and that of lieutenant for the time he acted as a lieutenant; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DURKEE presented the petition of Edson Sherwood and others, of Green Bay, Wisconsin, praying for the confirmation of title to certain lands claimed by the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Harris & Morgan, late contractors for carrying the mail from New Orleans to Indianola, praying that the Postmaster General may be required by law to settle their accounts upon principles of justice and equity; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of appropriations for the improvement of the harbors of New Buffalo, St. Joseph, Kalamazoo, Black Lake, Grand River, Muskegon, White River, Pere Marquette, Saginaw Bay, Monroe, Thunder Bay, Marquette, Ontonagon, Mackinac, and Cheboygan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation for the repair of the St. Mary's Falls ship canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Morrow county, Ohio, praying that the public lands may be reserved for the use of actual settlers only; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES presented two memorials of citizens of Sioux City, Iowa, praying that a grant of land be made to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the western boundary of Nebraska, in the direction of the South Pass in the Rocky Mountains, with a branch in the direction of Oregon and Washington Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SIMMONS presented the memorial of Sarah A. Sarle and Elizabeth Pinneger, heirs-at-law of Thomas Arnold, an officer in the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed half pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

TROOPS FOR UTAH.

Mr. SEWARD. I present a communication from Captain William P. Paff, a citizen of the State of New York, residing at Albany, in which he states to the Senate that he desires to contribute his aid to the extent of his abilities in sustaining the authority of the United States in the Territory of Utah; and he submits a plan in which his services can be engaged, and solicits the action of Congress upon it. He requests me to have his petition read; but as the rules of the Senate do not allow that, I will state very briefly what this plan is. It is to raise a regiment of a thousand men in ten companies, to be armed with the Minnie rifle, himself to be the colonel of the regiment, and the field officers and staff to be appointed by himself; the officers of the line to be elected by the respective companies; the pay to be the pay of officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States; the term of service to be the duration of the difficulties which it is expected to assist in subduing; the compensation extra to be three hundred and twenty acres of land to each officer and soldier at the close of the service, on condition that he becomes an actual resident of the Territory. The proposition, therefore, is similar to the one adopted in the conquest of California. I will barely state, in presenting this communication, that it is made in good faith, and that the person who makes it is a man of respectability and character, of military skill and acquirements, and a patriotic citizen. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Elbridge Lawton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BIGGS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of John H. Hinton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of James Maceaboy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SIMMONS, it was Ordered, That the petition of John J. DeWolfe, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DURKEE, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and accompanying papers of the clerks, watchmen, and others in the Washington navy-yard, in relation to their compensation, presented during the last Congress.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Eliza Evans be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

On motion of Mr. DURKEE, it was Ordered, That John Saaw have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. DURKEE, it was Ordered, That William B. Draper have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Emanuel P. Stedman, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Hezekiah Miller, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOSTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 133) to extend an act approved the 3d day of February, 1853, entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY NEXT.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to Monday next.

ARMY ABSENTEES.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate what officers of the Army, if any, belonging to the several regiments in service in the field or at remote or frontier stations, are now absent from duty, and the cause of such absence in each case.

BLUNT'S PATENT.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting, in the Navy of the United States, Blunt's patent for detaching boats from their davits in a heavy sea-way.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Jane Stoneham, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

TURKISH VICE ADMIRAL.

Mr. MASON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate instructing them to inquire whether it was in the contemplation of the Government of Turkey to send an officer of high rank in the Turkish navy to the United States, with a view to build a ship-of-the-line of three decks for the use of that navy, and in such event to inquire whether it would become the executive department of the Government to give him a proper reception, have instructed me to make a report, accompanied by a joint resolution. The occasion, as I am informed at the Department of State, is one that, if acted on at all, is imminent, because the arrival of that officer in the United States is expected every day. The resolution is very brief, and I ask the present consideration of it that the end may be attained. I think no debate will arise upon it.

The joint resolution was read a first time. It is as follows:

Joint resolution for the reception of Vice Admiral Mehmed Pasha, of the Turkish navy, and to facilitate the objects of his mission in superintending the construction of a vessel-of-war in the United States.

It having been made known to Congress that it has been the pleasure of the Government of Turkey to direct that

Vice Admiral Mehmed Pasha of the Turkish navy should proceed to the United States for the purpose of superintending the construction of a ship-of-war of large class, at one of the ship-yards of this country, and that it would be agreeable to the Sultan that his officer should have the benefit of the skill and experience of the naval service of the United States, the better to effect the object of his mission: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the President be requested to cause Vice Admiral Mehmed Pasha, of the Turkish navy, to be received on his arrival in the United States in a manner suitable to his rank, and that every facility conducive to the objects of his mission, in every part of the United States, he may be desirous to visit, be extended to him and his suite.

Mr. MASON. The report which accompanies the resolution states that the committee sent the resolution to the Department of State, and received in reply a copy of a letter from the Minister of the United States at Constantinople, stating the fact that the Sultan had determined to send one of the highest officers of his navy to the United States, to contract for and superintend the building of a ship-of-the-line of the largest class, for the use of his navy; and that the order had been given by the Sultan against a good deal of European influence that had been attempted to be exercised against it. The act of the Sultan showed a persevering effort on his part to avail himself of the skill and science of our naval constructors by building a ship at one of our ports. The Minister further represented that a letter had been written to him by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Turkey, requesting that letters would be furnished to the vice admiral to the authorities of this country of a character which would enable him the better to effect the object of his mission.

We know, on a former occasion, when an officer of inferior rank of the Turkish navy was sent here by the Turkish Government, more for the purpose of acquiring general information of the condition of our country and its resources, that, in conformity with what was understood to be the usage of eastern nations, it was thought proper, and Congress sanctioned it, that he should be received in a manner appropriate to the occasion, and to the usage of eastern countries, and an appropriation of $10,000 to defray his expenses while in this country. We have reason to believe that the reception of that officer operated very favorably upon the Turkish Government and Turkish people, the character of whom is well known to our countrymen, in inducing them to cultivate more intimate relations with this country. It has been thought, and is so expressed in the report of the committee, that a civility of this kind will bear very abundant fruits, by opening new intercourse and new relations between our people and the remote people belonging to that eastern country. The resolution simply requests the President to extend these civilities to the naval officer when he may arrive. It will involve, I dare say, the expenditure of money, but to no very great extent. I was informed that of the $10,000 appropriated in 1850 only four thousand or five thousand were expended, and the rest was returned to the Treasury. I gave it as my opinion to the Secretary of State, that in order to have the resolution passed, we should not make an appropriation of money in it; but for myself I entertained no doubt that whatever expense might be incurred, within reasonable limits, would be hereafter met by Congress.

Mr. BIGGS. It is with much diffidence, Mr. President, that I interpose my objection to this resolution; but it strikes me that it is one of that class which are intended merely to exhaust a large amount of money without any corresponding advantage. I cannot see the propriety of the resolution, unless it be to commit Congress in advance to the appropriation of public money to pay the expenses of this distinguished naval officer who is to come from Turkey. It occurs to me that is the only effect of the resolution. As a matter of policy it may be appropriate, but I doubt the propriety of it; and I doubt it the more at the present time, considering the state of our Treasury. There is nothing at all said in the resolution about the amount to be appropriated, but the Senator from Virginia tells us that on some former occasion $10,000 was appropriated to pay the expenses of some minister or officer from Turkey. I may be acting under a misapprehension as to the propriety of this resolution, but it seems to me that the effect of it is to vote substantially a large appropriation from the Treasury at a time when we ought not to make such an appropriation at all.

The policy may be a proper one, but I doubt very much indeed the propriety of our adopting as a standing policy, that whenever a foreign Government sends a distinguished officer here we should take him through the country and pay his expenses. I do not think it is a correct policy; and therefore I cannot give my consent without more light than I have now before me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator objects, the resolution cannot be further considered to-day.

Mr. BIGGS. I do not object to its consideration, but I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. CLAY. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the resolution cannot be read a second time to-day.

Mr. MASON. I move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DRED SCOTT DECISION.

Mr. EVANS. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution providing for payment to Mr. Wendell, for printing the Dred Scott decision, have directed me to present a substitute for the resolution referred to them, accompanied by a special report, setting out the circumstances under which the opinions of the judges were printed. I ask for the present consideration of the proposition. The committee propose to strike out all after the word "resolved," in the original resolution, and insert:

That there be paid, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Cornelius Wendell, the sum of $6,150, as a compensation for publishing twenty thousand copies of the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court, in the case of Dred Scott vs. John F. A. Sandford; the said sum to be in full for copyright and all other charges incident to the said publication.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to the consideration of this resolution. I shall only ask for the yeas and nays on it; and, in giving my vote against the resolution, I wish it to be understood that I do it principally, or altogether, on the ground of my disapprobation of the merits of the judicial opinion which was printed.

Mr. HALE. I am not certain that I shall vote against this resolution. I understand the circumstances under which the printing was done are such as involve the honor of the Senators who ordered it, under the expectation that it would be paid for by the Senate, or else they are personally bound to pay it. I think the mode of ordering the printing was exceptionable; but, considering the manner in which it was done, I do not feel disposed to object to it. But I do protest against any inference to be drawn from this vote that we indorse the sentiments of those opinions; and I think it somewhat objectionable to print in this way a paper which is not regularly a Senate document; but I shall make no objection. I am not certain that I shall not vote for the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SEWARD. Let the question be taken on this report by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent of the Senate, the Chair will put the question on the amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the original resolution, and the amendment, reported from the committee.

The Secretary read them accordingly.

Mr. EVANS. As the yeas and nays are to be taken, I desire that the report may be read; that will explain the circumstances.

Mr. WILSON. I have no desire to have the report read myself. I think I understand the whole matter. I have no apprehensions or fears that my opinions in reference to the Dred Scott decision will be misrepresented by any vote I may choose now to give. I rise simply to say that I entirely disapprove of the manner in which the printing was originally ordered. I think it was all wrong; and I shall be constrained, therefore, to vote against paying for printing ordered in the manner in which this was ordered, though I do not mean to say that anybody in the Senate intended to do anything improper.

Mr. SEWARD. I intended to call for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the resolution, and not on the amendment of the committee. If it may be so understood, let the amendment pass.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to hear the report read, as suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. He says that will explain the transaction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York desires to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and have them taken on the final passage of the resolution. By unanimous consent of the Senate, it may be considered as withdrawn.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Cornelius Wendell, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, the sum of fifteen cents per one hundred pages for twenty thousand copies of the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dred Scott vs. John F. A. Sandford."

Have considered the same, and submit the following report:

On the 11th of March, 1857, the following resolution was submitted by Mr. BENJAMIN:

"Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate obtain, for the use of the Senate, from the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court, twenty thousand copies of the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court in the case of Dred Scott vs. John F. A. Sandford, the same to be furnished as an extract from the forthcoming volume of the reports of the decision of that court during the December term, 1856, and that the same be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate, at a rate not exceeding fifteen cents per one hundred pages, provided the same shall be delivered stitched with paper covers, in pamphlet form."

This resolution was referred the next day (March 12) to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. On the same, or the next day, the committee met to consider this and some other matters which had been referred to them. On consultation it was thought a different mode of obtaining the same result, was preferable, and it was agreed to submit, as a substitute for the said resolution, the following:

"Resolved, That there be printed, by the Printer of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, twenty thousand copies of the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court in the case of Dred Scott vs. John F. A. Sandford, the same to be stitched with paper covers in pamphlet form: Provided, That the copy-right of the reporter can be purchased for $1,500; the expense incurred in the execution of the above resolution to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate."

This expense, according to an estimate furnished by the Superintendent of Public Printing, would amount to $4,420, exclusive of the copy-right and the clerks' charges for copying.

A report was accordingly prepared to carry out this decision of the committee, but the Senate, having resolved to adjourn on the 14th, at one o'clock, no opportunity was offered to present it with any expectation it could be acted on. On the day of the adjournment—but whether before or after, is not recollected with certainty—there was a meeting of certain members of the Senate who belong to the Democratic party, at which there was an understanding that the report of the case above stated, should be printed; and, if the Senate refused to order the payment, it should be paid for by those who sanctioned it. The statement of what was done by the said meeting, is made by the chairman of this committee, who was present at the meeting, and assented to the agreement. How, or by whose direction, the work has been done, is unknown to the committee; but the work has been done, and has either been, or is, ready for distribution among all the members of the Senate. A majority of the committee have agreed to recommend to the Senate the payment of a reasonable compensation to the Printer for printing the said report; but in doing so, they are not disposed to go beyond the estimates furnished by the Superintendent of Public Printing. These, with the addition for the copy-right, and a small sum paid by the Printer to the clerk of the Supreme Court for copying, amount to $6,150, and is about a thousand less than would be paid under the resolution referred to the committee.

In making this recommendation, your committee are influenced by these considerations:

1. If the report agreed on by the committee at the close of the extra session in March last had been made and acted on, no doubt is entertained that the Senate would have concurred.

2. There had been discussed in that case great constitutional questions. The argument was full and elaborate on both sides, and it was important that these opinions should be published in some authentic form, so that the people of all political parties might have the means of deciding for themselves.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate by any remarks on this occasion; but I desire to submit an amendment, not that I object to the expenditure of the money under the circumstances detailed in the report, but that I do not desire to give my assent, as a member of this body, to the publication of the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court in this case, under any circumstances where it may be supposed that this body assumes to indorse certain doctrines which are there laid down by a majority of the judges. I desire to offer an amendment, which, with the leave of the Senate, I will read:

And resolved, That in ordering the same to be printed, this body do not intend, in any manner, to sanction the opinions expressed by several of the judges, that Congress transcended its constitutional powers in passing the eighth section of the act for the admission of the State of Missouri, commonly called the Missouri compromise, nor, in any manner, to sanction the opinion that the Constitution of the United States, of its own force, carries the law of slavery into any State or Territory of the United States.

As I have said, Mr. President, it is not my purpose now to discuss the questions which are involved in this amendment; but on some future occasion it will be my purpose to consider them, and to show, as I shall endeavor to do, that the doctrine advanced that the Constitution of the United States, of its own force, carries slavery into any Territory or any State, is the most momentous and revolutionary doctrine that has ever been promulgated before the American people—a doctrine which concerns not merely the Territories of the United States, but, if it be acquiesced in, carries the law of slavery into every State of this Union. The Constitution of the United States is the paramount law of every State; and if that recognizes slaves as property, as horses are property, no State constitution or State law can abolish it, or prohibit its introduction. It is a question which rises above all other questions and overrides them all, and is to become the living issue for the next ten years before the American people. For myself, sir, for one, I cannot consent in any manner whatever to sanction this doctrine, or the publication of what, by the President of the United States, is assumed to be a judicial opinion, which lays down such a doctrine, by a resolution of this body, passed under such circumstances that the people of the United States shall have any reason to suppose that the Senate of the United States sanctions and approves the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States, of itself, carries slavery anywhere.

I shall not detain the Senate now. I simply offer this amendment; and upon that amendment I desire to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SLIDELL. I presume there is no disposition on the part of any one in the Senate to be involved in a debate on this question now; and I would suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that his resolution, perhaps, might not be objectionable, if he said it was intended "neither to impugn nor to sanction"—neither one nor the other.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not believe, when I vote to print a document, that I vote to sanction all the sentiments contained in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator allow the Chair to determine whether the yeas and nays shall be taken on the question?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUNTER. I was about to say that, when I voted to print a document, I did not vote to sanction all the sentiments contained in it; and I am unwilling to set the precedent on this occasion for criticising or declaring that we do not entertain the opinions contained in any such document. It will make it necessary hereafter, if we once begin with this custom, whenever a document is ordered to be printed, if it contains objectionable matter in the opinion of any Senator, that he should offer some such resolution in order to protect himself from the conclusion this precedent would afford of agreeing in sentiment with it. I think we ought not to begin the practice. I do not think any member is bound to the opinions contained in the Dred Scott case because he votes to print it. That is a mere question of propriety, which depends on the fact whether we ought to circulate the document or not; or which may depend on the other fact of how much it is to cost, and whether it is worth the expense that would be occasioned if the order for printing should be made. We have heretofore been governed by such considerations only in printing documents; and I think they are the only considerations which ought to govern us hereafter. I hope the Senate will establish no such precedent as this. I shall vote against the amendment. I should vote against it if it was an amendment declaring that we did agree with the opinions in the Dred Scott decision. I think this is an improper place for such a declaration.

Mr. CLAY. In order to cut off debate on this question, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That carries with it the whole question.

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is another point which has not been alluded to by Senators in this matter, and it goes to the foundation of the whole thing. I insist that we cannot adopt the resolution reported by the Committee on Contingent Expenses, without a direct and palpable violation of the law under which we are acting. That would be a sufficient objection to my mind, if there were none other. It is known that old documents, including the Annals of Congress, the American Archives, State Papers, and a variety of other matters, had accumulated, and had been distributed among the members of the House of Representatives and the Senate. It required a large annual sum to make that distribution; and Congress, at the first session of the last Congress, provided by law that thereafter no books should be furnished to members, unless the amount of the same were deducted from the compensation to which they were entitled. I have the law before me, and I will read the section, because I am aware that there may, by possibility, be given to it a different construction than that which I give to it, though I think the construction I place upon it is clearly right. It is the fifth section of what was called the compensation act, of the 16th of August, 1856, fixing the compensation of members of Congress. When that act was passed, it was deemed advisable to put a stop to what was a most extravagant, unnecessary, and wrong expenditure of the public money; and the fifth section of that act provides:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any books shall hereafter be ordered to and received by members of Congress, by a resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, the price paid for the same shall be deducted from the compensation herebefore provided for such member or members: Provided, however, That this shall not extend to books ordered to be printed by the Public Printer during the Congress for which the said member shall have been elected."

What is the meaning of the proviso in that section? Does it apply to anything else than the books which we order in the usual course of legislation, such as Patent Office reports and ordinary documents? I say that it is limited by that. If you carry it beyond that, you fritter away the whole power of the section entirely. If you can go to the Supreme Court room and can compile a book from judicial decisions, and have it come within the meaning of that proviso, and pass an order here for its printing, and pay for it out of your contingent fund, you may go to the stationer's and compile a book upon science; you may compile a book upon arts; you may compile any book you please, with just as much propriety as you may go to the Supreme Court room and compile a book from judicial decisions: no, sir, they are not worthy of being called judicial decisions, but the opinions that men utter there. I insist that a fair construction of that section goes to the foundation of this whole proposition; and that it is a clear, utter violation of the law under which we are acting, unless the resolution be so amended as to provide that we pay for the same out of our compensation.

I have never seen one of these volumes: I am wrong; I never received one of them. I did see one casually the other day, and I have never seen but one. I have received none; I want none; but if the Senate in its wisdom shall see fit to order the publication, I say a fair construction of the law requires that we should put our hands in our pockets and pay for it, or own that we do an act which is in clear violation of the law. If I am right in this view, the resolution ought to be rejected. I have nothing to say on the amendment which is offered by my friend from Wisconsin, other than that, to leave no implication, I shall vote for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on Mr. DOOLITTLE's amendment, resulted—yeas 19, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Traubuit, Wade, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iversen, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yuloe—33.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment reported by the committee. The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. STUART. My attention was called away so that I did not vote on the last motion on which the yeas and nays were taken; but if I had voted I should have voted against it, for the reason that I do not choose to express my opinions here in regard to any question of that sort when voting on a resolution of this kind. In regard to the proposition as it now stands, I shall vote against it, because I agree with the construction of the law which is stated by the Senator from Maine. I think it is in violation of the law, and therefore do not feel myself at liberty to vote for it.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest, (I do not wish to urge it,) as it may throw some light on the point which the Senator from Maine has stated, whether it would not be practicable to get the opinion of the Supreme Court on the question whether this is in conflict with the compensation act or not? Because if it is, I should not be very much in favor of passing it. There is one doctrine assumed by the committee in the report that I should like to have light upon; and that is, whether the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court has a copy-right? I do not believe a word of it. I do not believe he has any more right to a copy-right of it than he has to a copy-right of speeches made in the Senate, or a President's message. I am unwilling to sanction that. An honorable Senator who sits in front of me, [Mr. BENJAMIN.] if he will allow me to refer to him, in a conversation I have had with him, put it on a different ground. He suggested that, inasmuch as we are diminishing to some extent the value of the Supreme Court reports, by publishing this opinion in pamphlet form, which otherwise the reporter would have printed in his volume, as a matter of equity we ought to pay him $1,500, because, by this gratuitous distribution of this opinion, we to that extent lessen the value of the bound volume. On that ground it is not objectionable; but the ground assumed in the report that the reporter has a copy-right to the opinions of the Supreme Court I utterly dissent from and deny entirely.

A SENATOR. It has been decided.

Mr. HALE. I do not care whether it has been decided or not. Common sense would decide it, even if the Supreme Court were against it.

Mr. PUGH. Strike out that portion about the copy-right.

Mr. HALE. I will not propose any amendment; but I protest against that doctrine.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not mean to debate this matter, but as the Senator from New Hampshire has referred to something that occurred in conversation, I will state to the Senate, in a very few words, the ground of this allowance. When it was in contemplation under the resolution which I offered at the last session to print a certain number of this decision for distribution amongst the people of the United States, as a matter of information which would be valuable to them, and which all were desirous of obtaining, a difficulty arose with the reporter of the Supreme Court, who made an objection which I thought a very just one. He said: "My compensation depends upon the sale of the volumes which are allowed me for sale; if the Senate takes more than half my volume and distributes it gratuitously, it to that extent impairs the contract by which I am to receive compensation as a public officer by the sale of the volumes; nobody will buy my volume if more than half of it is taken and printed and distributed gratuitously." I thought that a fair claim. I had no idea he had a copy-right in the decisions of the Supreme Court, but that he had a fair claim, on equitable considerations, that we should not by a gratuitous distribution impair the value of that consideration which we allow him for printing the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CAMERON. As I intend to vote for this resolution, it is due to myself that I should say a word in justification of my vote. I think this whole matter of copy-right is wrong. I cannot imagine by what authority of law or equity an officer of the Supreme Court of the United States can charge for a copy-right for a document ordered to be printed by the Senate. I shall vote for the resolution, however, because the work was printed in good faith. Members of this body, last spring, at the close of the session, when they had not an opportunity of consulting the Senate on the subject, with the impression that everybody here was desirous to have the information, ordered it to be printed. If it were to be done now, I should not vote for the printing. Fifteen hundred dollars for the copy-right, I consider a wrong, a great wrong. The amanuensis of the court has also charged $250 for making the copy, which I consider an outrage; and the price of printing I regard as a very high price; but the printing has been done in good faith; the books have been distributed to different members of this body, and they have circulated them among their constituents. There is no other way of paying for it but that now proposed. The printer has done the work. He bought the paper; he either paid for it, or must have given his notes for it, and he has given his note to the reporter of the Supreme Court, and to the clerk of the court: all has been done in good faith. Therefore, in that spirit of kindness and courtesy, which I have seen always control this body, I shall vote for the payment.

Mr. PUGH. I dislike the use of the phrase "copy-right," and would prefer that my friend from Louisiana would substitute some phrase expressing his own present opinion. I agree with him that we ought to pay this gentleman for the injury we have done the circulation of his volume; but I suppose no Senator claims seriously, or imagines, that a reporter has a copy-right in what he did not write himself—the opinion of the judges.

As to the objection of the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Michigan, that this would be a violation of the compensation act, it seems to me only necessary to read the section of the law. This is section fifth:

"And be it further enacted, That if any books shall hereafter be ordered to, and received by, members of Congress, by a resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, the price paid for the same shall be deducted from the compensation herebefore provided for such member or members: Provided, however, That this shall not extend to books ordered to be printed by the Public Printer, during the Congress for which the said member shall have been elected."

This book was printed by the Public Printer, and would have been ordered by the Senate if the vote had been taken. This is a ratification of the order. It is an order now for all practical purposes. Senators might just as well claim that we are bound to deduct the cost of all the Japan books, and all the Pacific railroad books, for they were not literally reports from executive Departments; they were documents given to us for information. However, if there is any controversy about it, I am willing you should take out of my compensation, my share of the Dred Scott book, and the other Senators who received it may make a like deduction.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will move the amendment my friend from Ohio suggests, to strike out the words "copy-right, and," and also the word "others," from the resolution; and it will then read:

"In full for all charges incident to the said publication."

Mr. EVANS. If there is any error in relation to the use of the word "copy-right," it is mine; I inserted it. I wrote the report, and I wrote the amendment of the committee. I did not examine to see whether it was so or not; but I assumed from the conversations I had and the way in which the first resolution was worded, that the reporter had some exclusive privilege. I did not know from whence it originated or how it originated; but I supposed there was an exclusive privilege or a copy-right in his volume. I do not understand that he is a salaried officer exactly; but he is entitled to whatever he can make by his book. I supposed he had entered it, and had some copy-right. The error was mine; and I do not object to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not rise to prolong the discussion of the subject, but merely to state that, looking either at the abuse which was intended to be remedied by the act of 1856, or at the language of the law as I read it, I do not think the section read by the honorable Senator from Maine would prevent my voting for this resolution. I shall not detain the Senate now by stating the reasons. The abuse which it was intended to remedy was the furnishing to members of Congress documents for their own personal use for which ultimately money was to be accepted in lieu of books. The language of the section, as I read it, would not prevent our making the present order. If I thought so, I should vote against it.

The question being taken on the resolution as amended, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clay, Davis, Dixon, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Hale, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—12.

So the resolution was adopted.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TOOMBS, to strike but the first section of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, having already consumed the time of the Senate to a greater extent than I had anticipated, I shall endeavor to close my remarks very soon. Yesterday, in the progress of a review of the various objections made to the bill, I noticed those points that relate to efficiency and economy. I undertook to show, at that time, that it was better all the duties of our peace establishment, as it is called, should be performed by regular troops, than by the frequent calling out of the militia. I endeavored, also, to indicate at that time the sources of the increase in the expenditure of the Army, and to show that this was the result of the remote points at which the Army was serving; it was the result of the vast expense of transportation to those remote points; it was the result of the increased cost of everything which entered into the consumption and the active employment of the Army.

I do not recollect whether or not I stated another very essential difference: being that, whilst at the time the comparison of which I spoke was instituted, we had no mounted force except a small amount of light artillery, we now have nearly one third of the amount of the Army mounted; and that portion of the Army almost constantly in active service. Horses which at that time were worth sixty or seventy dollars, cost last year $176; forage has risen in the same proportion; and, as the loss of horses in the service of the United States has been referred to, I invite attention to the cases which I cited yesterday, and others of a like kind, where Indians had been pursued by troops for hundreds of miles without cessation, passing over sixty, and sometimes even eighty miles, almost, scarcely without drawing the rein, in pursuit of an enemy as wily, as brave, and, mounted on horses, nearly as fleet as the Arabs of the desert, over a country quite as inhospitable, and in which it is equally difficult to obtain water or food necessary to sustain a horse. Undergoing this severe fatigue under excessive heat, it is matter of surprise that horses, drawn immediately from the farms where they have been purchased, and forced into such service as this, should sink under the trial—should require to be renewed, and that the expenditure should be great, as they must be supplied not only at the high rates of the market, but at the accumulated value they have when transported to these remote points?

The distribution which is to be made of the gross amount of expenditure, according to the statement read by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] is not a distribution upon the heads of the soldiers. For a fair comparison, reference must be had to the different character of troops; and it will be readily seen that the simple division of a gross sum to be applied to a variety of objects cannot give a result which will express the cost of the soldier truly. The sum he has stated is, I believe, perhaps about that which a mounted soldier costs in the Army. Taking the troops serving at these remote points, engaged in these expeditions, and taking the cost of forage, and the supplying of remount horses, I believe it will amount to what he stated, $1,000 per capita; but this surely is not to be taken as the average cost of the Army, it being not the man only, but the horse also, and the cost of both depending on the locality of service. Equally delusive is the comparison made between the cost of this date and that selected, there being no cavalry at the former period, and the posts being then convenient to the great markets of the country, and contiguous to productive settlements.

I have never, I believe, either in my former or present service in the Senate, referred to any criticism in a newspaper, or to a newspaper article, and I do not intend to do so now in that character; but the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] yesterday, introduced a newspaper article, which, at that time, I had not read. Since it has been introduced by a Senator to the Senate, I will notice it; but otherwise I would not have done so. It is a flippant article contained in the Union of yesterday, in which the writer undertakes to arraign the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and presumptuously, also, to arraign the Senate, and, committing the most egregious blunders, to state what, under certain contingencies, the Senate would have done. He announces, after speaking of the wants, and delay the Senate had made in attending to them:

"Strange as this delay is, its causes are yet stranger. The increase recommended was by regiments. That recommendation came first from the Lieutenant General commanding the Army, indorsed by the Secretary of War, and finally approved by the President. It can scarcely be doubted, had the Military Committees, without delay, reported a bill in conformity with these suggestions, it would at this moment have been the law of the land, the regiments in a forward state of recruiting, and arrangements in progress for their early march to their places of destination."

So far as that delay occurred in the committee, it occurred during the period the committee were collecting information and investigating the subject, to reach a result and bring that result to the Senate. Then, sir, as to what the Senate would have done, that is not a matter of speculation. The substitute presented by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] the very proposition of the War Department, was voted upon, and it received but eight votes in the Senate; and of those eight votes, some Senators voted for it because they felt it was a proposition so easily killed that they had better substitute it for the bill of the committee, with no desire that it should pass, with no intent to sustain it, but simply adopting it as a means of readily disposing of the whole question.

This article proceeds to deal with military matters, and informs the Senate and the committee that all the knowledge on military affairs is at the other end of the avenue; and then the writer proceeds himself to launch out a little. Speaking of the Army organization, he says:

"Indeed, on inquiry, we learn that two of each of the twelve artillery companies are intended for light field artillery, and are not integrals of the garrison organization, which conforms to the other regiments, is of long standing, is the basis of our system, State and Federal, and of the systems of the European armies."

If he had happened to know a little about the organization of the European armies, of which he speaks so confidently, he would have understood that the artillery organization there is for a wholly different purpose—a purpose for which ours should be—and conforms to the idea which I once presented to the Senate, when in the War Department, to make our artillery organization for the use of large guns, and not as they are now—infantry, merely wearing a different uniform. The article proceeds:

"In fact, but a hasty glance at the books shows but one established system of regimental organization in all these different arms, and we find the entire tactical system based on battalion, squadron, regimental drill, and army evolutions, contemplating ten companies to each regiment."

The "glance" must have been "hasty" indeed—hastier than a "plate of soup;" and it must have been oblique as well as hasty; otherwise it certainly must have occurred to the writer of this article, who, it is apparent, is not as ignorant as he is inclined willfully to misrepresent, that so far from this being a uniform organization, it is an exception in every army of Europe; that so far from ten companies being the universal organization, so far from the tactics depending on the number of companies, he will not find in any system of tactics the word "regiment" used. All our tactical organization is on the basis of the battalion; and a battalion in the European armies usually consists of some fraction of a regiment. A regiment may consist of one, two, three, four, or six battalions, and in some circumstances it does. There are, in some services, regiments running up from six to twenty-four companies. The idea of ten companies being the basis recognized all over the world as necessary for the tactics, is an absurdity which a man who shows as much knowledge of the affair of which he writes as the writer of this article, cannot have committed with an honest purpose. Then he says:

"The mischief would not end in deranging the fixed Army basis, but would result in fundamentally changing the militia organizations in all the States of the Union, as they have adopted the Army plan, and must always look to it for its system of drill and instruction. Here, would be incalculable mischief and confusion."

Inc calculable mischief and confusion by changing the number of companies in a regiment!—a change that has been frequently made in our own history, and which, in its reference to the tactics, is not found to bear any relation at all, the whole being intended for a certain number of companies constituting a battalion; and it merely so happening that, when the tactics were prepared, ten companies did constitute a regiment; and, therefore, in assigning the captains to their posts in line, they are assigned numerically on the basis of ten companies to a regiment.

I wish it to be understood, sir, that it is because the Senator from New Hampshire has introduced this subject in the Senate, that I have departed from what is the course I have heretofore pursued, and stop to notice newspaper criticism on the action of the committee, or of the Senate, or of myself. In times past I have defied such criticism, and I expect to do it in the future. I rely upon the intelligence of the people to discriminate between the scribbler who arraigns a public man for the manner in which he performs his duty, and the justice that truth requires, as it is to be elaborated by their own intelligent minds.

I pointed out, in my remarks yesterday, the distinction between a State and a Territory in relation to the power of this Government to use its military force. This brings me to a brief notice of a remark in the President's message which refers to the withdrawal of the troops in Kansas in case Kansas should be admitted as a State. The President sees, no doubt, that troops are required elsewhere; and I agree with him, that if Kansas becomes a State, she ought then to provide for the execution of her own laws; and that if she requires extraneous aid, it ought to be sought only in the manner provided in the laws made in conformity with the Constitution. I agree with the President, that troops ought not to be quartered in the State of Kansas, or any other State, with a view to preserve civil order, and that the troops will be disposable when Kansas shall be admitted as a State. Whether peace will follow, I do not know. That depends on whether the people of Kansas are now fit to be a State. If they are fit to form and maintain a State and take their place as equals in this Union, then they do not require troops to be quartered in their midst in order to preserve civil order. That is a question which belongs to the future. In the mean time, I take it for granted that the President will withdraw the two thousand men heretofore kept, under the requisition of Governor Walker, to preserve peace in Kansas, and to suppress insurrection in the event of her admission into the Union.

That, then, renders two thousand men disposable for other service; but I submit to the Senate whether it will justify us in keeping our troops down to the present establishment. The long lines to be occupied, the numerous posts required, in addition to those we now have, demand an additional force. The committee have adopted a plan which gives us an increase of the integral parts of the Army. It was believed to be the most economical which could be adopted for that purpose, avoiding the very high expense that belongs to the higher grades of officers in the regimental organization, preserving the present efficiency, and opening in the future (when that future shall come and which I do not pretend to foresee) a convenient mode of reducing the Army by striking one battalion off each regiment; and if then, the President possess the power, on a declaration of a war, to restore this third battalion, it will render each regiment one third larger on the war than on the peace establishment, and they will go into the service with that efficiency and reliability which belong to discipline and instruction.

During the time I was particularly charged with the administration of the War Department, troops were kept in Kansas when I desired to get them out, not that I did not believe occasions were occurring where they might be useful—and they proved more useful than I believed they would be—but on account of the difficulties which then existed on our frontier. The campaign which had been projected against the Cheyennes was paralyzed by the keeping of troops in Kansas. Those troops were wanted on the frontier to preserve peace; they were wanted on the frontier to punish Indians who had committed acts of hostility; but they were detained in Kansas from day to day, from month to month, and year to year. We looked to the time when peace in Kansas would relieve the Government of the necessity of keeping them there. Time rolled on, and the necessity still continued. When those necessities are to cease, I am not able to foretell.

In the mean time you are aware that a small army has been thrown forward to preserve order and maintain the laws in the Territory of Utah. I shall not follow Senators in a discussion of the propriety of making that expedition against Utah. I believe, and I will say so much now, that the elements of disintegration were in the community of Mormons established in Utah; I believe that physical causes and moral causes were conjointly working together to break up that people. I believed then, and I am rather inclined to the opinion now, that if we had stood still they would have separated; that it required the compressive force of active movements against them to bring them into submission to their great leaders, to bring in the colonies that had been thrown off from the mother settlement at Salt Lake, back to the grand church, and to unite them under a bond of fanaticism that now makes them effective against any military force that you can probably send there.

But these are questions which belong to the past, and speculation upon which cannot guide our conduct in the future. The Government of the United States has thrown forward its troops on the trail of the Salt Lake. They are in the mountains now, a small body of men; perhaps sufficient, if they had started in time to have gone through to Salt Lake, to discharge their duty; but, checked in the mountains, it is probable that before spring arrives their animals will have been so reduced, so many will have been lost, that they will be without the ability to move. If the commander of that expedition, Colonel Johnston, has the transportation which will enable him to move, he will subdue resistance with the force he has. I speak it with a confidence which grows out of a long acquaintance, both in the garrison and in the field; but my apprehension is that he will not have the power to move, for the want of transportation; that he must stand where he is until he is reinforced.

Now let us see what is necessary to reinforce him. The column with which he moved was no larger than was necessary for its own security and the security of its supplies. Then the column that goes to reinforce him, if it were only with provisions and animals of draught, must be as large as the original column, and it must be larger still, because the train will be increased; and thus you will go on from year to year with every additional train of supplies you send out; sending a detachment of troops at least equal to, I believe it must be larger than, the original column which went forth under the command of Colonel Johnston. Year by year, then, as you delay, you will continue to increase the expenditure and increase the column that you are annually to send out. A column may come back, but the expense will not be the less for that reason. Your expenditure is to grow annually until this matter is terminated in one way or the other. If it is to be terminated by bringing the Mormons to submission to the Government of the United States by force, clearly, then, wisdom, both in relation to treasure and the honor of the country, require that an efficient force should be thrown forward at once, and that the act should be accomplished in the first months of the ensuing summer.

On the other hand, it may be that they will make no armed resistance; that they will fly to the mountains, hang in the gorges to harass trains and cut off emigrants. We then stand but in the same category. This army of occupation still is to be maintained; it is still to be supplied—supplied by a column capable of covering its lengthy train over the long march it must make through that arid, desert country, and thus annually you incur the same expense, if the object be merely to hold possession; whilst the rebels of the settlement at Salt Lake are scattered through the mountain passes, and lying in wait to capture the emigrant trains or the trains of Government supplies.

What other means may be in the power of the Administration to adopt to terminate this difficulty, is not within my knowledge. It may be that these people would be willing to withdraw from the controversy with the United States, and not being willing, on account of their religious oaths, to submit to the laws, and to surrender their hierarchical government, yet might be willing to leave the limits of the United States, and go to some remote region, if they had the means so to migrate; for I hold all speculation founded on the supposition that they are to go away in the spring to parts unknown, must prove entirely deceptive. No community ever had the transportation that would carry the whole body—politic to some remote country, and bear with them supplies to sustain them until other supplies could be grown in the country to which they had gone. They have no people waiting with open arms to receive them. Wherever they go, they are probably to meet with the hostility of the Government into whose country they enter. Unless they seek some island in the Pacific, I know of no place they can go where the Government will open its gates to receive them. Then they go not to find shelter, not to receive supplies; but they go bearing with them the supplies that are to support them, not merely during the march, but for at least six months after they have arrived at the place of destination. Is it not, then, apparent that they cannot go without the aid of the United States? If they wish to go, I would not only acknowledge in them the right of expatriation, if, indeed, they be citizens of the United States, but I would willingly give as much money, and more, too, than the campaign would cost, thus to get rid of them. I would much rather pay money to let them go peaceably than pay money to drive them away by shedding the blood of American inhabitants on American soil by American arms. Deluded fanatics—criminals they may be—I want not their blood shed by the Government of the United States.

Passing to the next supposition, if they shall retire, a force will be required to keep in check the Indians who surround them, already stimulated to hostility, holding a mountain region which can never be possessed by an agricultural people; indeed it required such associated labor as fanaticism only could command ever to enable the Mormons to support themselves in the valley of Salt Lake. Through that country our emigrant routes require constant military protection; and if the Mormons were out of the United States, still a force must be kept along those routes, or moving at stated periods across the continent to give protection to our emigrants traveling from the valley of the Mississippi to the slopes of the Pacific.

I do not see how we are to look forward, from any possible conclusion of this Mormon difficulty, to a reduction of the Army; and it was because of these and other things, with which I will not weary the Senate, (for I have already occupied too much of their time,) that I stated, in a very early period of this debate, that I did not propose a temporary increase, and that I could not anticipate the day when the reduction would come. This was the honest avowal of opinions which resulted from a somewhat careful examination of the subject.

During the last year I was in the War Office, an examination of the condition of that country and of the emigrant routes, and of the probable future, induced me to project a campaign which was to have started last spring, and to have gone across by the Salt Lake and through the Klamath valley, which was known to be filled with hostile Indians, to the slopes of the Pacific in the Territory of Oregon. That campaign was broken up; and the only reason I have ever known was, that it was thought to be too late for it to start. Provisions had been thrown forward as far as Fort Laramie, and every disposition had been made to render the campaign certain of success. Whenever they start, they will have to start later than the period when the order for that campaign was countermanded.

Mr. SEWARD. What time was that?

Mr. DAVIS. I think in May.

Mr. SEWARD. How soon do you think that Colonel Johnston's expedition can go forward?

Mr. DAVIS. I should think not before June, if they have the transportation. I think the snows will interfere with him, and it will be late before grass springs up on that portion of the route which lies between the valley he now occupies and the valley of the Salt Lake. I think under favorable circumstances only could he move as early as the 1st of June.

Among the amendments to the bill which have been suggested, one is to reduce the establishment at the termination of this campaign. I will offer no objection to that, because that is merely referring the question to the wisdom of the future. I have not, in any remarks that I have made, intended to offer any objection to a proposed reduction further than this: I deemed it due to myself to declare that I could not say that I believed, at that time, we could agree to a reduction. If the Senate decide it now, I have no objection to the provision being made now; no more than postponing it to that time. Whenever the time comes that the Army can be reduced, I shall be as ready to vote for its reduction in any form which may be practicable, with our theory of a skeleton peace establishment, as any one. I have no particular objection to the amendment which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUTN] has proposed; though I will say to him, in relation to the additional surgeons, that that does not depend on the size of the Army; it depends on the number of posts. The number of surgeons that may be required will depend on the manner in which the Army is distributed and administered.

When the four regiments were asked by the last Administration, no increase of the medical staff was asked, because the policy of that Administration was to concentrate the troops into larger bodies, relying for the control of the Indians more on campaigns than posts, and thus to diminish the number of medical officers who would be required, which does not depend on the number of troops, but on the number of parts into which you divide your Army. We now have some forty-two private physicians employed. They are generally employed at remote points, without any possibility of knowing whether they are competent or not; and the soldier, prostrated by disease at a point where he cannot possibly get a physician on private account, is turned over to somebody whom the Department cannot know. That is the present condition. We ask for an increase of fifteen assistant-surgeons, which is only a part of the whole number of private physicians now employed; but by employing those private physicians at recruiting stations and at posts near to cities, it will be possible to avoid the evil which is felt when the necessity occurs of employing a private physician on the Army frontier. It will be economy. You get not only persons of whose competency you have the power to judge, but you get them at a much lower rate than it is possible to hire private physicians.

Looking hopefully forward to the end of all present difficulties, Senators have proposed to fix a time and manner of reducing our military establishment. There are many practicable methods of reduction. I have mentioned one this morning—cutting off a certain number of companies from each regiment, and leaving the regimental organization entire, so as to give the readiest increase in time of war. Reduce the number of companies to eight, which gives you the battalion; our present system being, in a regiment of ten, to call eight battalion companies, and two flank companies; sometimes the two are called light companies; sometimes the two are called one light company and one grenadier company; but the ninth and tenth companies are flank companies; they are not companies of the battalion at all. Our organization is the battalion.

But we have been told that there is not the power to reduce the Army; and why not? The Senator from Texas says it is on account of the graduates of the Military Academy, and that it is necessary even to increase the Army to make places for them. That is a question of figures. The number of graduates did not equal the number of casualties that occurred last year; a number of appointments were made from civil life and one from the ranks of the Army. There were vacancies which occurred in the Army after absorbing the brevets which had been attached to the Army during the previous year, showing that the class of the previous year did not equal the casualties of the year. But have we not power to reduce the Army, and have the young gentlemen educated in the Military Academy such political puissance that the Senate dare not brave them? The officers of the Army, the class in the community that have no vote, thrown out on the frontier so far that if they were to speak their voice would not be heard, how are they to control the action of the Senate? It is a reflection on the Senate, more degrading to it as a body than the depreciatory terms which the Senator applied to the Army. I believe we can, and I believe we will, when we find the interest of the country justifies it, cut down this or any other part of our governmental establishment; and I only wish that the same scrutiny could be applied to other portions of the expenditures of the Government of the United States.

In this connection I believe I did not allude to one point, which I will not at this time press, for I have already consumed too much time. The fact that no small part of the expenditures incurred in connection with our Indian troubles results from the administration of the Indians being under one Department, and the military affairs under another. The Interior Department and the Army are thus brought into conflict on the frontier. The Government pays both the contestants. The Government, through the Interior Department, sends arms and ammunition to the very Indian tribe whom the next month the War Department may send troops to subdue. Thus discontent and distrust arise between the two branches of the public service. The Interior Department sends presents to the Indians, and those Indians receive the presents after they have committed a foray on a settlement, and been chased for hundreds of miles by the troops; and thus they find their Great Father sending them these tokens of peace and good will, notwithstanding their misdeeds. It results from the organization, and it will continue until the control of the Indians is transferred back to the War Department. Then you bring the whole in connection; then a change from the peaceful to the hostile relation does not change the Department with which the Indians bear their connection. Then they will understand, after they have been subdued by force, that they are treating with the same power that subdued them, and their very narrow comprehension will then see that the Government of the United States is one, whereas now it presents itself to their view as divided.

A few remarks now upon the general subject will, I believe, enable me to relieve the Senate. In various phraseology, it has been charged that the Army everywhere is the enemy of liberty, the instrument of despotism. One Senator even arraigned the Executive as wishing to use the Army to subvert the liberty of the country. An old man, who has attained the highest station his country could confer, and that the highest station in the world, rising to it through the beneficial character of our institutions, which has enabled an obscure boy to become the Chief Magistrate of a great people, must now turn, according to this idea of the Senator from New Hampshire, and make war with the Army upon the liberty of the country to which he owes whatever he is—identified with which has been the whole course of his public life; associated with which is his every achievement; and the destruction of which would only save him from oblivion by preserving him for ignominy. What object could he have? His highest ambition, the highest ambition which earth offers, having been attained, he must now seek to crush the very steps by which he has ascended! Can it be so?

But, sir, suppose a Chief Magistrate to be so wicked and so silly as this, how could he use the Army for such purpose? Refugees, to some extent, from other countries, who have come here to enjoy liberty, weary of the despotism of the land in which they were born, and natives of the United States, cradled by mothers who would, themselves, have met a despot if he had come to the threshold of their houses, and with their own feminine arms have repulsed tyranny from the land of their birth—commanded by men who have been selected in their boyhood from the various conditions of the people and sections of our country, educated in the service of the Government, accustomed to look up to it as not only a temple beneath which they found shelter, but to uphold which, in all its beauty and its strength, was the great end and aim of all their earthly ambition—trained to love, to respect, and to follow a flag emblematic of that Union which makes us a confederation of sovereignties, following from year to year, upon a poor pittance which barely sustains life, a profession to which they have been educated and to which they are attached, looking through it only to promotion and that reputation which is to be gained by the peril of their life, if an opportunity should offer, in the cause of their country—educated gentlemen, drawn from every section of the Union, from every condition of life, are suddenly, because they bear commissions and have sworn to sustain the Constitution and to serve their country against all enemies whatsoever, to be converted into the mere instrument which a tyrant may use for the overthrow of the country's liberties. And yet further, sir, these men, such as they are, segregated into little bodies of forty or fifty, or two hundred at a place, thousands of miles apart—he who was born in the South stationed in the North, and he who was born in the North stationed in the South, or he who was born in the South stationed in the land of his birth, and enjoying communion with the people who gave to him his first impressions, and so of him of the North—how are these men, in these little detached handfuls, all over our wide-spread country, to combine against the liberties of the Union?

In this connection, sir, I wish to read a single remark of Mr. Calhoun, for this is not a new subject. I read from a letter of his, addressed to the House of Representatives, December 14, 1818, to be found at page 779 of the State Papers, Military Affairs, volume 1:

"I have not overlooked the maxim that a large standing army is dangerous to the liberty of the country, and that our ultimate reliance for defense ought to be in the militia. Its most zealous advocate must, however, acknowledge that a standing army, to a limited extent, is necessary; and no good reason can be assigned why any should exist but which will equally prove that the present is not too large. To consider the present Army as dangerous to our liberty partakes, it is conceived, more of timidity than wisdom."

He then goes on to speak of the condition and character of the Army. We are told, however, and told truly, that republics have been overthrown by military organizations; but when did such a Republic as ours exist? Is Rome to be compared to this country? Rome is cited as an example to point the future destinies of the United States. Hers was an empire. When she had the name of a republic she was yet but a consolidated empire, with dependent provinces won by conquest, and governed by pro-consuls. Is this to be assimilated to our great family of States, each governing itself, each independent of all others, but all connected together for the common welfare, the common glory, and the general good?

Then we are cited to cases in Europe, where despotism is maintained by standing armies; but suppose the despot had an American army to rely upon, would they be faithless to their first impressions, faithless to the free blood which runs in their veins and which descends from the bold barons of Runnymede? or would he not find when he came to review the line of his army, on every brow set the seal of inborn equality and independence, and would not some private in those ranks thunder in the ear of the despot, like Patrick Henry, the warning of the fate of Caesar and of the fate of Charles?

Is it to be inferred that a man who is a freeman at his birth, who has all the spirit of republicanism in his heart, is to lose it by entering the military profession? Is it true, as the Senator from Texas has told us, that service in the Army stultifies young men? It cannot be. He is a bright example of the reverse himself. It was his proud fortune to rise from the ranks by his own merit to a commissioned officer, to serve in the Army, and there to acquire many of those qualities, endowments, and graces, which have adorned this Chamber. He stands in himself a brilliant example of how little the Army stultifies, and how much it may exalt the youth contained in its ranks.

We have other great examples. Did Washington become the fit instrument of a despotism? was he stultified because he entered the service of the United States in his youth? That great mind which comprehended the whole condition of the colonies; that heart which beat sympathetically for every portion of his common country, feeling equally for Massachusetts and South Carolina, for New York and Virginia; that great arm which smoothed the thorny path of revolution, and led the people from rational liberty up to independence, and laid the foundation of that prosperity and greatness which have made us a people, not only an example for the whole world, but a protection to liberal principles wherever liberty asserts a right—was he stultified by service in the Army? Jackson too, the indomitable Jackson, who when a boy and a captive spurned the insult of a despot and received a wound, the scar of which he carried to his grave—was he by service in the Army when yet a minor, by brilliant exploits in middle age, rendered the fit instrument of despotism? If it be said these were men drawn from the pursuits of civil life and only occasionally employed, what, then, shall be said of the great, the good, the heroic Taylor? for a hero he was, not in the mere vulgar sense of animal courage, but by the higher and nobler attributes of generosity and clemency. His was an eye that looked unquailing in the hour of danger, when the messengers of death were flying around him; an eye which softened at the appeal of the vanquished; but when he stood in the ward-room over his wounded comrade it was involuntarily moistened with the tear of compassion. He was a hero, a moral hero. His heart was his country's, and his life had been his country's own through all its stages. Was he the fit instrument of a despot to be used for the overthrow of the liberties of the United States?

Shall I prove my proposition by going on and multiplying examples; or is it not apparent that whatever may be true of the history of Rome, whatever may be true of the condition of Europe, the United States stands out its own founder and its own example? No other people like our own ever founded a State. No other people like our own have ever thus elevated a State to such greatness in so small a space of time. If there be evidence of decay, that decay is not to be found in the spirit of your little Army, but is to be hunted for in the impurities of your politicians. It therefore does not become the politician to point to our little and gallant and devoted Army, as the incipient danger which is to overthrow the liberties of this country.

If I have succeeded, Mr. President, in impressing upon Senators the principal truths I have endeavored to advance, I have succeeded in showing that the plan of increase which we propose is the most economical and efficient within our reach. If their judgment, however, shall decide otherwise, I then have performed my duty. I have argued this question earnestly because I am thoroughly convinced of the advantages of the bill which is before us. If I am in error it is fortunate for me that the majority of the Senate will correct it. If I am right, the future will sustain my opinion, even though it be overruled now. I am, therefore, content with whatever fortune may befall the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, after the very eloquent and interesting speech of the Senator from Mississippi, I feel that I must of necessity, in defending what I believe to be correct policy, appear much to disadvantage. I have been impressed with the eloquence and propriety of his remarks so far as they are general in their application, but to this particular case I do not conceive them applicable; but this may be owing to defective judgment or want of taste on my part. In the outset, however, I will ask of the honorable Senator to state in what instance I have used words derogatory to the Army? Certainly it was not my intention to disparage that respectable class of gentlemen in the least; but he spoke of the hard terms I used in relation to the Army.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not the Senator's speech before me, but I noted it as he went on. He spoke of the absence of respectability in the Army. He spoke of it as the result of there being no means of promotion. He spoke of the incompetency of officers. He spoke of their design to increase the Army for their own advantage. He spoke of their standing in the way of their betters and seniors. I do not know, if the Senator wishes me to repeat the particular sentences, how I could do it otherwise than by getting the Globe. I suppose he recollects the ideas he advanced.

Mr. HOUSTON. Perhaps some terms escaped me that were improper for this body, as well as reflecting on the character of gentlemen, which I should have regretted exceedingly. If to assume a position, and maintain it by a statement of facts is derogatory to the Army, that is not my fault, but my misfortune. When I said that our Army in time of peace was not composed of the best material, I alluded to the rank and file; and I stated that perhaps not more than one fourth of them were native-born citizens of the United States. A large portion of them are foreigners, who are not naturalized, and therefore can have no sympathy with our institutions, and no feeling for our cause, except that of mercenaries. I do not think that the most respectable description of force.

But, sir, I am for an efficient army; I want one to execute whatever the emergency requires, and for that reason I have opposed the present bill, and advocated the motion of the Senator from Georgia to strike out the first section. I think the enactment of that section will produce no favorable result to the country. It will not meet the emergency; it will accumulate the expenses of the country, and will not redound much to its honor.

The Senator from Mississippi read the opinion of Mr. Calhoun in reference to the danger arising from the Army. I should be glad to have him state what was the strength of the Army at the time when Mr. Calhoun wrote the letter from which he read. I think it was a much less number than it is now. The Army which Mr. Calhoun considered not dangerous was not near as large as our present Army. I have never apprehended any martial danger resulting to the country from the standing Army. Their segregated character will be proof against that. The evil of which I have spoken, results from political influence. As you increase the number of officers, you increase the number of families connected with them, and they feel interested in the promotion of their relatives. These families have an influence in their respective localities, and in that way the whole community may be inoculated by the same sentiment, and the same political disease may pervade this nation. It is in this Chamber and in the Hall of the House of Representatives that the danger is to be feared, not in the array of martial men.

I am afraid of no tyrant usurping the liberties of any people. They have never been usurped; they have been relinquished and abandoned. Cæsar and Cromwell and Bonaparte have been denounced as tyrants, and our school-boy teachings are all of that character; but, sir, those men were not tyrants; they were the conservators of national existence. It was the Senate of Rome that became so corrupt that liberty could no longer exist in Rome, and the question was not as to Roman liberty, but who should be the master of Rome—Cæsar or Pompey. Cæsar's star was in the ascendant, and he redeemed the country. How was it with Cromwell? While England was a Commonwealth, was not the Rump Parliament the seat of corruption, the very heart of rottenness? Cromwell purged it; and he did this with a strong arm and a sharp knife; but the incision was necessary. He did well to do it. He preserved the British nation and gave it prowess. How was it with Napoleon? France had passed through sanguinary scenes, the gutters of her capital streaming with innocent blood; and then Napoleon took the helm like a man, and he corrected the corruptions of France, and built it up the mighty Power of the earth. He taught the French eagles to soar; and even upon the pyramids of Egypt they perched in triumph. He was not a tyrant; but he was the master of a people who could not live without a master. They invoked him; they invited him by their vices or their corruptions, as England had Cromwell, and as Rome had Cæsar. No people can be conquered by a single man or a single mind while they mean to be free. Men are born to be free so long as they are virtuous and patriotic, and whenever they cease to be either they are disfranchised and deserve the despot's lash.

It is not the Army that I am afraid of; but it is the outward pressure of the officers of the Army and their friends, to operate on the legislation of this nation, that I dread. If I had passed away a few years ago I should have carried more rest to my grave than I can do now, unless there shall soon be a change in the political complexion of affairs. I then could have passed away with anticipations of the perpetuity of our Union, and the preservation of the purity of our institutions; but I see encroachment after encroachment on the foundation of our liberties slide on unobserved. They are insidious; and so it is to be with this official power that is growing up in this nation, and beneath the weight of which it will fall; and then a master will rise.

Mr. DAVIS. I will now answer the Senator's question, if he will give me permission to do so.

Mr. HOUSTON. With great pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS. I had intended to refer very little to documents to-day, as I was not able, yesterday, to find the place so promptly as I might have done; but there is a table connected with the letter from which I read, showing the aggregate of the Army to be twelve thousand five hundred and sixty-six; and the total of non-commissioned officers and privates, or enlisted men, eleven thousand five hundred and thirty-five. That was according to the organization of 1818.

Mr. HOUSTON. That was the number in the Army at the time Mr. Calhoun wrote the letter to which the Senator referred, and he was not then asking for any increase; though I have no doubt he may have felt a political influence harassing him to do so. My experience of this Government has shown me that there are two things you may do: you may reduce postage too low, but you never can raise it; and you may increase the Army, but you never can reduce it. Why is this? I have friends in the Army, but I thank God I have no relative in any Federal office, and I hope I never shall. If any relatives of mine ever possess influence or place, I hope it will be an emanation from the people of the country, resulting from confidence in their integrity as patriots and as honest men, and that they will never hold a Federal office unless they can return in benefits to the country more than they receive in pecuniary reward. Members of Congress have their friends in the Army. They say, "Colonel such-a-one, our friend, if we reduce the Army, will have to go into private life, for which he is disqualified from the pursuits in which he has been engaged; Lieutenant such-a-one is a noble youth; Captain such-a-one is a charming fellow; and Major so-and-so is an elegant man; we do not want the Army reduced because the ax will strike some of our friends when it falls." We all have our personal predilections; we have our partialities; or we have our associations in private life, and we do not wish to meet their reproaches or frowns, and therefore we cannot vote for a bill which our conscience tells us we ought to vote for. We are not more omnipotent than other men. We have the infirmities of humanity clustering around our hearts and sympathy continually clawing at us. We cannot resist importunities; and thus it is that you may easily increase the Army, but you cannot make a reduction when the necessities of a country require it.

Now, sir, I mean to refer to some documents to show the discretion that has been used in the chastisement of the Indians, and to prove that the aggression has not been from them. The Indians have no one to vindicate them; they have no sympathizers; they have no newspapers to issue their bulletins, and tell their misfortunes or the wrongs done to them. The white man has every facility. The Indian has no one to speak for him; for in nine instances out of ten, in my experience, I have found that those who should have been the guardians of the Indians' rights, appointed by the Government and paid for the purpose, have been their robbers, and frequently that robbery has brought on war. I do not speak of the Indian beyond his merits. I know him well, though the honorable Senator from Mississippi has been pleased to say that those gentlemen who have been educated at West Point, with all the advantages the country could give them, when stationed on the frontier know more and have better acquaintance with the Indians than myself. I do not wish to contradict the Senator, nor do I know that the facts would justify me in doing so; but humble as I may be, I am entitled to an opinion. I have some knowledge of the Indian, for when a boy fourteen years of age, it was my fate, an orphan lad, to be located within six miles of their boundary, where I was reared to manhood and in almost daily association with them. I had not, to be sure, the advantage of an education at West Point Academy to imbue me with that prescience which its graduates possess when they are accidentally thrown on the frontier in the discharge of their official duties!

Mr. DAVIS. I am sure the Senator would not willfully misunderstand me; and I am not willing that he should believe I said anything so unkind as a reflection of that sort would imply. I was not speaking of the education of gentlemen anywhere; I was not speaking of the scientific attainments of the officers who had received a West Point education; I was speaking merely of officers whose long connections with the Indians gave them a knowledge of Indians more intimate than any other class in our community.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I am accounting for my own want of knowledge.

Mr. DAVIS. What I said cannot admit your want of knowledge. You are doing injustice to yourself.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not wish to have it said that I apply hard names to the Army; but I have a right to allude to the facts which are before the country. I do not care how ingenious may be the graduates of West Point, or what grasp of mind they may possess, I say experience is the great teacher and nature the schoolmaster. I remarked that I had been reared on the immediate border of the Indians, and in constant association with them. It was where the bold Tennessee gushes her waters through the great mountain of Chilhowee; and I learned to scale its topmost peak realizing that perseverance and energy would master much. Indomitable will enable me to reach its highest peak, and there stand and contemplate the valley below. Undismayed by difficulties, I will not yield a principle that I cherish in my heart. I cannot consent to give up my opposition to an increase of the regular Army.

In such scenes I was reared to manhood; and when my duties called me to the Army, I was associated with the Indians, for they were in the army of Jackson in the Creek Nation. After that, in 1817, when still a subaltern in the Army, I was appointed an Indian agent by the Government—the first sub-agent that ever was appointed; and for a twelvemonth I was again associated with them in the transaction of business, and renewed the old associations of boyhood. After the duties of my agency were over, occasionally those associations were preserved; and when, in after life, reverses came upon me, and dark clouds fell upon my pathway, I spent in exile four years with the Indians, with various tribes. Tell me I do not understand the Indian! Too well I understand his wrongs. Tell me that with all the advantages of education, and all the bright associations of the world, and in all the galas of fashion, you are to learn the Indian's character and disposition, and the history of his wrongs! No, sir, they are in tradition; they are not in history, and I have learned them. I know them. I know his disposition; I know it well, and better than any officer who is on the frontier of the United States. If I have not the experience which I have cited, this might be considered boasting; but I feel that I only state the truth. I know that their character is as I have stated, for I have not failed to conciliate them wherever I have tried, and how? By even-handed justice. Hold the scales of justice suspended with a steady hand between yourself and the Indian, and you will have no danger from him, it will not be necessary to suspend the sword above his head, like the sword of Damocles.

Why, sir, with one twentieth part of the money expended to support the Army, or even less, you could feed the Indians on our borders, and clothe them in comfortable garments; and then you would need no Army except to take care of your fortresses, and keep you arms in order; for I am sure you can never rely on a regular Army unless you make it like the European armies of hundreds of thousands of men. I call on the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, who has worn proud and green laurels on his brow, to say with whom did he win them—with the regular soldiers? He gave years of his life to the regular service, but he won no laurels there that I ever heard of. The harvest was with the volunteers in Mexico, where he won rich laurels; and he wears them well. He purchased them with his own blood, and the blood of volunteers commingled on victorious fields.

He cites the case of Washington. Why, sir, Washington began his military career as a militia officer under Braddock, and as soon as Braddock's campaign was done, he retired to the scenes of private life. He did not seek the Army as an avocation. When the Revolution began, destiny called him to the head of our forces. Nothing that I could say in commendation of him would add one laurel to his brow, nor can his civic wreath receive addition from mortal tongue. He retired from office whenever the necessities of his country permitted him to do so.

Jackson, too, was called from private life to military service; and I venture to say he never mustered with a company in his life before he went into actual service. He knew nothing about tactics. Strategy rises far above your martinets and tacticians. It soars in a higher sphere. There is an alembic connected with it that is not mechanical alone. He could well direct and comprehend who were to be his artizans; while he was the great master workman, the architect of high designs. Jackson was called into the field at forty years of age, and when the emergency was over he retired again to private life. He never sought office. He even resigned a seat in this august body, that he might give place to a man, as he supposed, of more experience and enlightened views—General Smith. He afterwards resigned the office of Major General in the Army, or intimated his disposition not to serve longer. He resigned the Governorship and Captain-generalship of Cuba and Florida, after he had accomplished the purpose of his Government there. He sought private life, or, if he occupied public station, it was for the purpose of being useful to the country, and not be an incubus upon it.

There is another point which I must notice. The Senator from Mississippi says the road of promotion from the ranks is now open. It may be open, but I never hear of anybody traveling that road. The door is wide open but nobody goes in. West Point Academy furnishes a suitable supply of officers. Sergeants and other non-commissioned officers, who are commended as worthy of promotion, do not receive it. Only the other day one brought me a note attested by officers under whom he had served for eight years. He was recommended to me from the fact that, once having been a sergeant myself, it was supposed I would sympathize with him. I examined him, and I saw that his indorsements of character were sufficient. To the eye, he was a gentleman; but he is doomed to a sergenty. He has his lines, and he cannot rise above them. Numbers have applied to me since I have been on this floor as a Senator, to aid them in procuring situations. Some may have received them for aught I know, but if so it never was known to me. I have never known of a solitary promotion of that kind. If the door is open, but persons are not admitted, I do not think it amounts to much. Whenever I see that they are sought after, I will look into the ranks of the United States Army for men to sustain the reputation of the country as officers, and then men will enter your ranks for the purpose of obtaining promotion by good conduct. When I entered the service, if I had been doomed all my life to be a private soldier or a sergeant, notwithstanding all the ardor of youth, and the fervor of patriotism which I thought I possessed, I could not have been induced in time of peace to enlist in the Army. I believed, however, at that time, that it would not be detrimental to my advancement in the service of my country for me to take a position where I could learn my duty before I undertook to teach others theirs. There I learned the duty of a soldier. I know his wants, and his feelings, and I can appreciate his necessities.

Now, sir, to show that the Indians came off badly on some occasions, I will read from the public documents before me a brief extract in regard to the Brulé war. Little Thunder and the Indians under his command were set upon while they were peacefully moving with their families, and with the supplies necessary for their support. I desire to read from the report of General Harney—an officer for whom I have always entertained the highest respect. General Harney, it appears, was ordered to retaliate on the Sioux for having murdered some troops—Gunnison's command, I think. He had a parley with them, and he attacked them, after finding out that they were there with their warriors, their women and children, and their supplies for an inclement season. I will read his own account:

"But, before reaching it, the lodges were struck, and their occupants commenced a rapid retreat up the valley of the Blue Water, precisely in the direction from whence I expected the mounted troops. They halted short of these, however, and a parley ensued between their chief and myself, in which I stated the causes of the dissatisfaction which the Government felt towards the Brulés, and closed the interview by telling him that his people had depredated upon and insulted our citizens whilst moving quietly through our country; that they had massacred our troops under most aggravated circumstances, and that now the day of retribution had come; that I did not wish to harm him personally, as he professed to be a friend to the whites; but that he must either deliver up the young men, whom he acknowledged he could not control, or they must suffer the consequences of their past misconduct, and take the chances of a battle. Not being able, of course, however willing he might have been to deliver up all the butchers of our people, Little Thunder returned to his band to warn them of my decision, and to prepare them for the contest that must follow.

"Immediately after his disappearance from my view, I ordered the infantry to advance."

Little Thunder had gone to confer with his people; before he returned, the massacre commenced. Was this the way to maintain peace? If the troops killed the Indians on that occasion, how many defenseless human beings must become sufferers to that retaliation which is the nature of their savage state? But this new addition to the Army must accomplish something, the four regiments had done nothing up to that time, and they must achieve something, to justify the raising of them. Let me read further:

"The results of this affair were, eighty-six killed, five wounded, about seventy women and children captured, fifty mules and ponies taken, besides an indefinite number killed and disabled. The amount of provisions and camp equipage must have comprised nearly all the enemy possessed."

They were sent to starve or depredate on the frontier. In that inclement region, where game was wanting, what were they to do? Deprived of all their means of subsistence, how were they to live? They were to steal, to murder, or to rob, for they must live or famish. He says, further:

"Teams have been constantly engaged in bringing into camp everything of any value to the troops, and much has been destroyed on the ground."

That was a scene—an Indian chief willing to give up the offender if he had power, but protesting that he could not be accountable for the acts of outlaws; and we know that it is so. Suppose some persons from Baltimore county should inflict wrong on citizens of the District of Columbia, and were to kill one or two of them: would it be just in the people here to demand of the superior officer of that community restitution or surrender of the murderers? And if he should say it was not in his power to surrender them, but that he wanted peace, and would do all he could to preserve it, and they should go on and punish his people for what had been done, turn loose on the women and children wherever they might be congregated, and massacre them, what kind of justice would there be in that? Would there not be as much justice in that as to say that because an Indian chief could not surrender the lawless fellows of his band, you would murder women and children and warriors indiscriminately? Circumstances of this kind lead to interminable war. I have no doubt, however, this gallant officer obeyed the orders and met the views of the Government. Here is what Colonel P. St. George Cooke says:

"There was much slaughter in the pursuit, which extended from five to eight miles, and in which Heth's company took their gallant share, but with the great disadvantage, amongst others, of being armed with rifles. Very few, if any, of the enemy should have escaped if I could have handled the reserve."

"Following the reports of the several commanders, the loss of the enemy inflicted by my command was seventy-four killed, five wounded, forty-three prisoners, (women and children.)"

He does not say whether they were men, women, or children, that were killed; but he says so many were killed; and I see that in another place, by way of excuse he says that the women were armed and dressed like the men, and fought with arrows and wounded his soldiers. I presume such women were killed; but he does not say so. Now, sir, I never war with the ladies. I do not think that is gallant; and I think it is still less gallant to war on children, for some of them may become ladies after proper care. That is one instance of the species of warfare carried on with the Indians.

The honorable Senator told us yesterday of the achievements of the army in Texas. I had not heard of them before. It seems some of them surprised the Indians, but those who did so were dragoons. Well, sir, I have not said a word against the dragoons. I have not said they were inefficient. I said that the troops you now propose to raise would be inefficient for this service, but I have never cast any reflections on the dragoons. I have not said that they were not perfectly efficient. The only allusion I made to them was to the drill that was practiced in Texas; but those men may have all broken their necks in falling off their horses. [Laughter.] I said the dragoons were the only description of troops that ought to be employed on the frontier, except to maintain stations to protect trading-houses with the Indians. We find that those men who have achieved so much in Texas surprised three different parties of Indians. I have no doubt of it. I have known parties of Indians surprised in Texas—some that were coming in to hold a treaty in a very friendly way, yet were set upon and murdered, and our citizens' lives paid the penalty for it. I think the Senator read two or three instances where some horses that had been stolen were reclaimed. I am glad of it. That shows an efficient description of service, that I approve and admire.

In another instance which he cited, the dragoons attacked the Indians, whose warriors came out to fight them. He does not say whether the women and children did not incur the warriors; he does not say that they were not hunting on a peaceful party; but the dragoons attacked them, and the women and children of course took to the chaparral. The troops to be employed on the frontier ought not only to understand the topography of the country, but they should be familiar with the character of the Indians; they ought to know whether they are for peace or for war before they treat them as belligerents.

As to the achievements of which the honorable Senator spoke, in New Mexico, they may be all right officially; but what he read stated that the troops had traveled eighty miles a day over rough mountains. To me that is rather a fishy story. [Laughter.] If it were printed twenty times, I could not think it. I have crossed mountains myself which were tolerably smooth, and I never could go eighty miles a day. There must be a mistake in that part of it; and if part of it is a mistake, I do not see why the whole of it may not be.

The Senator gave us a very handsome, tasteful, and elegant sketch of the feelings that the youths who enter the Military Academy must have; and I presume they must imbue the whole military force. He says young men go there from whom no danger can be apprehended, and that they will never conspire against their country, but will strike down the tyrant or usurper. Sir, I see a difficulty and a misfortune attending this military training in early life, and I cannot come to any other conclusion than that it is a great misfortune. The more closely you connect family associations; the more you endear families to each other, as members of society, the greater is the hope of harmony and of the continuance of affection. If you take a boy at the age of fifteen and send him to an institution like the Military Academy, you estrange him from his associates in early life. He loses that reverence for his parents which would have grown up with him if he had been left at home. Their moral teachings are lost upon him. He may, perhaps, retain a remembrance of some portion of them; but they are not daily inculcated by example and precept. He becomes alienated from his brothers and sisters. New associations and detachments withdraw him from home, and he gradually forgets it. He remains at school four or five years, where his mind is attracted to other pursuits, and home gradually loses its attractions for him. He only recollects it as a thing of the past. He remembers his kindred like others who have been kind to him; for he has found in the world friends and associates who are agreeable. He loses that filial and paternal affection which he ought to cherish through life. He becomes a soldier of fortune, wedded to the Army. His sword is his companion. He feels that if with it he gets promotion, he will be happy. He forgets the ties of home and of family, and becomes, if you please so to call him, a son of the Republic; and if an Emperor were at the head of the Government, he would be the Emperor's son.

Is this training calculated to increase a man's affection for his country, or to add to his patriotism, further than as he conceives the benefits he receives are reciprocal? But, sir, go to the walks of private life; go to the volunteers. Who are they? They are men who, when they come to the camp, quit the warm affections and embraces of affectionate friends. They leave maternal or sisterly, or it may be conjugal affection. They rally to the standard of their country, and are anxious to achieve something, and return to those endearments for which they cherish so much fondness. They move with alacrity and spirit; there is no desertion among your volunteers. But in one year I have noticed that, in a single command of the regular Army, nearly half the troops deserted. There are no volunteer desertions, because home is no refuge for the dishonored man; but it is the elysium of the patriot. After he has performed his duty, he returns to the embraces of his family, to the confidence of his friends, to the esteem of his neighbors. He has every incentive to noble achievement. He has everything to invite him to return speedily to the walks of private life. When his country needs him, he drops the plow-handle, contemplates the objects of his attachment, and departs for the scene of action. When the danger is over, he returns again to his family. When his country again calls, he knows her tocsin, and he rallies to her banners. This should be the standing army of America—freemen, and none but freemen. Are they not more efficient than regulars? Certainly, if they had the same drilling and exercise, they would be. Why? Because they are not taken up here and there, as circumstances and pinching necessity may drive a man from want to enlist in the service. They are men who have substance to return to at home, and who only lend their arms for a while to their country, desiring to return again to their families. These are the efficient men, depend upon it. When the stronghold of liberty dissolves, there will be no volunteers in America.

Now, sir, how long will it take you to organize an army for the conquest of Utah, if you are to undertake that? If this increase of the Army is not intended for Kansas or for Utah, I do not see on what ground it can be urged at all. It is said it is not for Kansas. Then it must be for Utah. The Senator from Mississippi and myself have different notions about the result of that campaign and the condition of it at this particular time. Let an improper inference might be drawn if I were to do so, I shall not give an opinion as to the situation of the troops there now, what it has been for a month past, and what it will be for a month to come. I have done it privately, but here I will not do it. The Senator thinks the military head of that expedition is competent to everything. I will not gainsay that. He vouches for him, and I know he is candid in his voucher.

If you pass this bill, you must send officers over the country to recruit; and what kind of men will they get? Efficient, active men, accustomed to the use of arms—men who will be readily drilled and rendered effective in service? No; but men whose necessities drive them to the Army, who are thrown out of employment in the cities; and who, to avoid "loafing," or that becoming a bad business, seek refuge in the Army. A large proportion of the troops you may raise will answer to this description. You cannot, in a twelve-month, fill the ranks with the number proposed to be raised. Considering the transportation of supplies, I think I may safely say that you will not, in less than a year and a half, get to Utah, drilled and prepared for service, the regular troops whom you propose to raise by this bill.

If, however, you take volunteers, how long will it require for them to be recruited and go to the scene of action? In fifteen days from the time proclamation is made, they will be organized and ready to march from Missouri, from Iowa, from Texas, from California. Allowing twenty miles per day, it would take them fifty days to go to Utah from Fort Leavenworth, or from Iowa, or from Texas. It would require mounted volunteers to accomplish the distance in that time. If they were infantry, it would take seventy-five or eighty days; and they could not start until May or June. In the course of sixty days at the farthest, you could have in Utah, from Texas two regiments, from Missouri two regiments, and from Iowa two regiments, or as many as are necessary for the emergency. When this is done they return to their homes, and they are no further cost or charge to you. But admitting that their expenses are double those of regular troops while they are in service, when the campaign is over the expense ceases. If there is an emergency now calling on us for action, volunteer troops are the only ones suited to the occasion. If the object is to increase the standing Army, I am opposed to it.

These are my views in relation to this emergency, and I am as anxious to see the country quiet as any one. I think that volunteers, active, sprightly, animated young men, going to that country, would be the best means of breaking up the Mormons. When they get there they will feel that they are cut off from the rest of the world; they will be delighted with the country, and be pleased to settle there. They will take wives from amongst the Mormons, and that will break up the whole establishment; it will take away their capital. [Laughter.]

My convictions are, that the true reliance of the country for its defense is on the volunteers. If you undertake to keep up a large army, the result will be deleterious to the country. If you add during each presidential term four regiments, you will have, in the course of the administration of five Presidents, in twenty years, twenty thousand men in addition to the present force. If you think it necessary to increase the Army in that ratio, very well; but I think that is a course which ought not to be persisted in. If I were to remain in this body, I should urge on the attention of this nation the civilization of the Indian tribes, and in this way we should dispense with a portion of the military force. When Texas was a Republic, her border extended for six hundred or eight hundred miles from the Red river to the Rio Grande; and when the conflagration of her hamlets proclaimed that hostile Indians were on the borders, where they had been left by the President in 1838 in peace and harmony, when they were excited by Mexico to depredate on our borders, and commit murder, what was done? At the commencement of a new term in the executive chair of that Republic, the Indians were hostile; but the Government of Texas appropriated $10,000 and put it at the disposal of the President for the purpose of securing peace, and in eighteen months we had peace from the Rio Grande to the Red river. We opened commerce with the Indians, and the peace and concord we had with them lasted for years after the annexation of Texas. The Senator from Mississippi has spoken of the achievements performed in Texas by the dragoons. A single company of rangers would have done all that. Jack Hays, Ben McCullough, and Gillespie, achieved more than that; and I believe they never had over seventy-five men, and those for a few days only. Give us rangers in Texas. I ask you to give us one regiment of a thousand men of rangers, and you may withdraw your regular troops and dispose of them according to the other requirements of the country. Give us one thousand rangers, and we will be accountable for the defense of our frontier of eighteen hundred miles. We will give a quittance if you will give us a thousand rangers. We ask for no regular troops; withdraw them, if you please. I ask this not through any unkindness to them, but because they have not that efficiency which is necessary for frontier service. Troops in garrison never gave protection to a frontier.

I am willing to contribute all in my power to the general defensive interests of the country, where it does not conflict with some great principle; but I tell you the interests of the country will be best subserved by volunteers. You must rely on them, at least, as you have in every emergency. Every free country must rely on volunteers. They will not desert you. They are identified with the institutions of the country. They have their homes to defend; their wives, their children, their honor, and their country's glory. They have an ancestral blood which flows in their veins, a rich heritage which has descended with the blessing of God from their ancestors to them. You may rely upon them.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I shall occupy the Senate but two or three minutes. I wish merely to answer some facts, to which the Senator from Texas has alluded. I am quite convinced of the sincerity of his declaration that he merely wishes to sustain what is right, and therefore I suppose if I take from him his facts, or what he claims to be facts, he will cease his opposition.

Before going into that, however, I will merely say that he offers a contract which the Government might well accept if he were the only party to make the contract. If the Government could absolve itself from its obligations to the State of Texas, it would do well to give the whole amount a thousand rangers would cost, to get rid of the defense of its frontier; but I do not think he would find it quite so easy. It is clear that he has not kept pace with the history of events in his own State—with great respect I say that. He says one company of rangers would have done more than all these troops; yet we have had several companies of rangers employed there, in the service of the United States, and should find it rather difficult to recount what they had done. Moreover, he says he has not attacked the dragoons, and has made no reflection on the dragoons; and that the dragoons performed the service of which I spoke yesterday. I hardly know how to follow the Senator, because it was not the dragoons, it was the cavalry, that performed the feats of which I read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I confounded the two; I am not technical.

Mr. DAVIS. Then the Senator means mounted men, because the riflemen would come in next if he had not covered it entirely. He is afraid that one gentleman did not ride so far as he said, eighty miles in a day.

Mr. HOUSTON. Over mountains.

Mr. DAVIS. The only reason the gentleman has to say that is, that he could not have done it himself; and that proves that the regulars are better than he, notwithstanding his early training in mountain climates, so that he has brought in a very strong argument for regulars, for I have no doubt in the world as to the accuracy of the report.

He makes his point again in relation to the Indian combat on the Blue Water. He makes it as though the Indians were a peaceable party and the troops the aggressors. This was a band which had been turbulent for some time, and committed various depredations. They were pursued by General Harney. He found them in force, summoned the chief, and made to him the proposition that he should surrender the murderer. He acknowledged his inability to do it and went back to confer; but then the slaughter did not commence as the Senator described. When he went to join the tribe, they fell back to a hill, taking advantage of the clemency of the troops; and that long chase of Colonel Cooke across the plains resulted from his not striking before he conferred with them. General Harney's report was made to the War Department, and it was published; the sub-reports were not.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is here.

Mr. DAVIS. His report was published; the sub-reports were not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Colonel Cooke's report is here.

Mr. DAVIS. General Harney, in his report, says:

"Assistant surgeon Ridgely, of the medical staff, was indefatigable in his attention to the suffering wounded, both of our troops and the enemy."

This hardly looks like the cruelty which is attributed to the troops. He says:

"The results of this affair were eighty-six killed, five wounded, about seventy women and children captured."

The Senator says he does not know how many women were killed. If it was the practice to kill women, the general would not have captured them and brought them in to feed them and take care of them. Again, if the Senator has Colonel Cooke's report he must have found a statement that "in the pursuit, women, if recognized, were generally passed by my men, but in some cases certainly these women discharged arrows at them."

The Senator's knowledge of Indians must make him perfectly aware of the difficulty of determining, when they are on horseback, the difference between the sexes. They are dressed much alike; they ride exactly alike; there may be a slight difference in the length of the stirrups, and that is all. He must be aware of the difficulty of distinguishing between men and women, carrying the same arms, their dress resembling, riding exactly alike, and firing upon the troops. But the report of the topographical officer, Lieutenant Warren, which is very accurate and detailed, and was made with more deliberation, states that at this attack in the cave, where they could not see who they fired

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1859.

NEW SERIES....No. 43.

upon, there were five men, seven women, and three children killed, and several wounded. General Harney is known to the country as a gallant soldier. He has proved it on many occasions. His knowledge of the Indians is very extensive; and in this particular case, which the Senator believes is to result in future evil, he struck a band that had often been hostile, tamed them at the first blow, and afterwards made a treaty with the tribes of that section of country, which has thus far preserved peace in it. The results have been as favorable as those of any Indian campaign ever known in the history of the country.

As to the killing of women and children, that is the result of all combats where they are together. A city never was bombarded in which women and children were not killed. In the memorable bombardment of Vera Cruz, the troops being generally under the wall, the non-combatants, the women and children, were the principal sufferers; but that was not the fault of the Army. They had an end to achieve, and were to achieve it by such means as were within reach. They did not wish to kill the women and children, but they could not avoid it. It is true of all battles when towns are besieged. It is impossible that it should be otherwise. Surely, the Senator does not mean to do injustice, and make an accusation, especially at this moment, against our own Army, when the result belongs to the nature of the case.

He takes my character of the commander in Utah, and I am obliged to him for the credence he gives to it; but the commander of the present expedition to Utah has some claim, I think, on the Senator's knowledge of his character. He was a soldier, and a brave one; he held a very eligible staff position, and he left our Army to join the revolutionary struggle of Texas in its very darkest hour. During that period he commanded one of her armies, and rose in her civil government to the position of Secretary of War. In Texas, at least, Albert S. Johnston might be known. He raised a regiment of volunteers and marched to join General Taylor upon the Rio Grande. When that regiment, on account of the terms of the law compelling them to serve twelve months, claimed their right to be disbanded, he remained in the service; and General Taylor, who had known him in his youth and appreciated his worth, retained him by his State rank of colonel and made him inspector general of General Butler's division of volunteers. He passed through all the sieges of Monterey, calmest among the brave who met the shock of battle, always prompt and collected. He was of infinite value in that division of volunteers, where he served as inspector general.

Then there is another point—one of the Senator's facts. He says I have stated that the door is open to the promotion of men from the ranks, but what value is that when they do not get promotion? He has not heard of one, and he has turned men away because he could not get them places. If he will begin at page 13 of the Army Register—

Mr. HOUSTON. I never said that I had turned men away.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought you said you had declined to seek places for them.

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well; you say they cannot get in.

Mr. HOUSTON. I say I have not heard of it.

Mr. DAVIS. That is the Senator's fault, and not the fault of the men who administer the Army. If he has not heard, it is because he will not hear, for we confirmed one the other day in our last executive session. If he will not see it, it is because he will not read, for the Army Register is furnished to him as an official document, and if he will begin at page 13 and go on to the end of the list he will find one after another along the succeeding pages, officers "appointed from the Army," that are promoted from the ranks; and in those new regiments where they do not so appear, it is because they were all original appointments. Those sergeants who were taken and made commissioned officers in those regiments do not so appear for the reason that they were all original appointments; but in the old regiments he finds them continuously. It is true they are generally of recent date, and I am sorry that it is so. They are of recent date, not because there were not such appointments in former times, but because unfortunately those appointed did not prove themselves so worthy as to retain their commissions. I am sorry that the fact exists; yet it is notorious. However, he will find on page 13, where is the list of the first dragoons, in the very beginning of those regiments, Sergeant David H. Hastings promoted in 1848. Then, if he will turn over to the next page, in the second dragoons, he will find Sergeant Starr promoted in 1848; lower down he will find Green promoted in 1855. So, if he will go on, he will find some twenty in the Register; and I commend the reading of the Register to him to satisfy his doubts as to the capacity of a sergeant to rise to the grade of commissioned officer.

These being the objections he has made to the Army organization, and his whole argument being that we had increased the Army lately, and that the additional force had been of no account; and, as he now takes that back, on finding that the troops who have rendered the services I have quoted were a part of those new regiments, I hope his facts being taken away, that he will come down as gracefully as he can—and that is more gracefully than anybody else—from those who dissent, and join the ranks of those who defend this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not seen a fact that shows that the troops who performed those achievements belonged to the four regiments. The gentleman assumes it.

Mr. DAVIS. The cavalry did it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I said one company of rangers would have achieved all that the boasted cavalry have done.

Mr. DAVIS. The cavalry are of the four regiments.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is one fact I wish to have understood in regard to the encounter on the Blue Water; that General Harney did make a report, which I have, in which he says emphatically what I have insisted upon. It is this:

"A parley ensued between their chief and myself, in which I stated the causes of the dissatisfaction which the Government felt towards the Brules, and closed the interview by telling him that his people had depredated upon and insulted our citizens whilst moving quietly through our country; that they had massacred our troops under most aggravated circumstances, and that now the day of retribution had come; that I did not wish to harm him personally, as he professed to be a friend of the whites; but that he must either deliver up the young men, whom he acknowledged he could not control, or they must suffer the consequences of their past misconduct, and take the chances of a battle."

Little Thunder did not want to fight; but it was necessary that there should be some justification for raising the four regiments, and therefore they thought they would give Little Thunder big thunder. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Do you find that in the report?

Mr. HOUSTON. No. That is a mere expletive of my own.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, if the Senator will allow me, I will inform him that the four regiments were not there, any part of them, save and except one gallant officer, Captain Heth, who raised his company by extraordinary efforts, and mounted them on ponies to join General Harney in that campaign. The rest were old troops.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then, if they were old troops, I never heard of any of the new ones except that one company, who did anything. General Harney told Little Thunder "that he must either deliver up the young men, whom he acknowledged he could not control, or they must suffer the consequences of their past misconduct, and take the chances of a battle." General Harney did not doubt what the chief told him; but still they must make an example of the Indians. They had no disposition to war. The chief had said he could not control these outlaws, and are you to destroy a whole people because of a few bad men? Why, sir, you would sweep this continent if that were a law established; there would be nobody left here.

I will tell you the effect of that expedition. The honorable Senator says it has had a most salutary effect. It has had this effect: it has driven them to the Mormons; they are their allies. Why? Because they were killed when they wanted peace. Because the Mormons have not committed a corresponding wrong on them, they are allies of the Mormons. They will always go where friendship and justice are accorded to them. That is the benefit of this expedition.

Mr. DAVIS. These Indians were never in the Mormon country at all. The Senator gets all the facts wrong. These Indians have not committed any depredations since, or gone into the Mormon country at all.

Mr. CAMERON. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has given us some information in regard to promotions from the ranks. I was aware myself that occasionally such a promotion had been made; but the impression is strong in that part of the Union to which I belong, that a man may be promoted through the influence of his friends in Congress and other places, from the ranks of the Army; but that the moment he gets there a cabal is raised against him, and by some means he is always turned out. I desire to know whether any, and if any, how many of those raised from the ranks have ever passed the first grade on which they entered into the Army as commissioned officers.

Mr. DAVIS. You mean the grade of second lieutenant.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I was reading in the Register some cases. Those I read were nearly all of them of the grade of first lieutenant. We have had, however, up as high as the grade of colonel, a man who had risen from the ranks.

Mr. CAMERON. Since the war of 1812?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; nor if they entered in any other manner since that date would they in many instances at this time have got up to that grade. I will answer the Senator as well as I can. The mode of appointing sergeants is now prescribed, and they may also be brevetted under a late law of Congress. The difficulty, heretofore, has been that, having no power to confer a brevet upon a non-commissioned officer, the graduating class at West Point came out and were attached as brevets to companies of regiments. Though a sergeant might be worthy of promotion, he could not be promoted, because, as vacancies occurred under the law, the brevet succeeded to that; and before the brevets all succeeded, another class came up; new brevets were attached, and thus it went on from year to year. The law which was passed by the last Congress enables the Executive to brevet a non-commissioned officer. He thus being a brevet officer, is put upon duty as a commissioned officer; and when the brevets older than himself are absorbed, he succeeds to the vacancy in preference to brevets who have come out afterwards, and who are junior to himself. This secures to the sergeant promotion. The means by which he obtains the recommendation for promotion are these: he is summoned before the officers at his post, or if a regimental organization exists—if the regiment is together—before the field officers of the regiment; he is there examined; the result of his examination is returned to the War Office, and he thus gives the evidence that his officers believe him fit for a commission; and the War Department then recommending him to the Executive, the Executive nominates him to the Senate for a brevet. That is the modus operandi prescribed under the law of the last Congress.

I know of no such feeling as the Senator from Pennsylvania refers to. I find usually that the officers of the regiment are too prone to recommend some sergeant that exhibits high character. They are too apt to forget that though perfectly equal to, and gracing the position he then occupies, he may fall short of the new one to which they wish to advance him; and hence it is that so many have failed when elevated to higher places.

Mr. CAMERON. I am gratified with the explanation the Senator has made that there is that kind of feeling on the part of officers; but it is that mode of examination of which I think the country complains. A man may very well be qualified to be a soldier, and yet not undergo the examination instituted at West Point.

Mr. DAVIS. No. Not the examination at West Point. It is a very low standard of education that is prescribed. I do not believe the most of our field officers could conduct such an examination as is conducted by the professors at West Point. This examination is on the very lowest scale of common school, or what is termed English education; and if a man possess that, he is reported as competent. I will here say that one of the objects which the late Secretary of War (for I hate to refer to myself) had in providing for that examination by a board of officers, was to stand in the way of appointments by political influence, to throw around the man of merit the shelter which such an examination would give to him, and make it a matter perforce with the Administration to nominate him if he had merit.

Mr. CAMERON. I repeat, I am glad to hear the explanation of the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs; but that is not the impression of the country. The understanding is, that the examiners required very high and great qualifications and intellectual learning, such as men who often get a diploma in college are not able to pass; and that there is a feeling on the part of the West Point graduates entirely averse to every man who comes in from the ranks. That is one cause why the Army has been unpopular, and why the country has been unwilling to increase its force. For myself, I have no feeling of that kind.

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely say, in order to be quite understood, that, so far as I know the feelings of officers, they would much rather see a meritorious sergeant promoted to be a commissioned officer than some political favorite put in to hold the position. They would decidedly prefer it; for, from the manner of their own appointment, and the manner in which they attained to their commissions and hold them, they are further removed from political influences than any body of men I know of in the country; and they dislike political appointments.

Mr. TOOMBS. The question before the Senate is on striking out the first section of the bill; and having made that motion I deem it proper to answer some few of the objections which have within the last two days been urged by the Senator from Mississippi, more especially so as to put myself right in some points of fact in which he attempted to correct me. I propose to strike out that section because it adds thirty companies to the standing Army of the United States in time of peace, for the great controlling reason that no such addition to that standing Army is necessary for the public service. I showed, in my former remarks, that we had now eighteen thousand men in our Army in time of peace; and not only had its numbers increased, but its expenses had continued to increase for the last fifteen or twenty years, not merely in direct ratio to the numbers of the Army, but in geometrical progression. I endeavored, in the next place, to show that if any troops were necessary for the war or supposed war about to commence in Utah, or for Indian disturbances, it would be preferable to make that addition in the shape of volunteers, who retire from the service when the exigency that called them into it has passed away. I sought to show that that was the best and the most economical mode of defending the country in any particular emergency.

It is the best, because I hold that a standing army in time of peace is dangerous to public liberty. I shall not go through the argument of that point again. I shall leave the experience of twenty centuries, I shall leave the traditional judgment of the patriots and heroes of my own country, to answer the argument of the Senator from Mississippi. He is driven to that very force which I want for the distinguished subjects of his eulogy—General Washington and General Jackson. Neither of them was educated in the Army; neither of them was a military officer in time of peace. Washington responded to the call of his country when she was engaged in war; and when the exigency was over he laid down his sword and took up the plowshare. General Jackson was taken from the judicial bench and placed in the ranks when his country was at war with the most powerful nation on earth; and soon after the war ended he returned to his farm. He was not an Army man in time of peace, but a civilian attending to the duties of civil life. He was a member of Congress some fifteen years before he ever entered the Army.

These are the illustrious subjects which it seems the Senator from Mississippi has selected to show the beauties and the want of danger of a standing army in time of peace. That is a proposition which I oppose. The Senator admits that there is no war, nor does he base his measure even upon expected war with Utah; but he proposes it as a permanent addition to the military force of the United States in time of peace. I leave the experience of the past with the suggestions I have given, to answer that portion of his speech. Next as to the question of expenditure—

Mr. DAVIS. Before the Senator passes from the question on which he has been speaking, he will allow me to correct a misapprehension which he entertains of what I said. I stated that we were at peace with all foreign countries; but not at peace with the Indian tribes.

Mr. TOOMBS. I understood the Senator to mean that there was no present exigency of war with the Indians or with the Mormons.

Mr. DAVIS. I brought forward a great many cases of Indian hostilities to show that there was a necessity for Indian campaigns, for active operations of troops among the Indians. I do not call it war.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then we have peace and we have war with the Indians, as we have with other people, and we make treaties with them. I am not satisfied that even the proposition on which the Senator now puts his bill, changes the position I stated; for, looking on these disturbances with Indians as chronic, he proposes this increase of the Army as a permanent addition to the military force of the United States in time of peace. He does not look to disbanding it at any future time. I say, therefore, it is an addition to the standing Army, in time of peace, of some seven thousand men, carrying it from eighteen thousand to twenty-five thousand men. My motion, if it prevails, will strike out the additional thirty companies, and leave the force of the Army, if the bill shall then pass without that section, at about twenty-two thousand men.

I stated, and I yet believe the statement to be correct, that the cost of the Army of the United States had gone up to $1,000 per man. How did I prove it? I got it from the official documents that the real force of the Army is about fifteen thousand men, of every description, from the Major General down, including all the enlisted men in the service of the United States. Last year we appropriated more than fifteen million dollars for that Army. That gives $1,000 per man. I said the expense was $1,000, because I desired to be perfectly accurate, and within the mark. I was well aware of the statement made by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] that there is a deficiency of $6,000,000 called for this year, which would swell the expense per man to $1,400. I further stated that it appeared, from a report made by the Secretary of War in 1842, that Mr. Calhoun had brought down the expenses of the Army, while he was at the head of the War Department, to $273 per man. That statement stands.

Then, how am I answered on this point? In his first remarks, the Senator from Mississippi alluded to fortifications and various other matters; but let me tell him they are not included in this estimate. The $15,000,000 include nothing but the expenses of the Army proper, as designated at the Department itself. It does not include a dollar for fortifications, or for the manufacture of arms, or for the West Point Academy, or even for permanent supplies; but simply the expenses of the Army proper, what is necessary to maintain our present force in the field. I say this fact maintains the statement, and it is correct in all its parts. If you had no fortifications, if you had made no arms, my statement would be correct, that, according to the official figures of the Department, it now costs $1,000 a man to maintain your Army.

Another objection is made by the Senator from Mississippi, that we count in the staff. I stated that I thought this increase of expenditure ought to be accounted for. Now, the number of men being fewer before the Mexican war, in 1842 or 1843, than it is to-day, the counting of the staff then, upon the same principles, when there were fewer men, would work to the Senator's advantage, and not to his disadvantage, in this calculation. If we count the staff in an Army of six thousand men, as it was then, and count the staff now, in an Army of fifteen thousand men, and distribute the expenses per capita, it would be two and a half times to his advantage in the estimate of the ratio of increase. I say the expenditures of the Army have been continually increasing. When the Army was smaller, the proportion which fell upon each man, on account of our large staff, was greater than it is now, when the Army is larger; and, therefore, the Senator's argument on that point is entirely without foundation.

To show that I am perfectly correct in regard to the statement which I have made as to the expenses of the Army proper, I will read the specifications of items from the estimates of the Secretary of War:

Army Proper.

Expenses of recruiting, transportation of recruits, three months extra pay to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates on enlistment, &c....	$110,000 00
Pay of the Army.....	3,591,784 00
Commutation of officers' subsistence.....	998,424 50
Commutation of forage for officers' horses.....	124,128 00
Payments to discharged soldiers for clothing not drawn.....	53,000 00
Payments in lieu of clothing for officers' servants.....	39,890 00
Subsistence in kind.....	1,980,928 00
Clothing of the Army, camp and garrison equipage, and iron bedsteads for barracks.....	983,654 99
Regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department.....	1,745,000 00
Incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department.....	500,000 00
Barracks, quarters, &c.....	793,000 00
Transportation of officers' baggage.....	130,000 00
Transportation of troops and supplies.....	3,460,000 00
Purchases of horses for dragoons, light artillery, mounted riflemen, cavalry, and infantry.....	200,000 00
Contingencies of the Army.....	25,000 00
Medical and hospital department.....	105,000 00
Contingent expenses of the Adjutant General's Department, at department headquarters.....	500 00
Expenses of the Commanding General's office.....	2,300 00
	$14,776,619 49

These are the regular expenses—$15,000,000 to maintain fifteen thousand men in the military service of the United States. Not a dollar of this money is for any purpose but the maintenance of those men in the service; not a dollar for forts; not a dollar for the manufacture of arms; not a dollar for any purpose but to be absorbed, eaten up, expended in the transportation, pay, and allowance of these fifteen thousand men—giving exactly $1,000 per man. I say this is a legitimate mode of ascertaining the expenditure of each man; and the figures show that my statement was correct. I stated also that the cost of a volunteer force and the regular force was the same. The Senator thinks I am mistaken in that. How does he show that I am mistaken? The law settles that. Of course, the Senator has every opportunity of knowing the fact as to this point better than I have, except with reference to the law, which is open to us both. The law gives volunteers and regulars of the same description of force the same pay, and the same rations when in the service of the United States. I know of no difference whatever in the laws of the United States, whether he be a militia man, a volunteer, or a regular soldier; if he is in the service, the pay, rations, and allowances are the same. There is said to be some difference in the clothing when they come in. I was not aware of that; but I admit that affects the calculation slightly.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator, I think, has not studied the subject minutely, as he himself seems to admit. There is, in the first place, in the law, as he will find, an allowance made for the use and risk of horses where the volunteers are mounted men.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was coming to that.

Mr. DAVIS. He will find that the clothing is apportioned by years of service; and as volunteers come in for a short period, they get a larger apportionment with the beginning of the service. Then he will find they get fifty cents a day for their own services.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know all that; I have not come to it yet.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought you said there was no difference in the law. I was showing that there was a great deal of difference.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am going to show that on the point you state there is no difference in the law. The Senator said yesterday the volunteer got twenty-five cents a day for his horse, and he put that as the expense of volunteers. If he was a regular soldier the Government would have found the horse, and you would have to pay two or three hundred dollars for mounting and remounting. I suppose the Government finds it cheaper to allow the volunteer to provide his own horse, and pay him twenty-five cents a day for it, than to buy a horse for him. It is oftentimes an inconvenience to the volunteer to furnish his own horse. The Government, when it calls for volunteers, instead of being at the expense of paying for the horse, compels the volunteer to pay for him, and allows him twenty-five cents a day for the horse's hire.

Mr. DAVIS. Suppose the horse is lost, what then?

Mr. TOOMBS. The Government pays for him; but if a horse is lost by the regulars, it is the Government horse, for which the Government paid in the first instance. What is the difference? It is the difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no.

Mr. TOOMBS. Well, that is a matter of calculation, and the Senator's experience and observation are different from mine. In that connection he quoted a statement of the late Adjutant General Jones, that he could not get volunteers, except on horseback; they all wanted to ride. That officer, I admit, was very distinguished, especially about Washington, where he passed the later years of his life; and I do not believe much anywhere else in his later years. I know he frequently made reports drawing these discriminations for I frequently had occasion, as a member of the other branch of Congress, to investigate his statements. They are not unfamiliar to me. I know very well that in the Creek war, if you will go to the War Office, over which the Senator has recently presided with so much distinction, he will find there a record of thousands of infantry volunteers who have served the country. Within twenty-five years, he will find that tens of thousands of volunteer infantry have responded to their country's call. On the frontier of my own State, I have seen in arms more than five thousand infantry, foot soldiers, volunteers, in one campaign. I once had a charge of that sort myself, like Falstaff. There is no difficulty in the Government getting infantry volunteers. When it wants them it calls for them and obtains them. When it wants horsemen, whether you call them dragoons or cavalry, it calls for them, and gets just as many as it wants. I have never known volunteers to be asked for, in any emergency on the frontiers of the United States, without obtaining as many as were wanted, and at the instant they were wanted. I believe there were thousands of volunteer infantry who carried your standard to Mexico. The difficulty in some States, especially among our military brethren in the West, was, that they had to cast lots to determine who should stay at home, greatly to their mortification. So it was in every arm of the service, whether mounted men or infantry.

I say the Government pays regulars and volunteers precisely the same when they are in service. When mounted volunteers serve they furnish their own horses, and the Government pays nothing for them; it simply provides for their hire and subsistence. It finds it cheaper to do this than to buy the horse and mount the volunteer. If, however, it is actually cheaper for the Government to furnish the horse, it is a great wrong in the Administration not to do it; but it is supposed that this is the cheapest mode of doing the thing, and therefore the volunteer furnishes his own horse. I believe such has been the experience of the Government; at all events, it has been the course pursued for many years.

The Senator has referred me to a report of Mr. Poinsett. He once presided over the War Office for a short time; but though a very distinguished gentleman in many respects, I do not think he is very high military authority. The Senator quoted from his report this extract:

"This enormous disparity in the expenses of the two forces is not owing to the extravagant allowances made to volunteers; for, except in the article of clothing, they are no better paid than regular troops."

That is the report which the gentleman read, and it shows that except in the article of clothing, volunteers are no better paid than regular troops, and therefore I can cast out all the other items by the authority of Mr. Poinsett, which the Senator presents.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not read the newspapers much, and I do not know how I am reported, but the letter from which the Senator is reading is a letter of General Towson, late Paymaster General.

Mr. TOOMBS. This does not state which it is.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know what is in the paper; I have not read it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will read the report of what the Senator said on this point:

"The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] this morning referred to the letter of Mr. Poinsett. That letter communicated a report of the Paymaster General, who goes beyond the limits of the then Secretary of War. He refers to the disparity between the cost of the two forces as nearly six to one, because, he says, the horses that are employed are merely to carry the men from place to place, and really impede the march of the column."

Mr. DAVIS. I will correct that and you will then see the point. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] referred to the letter of Mr. Poinsett, in which he stated the disparity of cost between volunteers and regulars at four to one, and I then introduced a letter of the Paymaster General which Mr. Poinsett communicated, and which made it higher because he compared the mounted force of volunteers which had to serve on foot with the regular infantry, and made it six to one. Then I went on with the remarks which the Senator just read, and an extract from Mr. Towson's letter.

Mr. TOOMBS. I presume the statement is correct in the fact, that except in the article of clothing, the compensation of volunteers is no greater than that of regular troops. That is the fact I want to arrive at. General Towson states it.

Mr. DAVIS. But he goes on with the other causes of additional expense.

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall come to them, and I say not one of them has the least foundation, but is entirely delusive. He says:

"It is caused principally by expenses for traveling to and from the place where the services of the volunteers and militia are required."

That disparity more often falls against the regular troops. For instance, when the Florida war commenced, you had but a few troops there, and you had to carry your men from St. Louis, or New York, or somewhere else, to Florida. Where do you find the expenses of carrying them charged? That is charged in the Quartermaster General's accounts of transportation? No matter what the cost of taking them was by railroad or ship, you put it in the transportation account; but to make out the estimate against the volunteer, the expense of his transportation is charged to him. That is the adroitness of the statement. Generally speaking, the volunteer is right at the place where you want him—next to the disturbance. Generally, in our Indian wars, he is in the immediate neighborhood, and you have not to carry him far; but, in order to make it appear that the volunteer is a more expensive man than the regular, you charge to his account the cost of his transportation, and you charge the cost of the regular's transportation in the Quartermaster General's account.

The next item is "the hire, maintenance, and indemnity for horses." I have already explained that. You give the same rations to the horses of the regular soldier and of the volunteer; and I do not believe that they eat any more. Then he goes on with his items:

"And to furnishing them a full supply of clothing as a bounty, without regard to length of service. The statements also show the expense of volunteers serving on foot, and of militia. The term of service of the latter never exceeds three months, unless specially provided for."

All that is gratuitous. Sometimes we do not want them more than three months in Indian wars. In Mexico, and in the war of 1812, they served just as long as the Government wanted them. He continues:

"There is one comparison that would place the contrast between the expenses of regular and irregular troops in a much stronger light, if I had the data to enable me to state it in figures; and that is, the comparative loss and destruction of military stores and public property by the two forces."

There is nothing in that. Any man at all acquainted with the Army knows it is a trumped up excuse, because the officers are responsible for the public stores and public property, and any loss is deducted from their pay. None of them can get their pay accounts through the offices here until the public property under their charge is accounted for. I believe the accounts of both regulars and volunteers are settled on the same rule; and I have had to attend to the settlement of cases for both. The Senator then goes on to state:

"He presents his tabular statement in which he shows, on the basis of the companies, that for six months the cost of a company of United States dragoons was $13,573, and for the mounted volunteers, $23,575. That is the ratio to which I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia before he again assumes the position that the expense is the same."

I have shown that the expense of the one is not $13,000, and of the other $22,000. By the Senator's own authority, there is no difference between them, except in the clothing. If you carry the regular soldier, the transportation is carried to a different account. It is not charged to the company or regiment, but to the general transportation of the Army. Inasmuch as there is no more pay, and no more allowances, and no more for traveling expenses of the one than the other, I do not think this statement can be correct. I believe the traveling expenses of the volunteers are nothing but pay, allowing twenty miles per day. I think that is the usual course of settling. I am quite sure it was twenty years ago. They allowed you pay for so many days going to and returning from the place of rendezvous. I believe that is the mode now; I know it was formerly.

This whole statement is predicated on the idea of marching one corps a long distance, and finding the other on the field, carried there at the most enormous expenditure, as is usually the case, without the expense of that carriage being charged at all. No such state of facts can exist as this difference between the two forces. The elements of calculation the Senator himself gives show that it is impossible. One cannot be $13,000 and the other $22,000, because the additional amount of clothing is the sole item of difference which exists, except in the case of horses; and I have shown that the pay is in lieu of the purchase of horses.

The Senator made another statement which strikes me as a very remarkable one, and to which I call his attention particularly, that I may see if I understand him:

"We have had an estimate lately sent in to us, of $385,000 required by the pay department alone for twenty companies of volunteers for six months. That would be equal to ten companies for twelve months; and taking it and comparing it with this estimate of a regiment for a year, adding the cost of rations, which are $77,015, it would give a total of $462,015, instead of the $385,000, (adding merely the cost of rations to the pay,) or $526 21 per man. It follows, then, that a regiment of volunteers would, for one year, cost more than a regular regiment of the same strength, $153,600 61, or an individual volunteer during the same period, $174 97 more than an individual regular soldier."

Is the Senator properly reported here?

Mr. DAVIS. I think so; but I cannot recollect the exact figures. I then went on to state that those volunteers were mounted, and were compared with regular foot troops.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir; and I was going to read that sentence to show how easy and how ready an answer it was to the Senator's figures. He himself candidly answered this comparison in the next sentence. I will read it:

"It will be remembered, however, that these volunteers are mounted."

Mounted troops get more pay and more rations and the hire of the horses will cost more. The Senator has not brought a comparison between mounted volunteers and regular cavalry, nor between volunteer infantry and regular infantry. The disparaging comparison is made between a foot regiment of regulars and a mounted regiment of volunteers. Everybody who knows anything of the Army, knows that to maintain a regiment of cavalry in the field costs a great deal more money than to maintain one of infantry.

Mr. DAVIS. And is it not stated why it is presented in that form?

Mr. TOOMBS. My attention has not been drawn to that. I wish to prove that it does not show a comparison on the point which we were arguing. I do not think there is anything more than that on that point.

Mr. DAVIS. There was something more said.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then it is not reported. The Senator has fairly stated it as it is, but I want to show the Senate and the country that the comparison is not a just one. It is not between two regiments in the same service, both cavalry or infantry.

Mr. DAVIS. The answer is easy, if the Senator does not understand my position. I read from a letter of General Towson, now dead, but who, when living, bore a character never impeached for integrity and fairness. In that letter he presented the position that as mounted volunteers could only serve on foot in the face of the enemy, the horses were merely for transportation; that therefore he held it to be a fair comparison to put the mounted volunteers against foot regular troops. I will also add, (what I did not say, I think, when addressing the Senate,) that these particular volunteers were called out in Florida. They have been called out by my successor. I tried to get foot troops there, believing that mounted men would be of little value in the everglades and the great lagoons and islands where they have constantly to cross water, but we could not get foot men because their pay was not sufficient to induce them to come out.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have no observation to make on that; I do not wish to talk on these questions further than is necessary for their correct elucidation. There is one conclusive answer on the subject of expense to which the Senator did not refer; but it is one which I put in the programme, and which is great, continuing, conclusive, and unanswerable; and that is, that when you get regiments in the regular Army, as here proposed, they stand there when you want them and when you do not want them. You may only want them for three months, and yet they will stand for ten years. If you muster the volunteer into service for three months, and only want him thirty days, you can pay him off and dismiss him at the end of the thirty days. If the volunteer cost five times as much while in the service as any regular, he would, in fact, be cheaper to the Government for all casual, all extraordinary service; and, as to a permanent addition, I have already given the reason why I am opposed to it. If you want a temporary addition on account of a Mormon war, or an Indian war, I am willing to give a force which can be disbanded the moment it is not wanted. If you want volunteers for three months, you can get them for that time; and when their service is over, you have nothing more to pay them. We have found, however, that the increase of the regular Army goes on from year to year. Three years ago we added four regiments. Now five more regiments are asked; and it is proposed to give thirty companies. It is give, give, give, forever, with the Army, and always will be. They do not belong to the industrial classes.

Talk to me about officers of the Army being friends of liberty and shooting down oppressors! Go and unlearn their history for twenty centuries. The Army is no more open to American soldiers than is the French, even to officers. There you can take the son of a beggar or of a duke, send him to the military schools, and he may reach a marshal's baton; but except an occasional fraternization or a barricade in the street, he is never anything else, and never has been, but the engine of oppression and despotism. The American soldier will be the same. He loses his character of American citizen. Their duty is obedience. They are taught it. They know nothing else. They lose their interest in society. They are not friends of liberty. An army in its essence is a despotism. They always have been and always will be the ready instrument of him that is bold and brave enough to seize the baton and trample public liberty in the dust.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was about to move an adjournment.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot get the vote to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the question will be taken, and for that reason I intend to be brief. The Senator from Georgia closes with the same appeal and reference to the experience of twenty centuries against armies in which he indulged on a former occasion. I shall not follow him by answering, as I have done already, that those twenty centuries contain no history of American armies.

I will put my own knowledge of the personnel of the Army against his, though I might not match it against his in anything else, when I say that if the Army are inclined to any political power at all, it would be that they would be apt to exalt the General Government above the States; that their education could lead to no other result than that; but yet they will always remember the States from which they sprang. Though they may be generalized, though they may be lifted up to look over the country as a whole, raised on the pedestal of constant employment by the Federal Government, seeing all its interests and all its rights, they may feel for the whole more than a man who has always been confined to a section; yet let the Federal Government trample on the rights of any State of the Union, and you will see the officers, bearing commissions, springing from that State, flouting the commission in the face of the Federal Government to join the ranks of their own State. That is my experience.

But the Senator evidently, from the manner in which he treats my argument about expenditure, supposes I wish to put him in a false position. I said the line of argument was one that necessarily led to error; that I could not understand the process of his calculation. Neither can I; for he says that at some period, to which he refers, each man cost $273. I took it for granted, then, that he excluded something which was in the Army appropriations, and not counted in the expense of the man; because the tables do not say so. He says the fact stands. I refer him again to the authority from which I read—American State Papers, Military Affairs, volume two, pages 46 and 47. On page 47 the statement is added that in 1809, 1810, and 1811, the annual expense per man, including officers, was $383 60. In 1820, the annual expense per man, including officers, was $336 56.

The Army is not responsible for the legislation which has occurred from the last date up to this time, greatly increasing your staff. I wish you would amend that organization. I wish you would improve the administration of the Army; that you would repeal a great many of your special laws in relation to the staff; that you would leave the quartermasters as they were when that estimate was made, to be selected from the line of the Army, to perform the duty temporarily, instead of creating one staff corps after another, and then fixing the whole expense, not only of those staff officers, but of those extraordinary provisions which you have made by special legislation, giving the enormous salaries which belonged to the Lieutenant General in time of war, when the whole militia was expected to be the Army of the country, to the general in peace commanding the peace establishment of the Army, and then dividing it up by the sum total of the Army, and counting it at so much a man. If Congress make these beneficial provisions, and swell up the gross appropriations, it is not the fault of the administration of the Army. If the Congress and the country require mounted troops, and the state of the service requires them, then, I say, it is not fair to compare the cost with the time we did not need them.

The Senator talks of the readiness with which foot volunteers were found on some occasions, and refers to the war with Mexico; but my reference was to the militia called into the service of the United States since the war with Mexico; and therefore, when he cites cases twenty-five years back, he does not meet my argument. The $1,000 per man which he obtains is by a species of calculation which may be made high or low, as I showed on a former occasion, and will not repeat, and will be highest when your administration is, in my view of the case, most economical—when you have a skeleton establishment providing in time of peace for the exigencies of war.

Then in relation to the transportation and camp equipage; General Towson's calculation was taken from the facts. It exhibited the amounts that were paid, and presented them in a table, from which I read. The transportation of the militia may not be over so many miles, but the table is for every three and every six months; and the Senator must perceive that it amounts to a total much greater than the transportation of troops for permanent service at a particular locality, and that fifty cents a day for the footman, and seventy-five cents a day for the mounted man, is more than it would cost the Government to transport the troops,

It is the constant repetition of this transportation which swells up the gross sum of volunteer expense; not the different character of the troops; and in the table from which I read, it was so stated. It was based on an estimate expecting them to serve for short periods, and for short periods they ought to serve. Nothing would be more unjust than to call people from their peaceful avocations, and keep them for a long period at frontier posts to guard frontier settlements. It would take lower material, too, than compose the volunteers who turn out in time of war. Among my objections to the employment of volunteers for such service, is the very elevated character of the young men who are often induced thus to enter the service; men who are worthy of better employment; whose habits are injured, whose train of thought or pursuit of some profession is broken in upon by this temporary service where a cheaper man would do as well. If I may be permitted, without an appearance of egotism, to refer to my own observation, I would say that when I have traveled among the people from whom the volunteers were drawn who went to Mexico, I have had this fact more deeply impressed upon me by the sad countenance of some father, the tears of some mother over the fate of a promising young man who fell in performing the duties of a private soldier. The material is too high except when the honor of the country demands it. That is the conclusion to which my experience brought me some years ago.

I am sure that if the Senator from Georgia had known the character of the deceased General Towson, he would not have applied, in relation to his letter and his table, such words as "adroit" in his statement. He was incapable of preparing a table to deceive any one. He prepared the table from data which were in his office as the great disbursing officer, the Paymaster General of the Army. He took those data, and from them reached a certain result, which he presented, in a tabular statement, to Mr. Poinsett, and which he communicated to Congress. I hardly think there were errors in it. If there were, they were not made to deceive anybody. My knowledge of the man renders it to me a superfluous task to go over the calculations that are found in his statement. If the militia were employed for five years, the tables would be wrong; but to draw your people from peaceful avocations, and put them in service as regular soldiers, for five years, thus interrupting the whole course of life of young men, would be an evil to the country far greater than any expense.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. Why not take the vote? If the Senator wishes to speak I will not press it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not the slightest idea of making a speech on this subject.

Mr. DAVIS. Let us have the vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. If the vote is to be taken, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAVIS. Let us pass the bill or reject it, and let the Administration know it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state to the Senate exactly the effect of the motion. The first section provides that thirty companies shall be added to the Army; two to each regiment of infantry, and two to each regiment of mounted troops. The second section provides that the rank and file of each company, when in the field, and on distant posts, may be by the President raised to ninety-six men. The first section it is now proposed to strike out.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me that the question on this section is premature. I am willing to vote for this addition to the Army, provided it be made temporary; and I understand that the Senator from Ohio has an amendment, the object of which is to make this force temporary. If you will make it temporary I shall vote for the addition; otherwise I will not.

Mr. PUGH. I have offered no amendment to this section. I am in favor of striking out this section, and making the second section temporary.

Mr. HUNTER. That will give four thousand men, I understand.

Mr. PUGH. Yes, of the rank and file, but no officers with high salaries.

Mr. HUNTER. If that gives four thousand men, I think it ought to be enough. I will vote for that.

Mr. BIGGS. The inclination of my mind in regard to this bill was to vote for the second section, and to strike out the first; but since the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, I have determined upon a different course. I am for a temporary addition, and for but a temporary addition, no matter whether you adopt the first or second section. But deferring to the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, I am now prepared to vote for the first section, provided that it be made temporary, understanding from him that the Committee on Military Affairs recommends striking out the second section entirely. It occurs to me, therefore, that to attain the end I have in view, it is proper first to perfect the section before a vote is taken on striking it out. I propose, if it is in order, to put the proviso proposed by the Senator from Ohio to this first section as an amendment, before the vote is taken on striking it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The yeas and nays having been ordered on the proposition to strike out the first section of the bill, the Chair thinks it is not in order to receive the amendment, except by unanimous consent.

Several SENATORS. Oh, yes!

Mr. HUNTER. We may amend the matter proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Military Affairs, as I stated to the Senate yesterday, instructed me to move to amend by striking out the second section if the first were retained. I do not know how we can get the vote taken on that before the vote is taken on the first section, unless I move now to strike out the second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. BIGGS. It occurs to me that it is competent to move to amend the first section before the vote is taken on striking out. [Certainly.] If there is an amendment made to the first section, making the increase temporary, I am willing to vote for that, and that alone.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me that that probably is the best arrangement. If the committee prefer to strike out the second section, and have the additional companies, let us give them the companies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on striking out the first section.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state to the Senator from Virginia, that if the Senate will retain the first section, the Committee on Military Affairs propose to withdraw the second section.

Mr. HALE. I shall go with them on that, whether this section be stricken out or not.

Mr. PUGH. I would rather retain the second section, and strike out the first.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll; and Mr. ALLEN answered.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the proposition? Is it the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to amend? With the consent of the Senate, I suppose I had better withdraw the second section.

Mr. HAMLIN. You cannot withdraw it.

Mr. PUGH. I object to its withdrawal.

Mr. HUNTER. Is not the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order after the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUNTER. Will it be competent for any Senator to move to amend the section after we refuse to strike it out? It can only be amended by addition then, I suppose. I should be reluctant to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but surely we have a right to amend matter which is proposed to be stricken out before the vote is taken on striking it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, whether it is open to amendment after the yeas and nays have been ordered?

Mr. HUNTER. How can that affect it?

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me invite the attention of the Senator from Virginia to this fact: the yeas and nays have been ordered, the question has been ordered to be put, the Secretary has called the roll, and one Senator has answered to that call.

Mr. HUNTER. If a Senator has answered, it is different.

Mr. ALLEN. I answered.

Mr. JONES. But the Senator from Virginia was on the floor.

The Secretary resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] who has been called from the Senate on public business.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] was obliged to go home on account of illness in his family, and wished me to say that he had paired off with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. FITZPATRICK.]

The result was then announced—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pearce, Pugh, Simmons, Sumner, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clay, Davis, Evans, Fitch, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Seward, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—26.

So the motion to strike out the first section of the bill was rejected.

Mr. BIGGS. I now move to amend the first section by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That after the expiration of two years from the date of this act, the companies herein authorized shall no longer be continued in the public service.

Mr. PUGH. I propose to amend the amendment. I wish not merely to get rid of the companies, but of the commissioned officers; for it will be still more objectionable if we are to have the officers remain in the service without the companies.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course the officers will go with the companies. The only question in my mind, as to the difference between the gentlemen, is, whether we should provide for disbanding these particular companies, or provide for disbanding two companies of the regiment at the end of two years?

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator will make a motion to carry out his own proposition. He said he wanted twelve companies in a regiment, in such a shape as to reduce them to eight. If he will propose to go back to the eight companies, very well; that will suit me still better.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it would be a decided improvement on the peace establishment to have eight companies to the regiment; but I have stated so often that I could not foresee that period of peace which I believe would justify the reduction, that I should be put in a false position if I were to anticipate it now.

Mr. PUGH. Then I will stand on the proposition to get rid of these two companies. My amendment is:

Provided, That after the expiration of two years from the date of this act, or sooner if the exigencies of the public service will permit, the said additional companies shall be disbanded, the commissioned officers thereof discharged, and the non-commissioned officers and privates transferred to other companies and regiments; and thereupon no further enlistments shall be made for any regiment, until each company shall be reduced to seventy-four privates.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senators who have offered these amendments. It seems to me it would better effect their object to provide that after two years the regiments shall be reduced to the present number of companies. That would carry out the suggestion of the chairman, and then you could strike out any companies you chose. It would simply provide for a reduction to the present size.

Mr. PUGH. What becomes of the officers whose commissions are "during good behavior?"

Mr. STUART. It reduces the officers with the companies, of course.

Mr. DAVIS. I would call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that these companies will become integral parts of the regiment, and vacancies occurring among the commissioned officers will be filled up by promotions, of course, through the regiment. Suppose a captain is killed: the oldest first lieutenant of the regiment would become captain of that company; or if the first lieutenant were killed, the second lieutenant would take his place.

Mr. PUGH. I see the difficulty. It is a question between a permanent or a temporary increase of the Army. The Senator from Mississippi wishes to make them a permanent part of the regiments, and to promote up from the lower grades.

Mr. DAVIS. It is not so much my wish as my idea of necessity. I will not resist the proposition that the Senate shall provide a time when the regiments shall be reduced. I see great difficulty in keeping these as a distinct body of troops all the time in the regiment.

Mr. PUGH. My proposition is to prevent the argument that will be made at the end of two years, or at any future time, if you desire to reduce the regiments from ten to twelve companies. The argument will be pressed on us that first and second lieutenants, at the time the bill was passed, who had become captains, must not be put out of the service. I wish to give notice beforehand, that whoever takes a commission in these companies, must take it on the expectation of going out of the service at the end of two years, whether he is now in the service or a new appointee.

Mr. WILSON. I believe this amendment which has been proposed is impracticable; and that if it be adopted it will have no practical effect in discharging these two companies. The officers appointed under this act will be, probably before the year transpires, assigned to other companies; they will be mixed, and we shall find that at the expiration of the two years, the movement will be to continue these two companies as a part of the permanent military establishment of the country. I have no doubt of it; and that that is the object and the intention.

Then, sir, I wish simply to say, that, for myself, I am ready to vote, for temporary purposes, any body of men, one thousand, five thousand, or twenty thousand, necessary to maintain the authority of the Government in Utah. I believe in maintaining the authority of the Government in that Territory, and in all portions of the territory of the United States. I assented to the reporting of this bill, but I did not commit myself to its support. The Senator from New York, who is upon that committee, [Mr. KING,] declared his opposition to the increase of the Army in any and every form. We found there Senators who, from long service on that committee, were familiar with everything connected with the Army; and the chairman of the committee, by his education, by his association with the Army, by his presiding over that Department for four years, was familiar with everything connected with it. We did not wish to offer any impediment to the bringing of the measure promptly before the Senate, that the Senate might take its own course, reserving to ourselves the right to do as we pleased. We did not wish to interpose any obstacles whatever to the prompt action of the committee of the Senate.

Although the official journal of the Administration has seen fit to arraign that committee before the country for not having promptly acted according to the suggestions that came from the executive department of the Government, I will bear my testimony that the chairman of the committee, and all those who are familiar with its affairs, interposed no obstacle whatever, and that the subject was fully and thoroughly investigated by the committee. We are told that the theory of the Government is that the War Department has more knowledge of the affairs of the Army than can be found anywhere else. That may be the theory, but it so happens at this time that that is not the practical fact before the country.

I believe that this amendment amounts to just nothing at all. Here is a proposition to add thirty companies, equivalent to about two thousand eight hundred men, to the permanent military establishment of the country. I believe that we ought to authorize the President of the United States to raise a sufficient military force to maintain the authority of the laws in the rebellious Territory of Utah. I am willing to vote for that force; but I do not see my way clear to vote for a permanent increase of the Army. The reasons for that have been fully stated to the Senate by other gentlemen, and I need not repeat them.

I have prepared an amendment to this bill, which I wish to offer to test the sense of the Senate at a proper time, by which I propose to authorize the President of the United States to call for and receive the services of volunteers, not exceeding five thousand men, to be used only in the Territory of Utah, there to maintain the authority and laws of the country.

I believe the Army is large enough, and that we have troops enough now on the Missouri river to forward next May or June to Utah for this purpose. I do not believe the President will call for volunteers; I do not believe he need call for volunteers, because I think the Army is large enough; but if it should so happen that the exigencies of the public service should demand volunteers, then, I think, it is our duty to give him volunteers for that purpose. I am willing to vote them, but I am not willing, in the present condition of the country, to vote for a measure like this, when we are to meet the year 1859 with twenty-five or thirty million dollars of debt, (for I take it, that on the 1st of January, 1859, we shall find that we have at least twenty-five or thirty million of revenue less than enough to pay the current expenses of the Government,) without an absolute necessity for an increase of the standing military force of the country. I think we ought to authorize the raising of volunteers, and put the responsibility where it belongs, on the President of the United States, to call them out, if necessary; and if not necessary, I feel very confident, in the present condition of the finances of the country, he will not do it. Is it in order to move this amendment?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this time. The question is on the proviso offered by the Senator from Ohio as an amendment to the proviso offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

MR. BIGGS. I will modify my amendment, and I think the Senator from Ohio probably will accept the modification I propose. As modified, it is:

Provided, That after two years from the passage of this act, or sooner if the exigencies of the public service will permit, the military establishment shall be reduced so as not to exceed the number of companies, either in officers or privates, as now authorized by existing laws.

MR. PUGH. I withdraw my amendment, and agree to that.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, as modified, as a proviso to the first section of the bill.

MR. STUART. The Senator should make it the duty of the President to make this reduction.

MR. KING. Provide means of executing the law.

MR. STUART. Exactly.

MR. WILSON. I should like to ask Senators on the other side, who propose to sustain this amendment, if it does not amount to this, if it be adopted, and you reduce the military establishment at the end of two years, that it necessarily involves the discharge of officers in commission now in the service of the country?

Several SENATORS: Certainly.

MR. WILSON. I believe that this is an impracticable thing. You will then have to discharge officers now in commission, because you will have appointed new officers under this act, and we shall not accomplish the object in the end.

MR. DAVIS. I do not see how the Senator can imagine that to be impracticable. Certainly, Congress can pass a law to reduce the Army, and when it passes a law to reduce the Army, it can discharge the men in commission. If those now appointed shall, at the end of two years, prove themselves to be more valuable to the Government than those who were in the service before, it would be nothing but fair that the old ones should be dismissed.

MR. CAMERON. I have voted for this bill thus far, with the impression that the increase was to be temporary. Nothing could induce me to add to the permanent standing Army of the country. I will offer an additional amendment, and, unless I can get something like it, I shall vote against this bill.

MR. HALE. While the Senator from Pennsylvania is preparing his amendment, I wish to say a word. I ask gentlemen what they mean by talking about emergencies, when the Administration, and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, tell us there is no pressing emergency?

MR. DAVIS. I did not tell you so.

MR. HALE. If the Senator did not say there was no pressing emergency, then I have misunderstood him entirely. I understood the Senator from Mississippi to say that he did not look forward to the time when this increase could be abandoned, and that he wanted it for a permanent increase; that there was nothing in the particular circumstances of to-day requiring it, but that the interests of the country forever, so far as he could see, demanded a permanent increase.

MR. DAVIS. The Senator has two or three times so represented me, and I have two or three times stated what I did say and did mean. If he really is in error as to what I did mean, I will state it again. I did not say there was no emergency. I rather urged that there was a necessity, but I said I did not see when that necessity would cease.

MR. HALE. Then it is a mere difference of words. I repeat what I said before, that there is no pressing temporary emergency; the Senator thinks it is a continual want, and he does not look forward to any time when the want will be less than it now is. Then what is the use of talking about an emergency that is to expire in two years? What is the use of telling the Government they have an emergency, when they tell you they have not? Why say there is a necessity for two years' service, when the necessity, if it exists at all, we are told will exist forever, so far as gentlemen can see? I will tell you just what the two years' provision means. It is doubtful whether Congress will vote this increase of the Army; it is seen that it is doubtful; and to make it a little more palatable, they say let us have it for two years. We give it to them, and when the two years roll around they will say it is so necessary, and the experience of these two years has shown it to be so necessary, that they want it for two years longer, or for six years, or forever. So far as I am concerned, I would as lief vote for the increase to the end of time as for two years, because if you give it for two years it will go on to the end of time, and there will be said to be a greater necessity two years hence than there is now.

I desire to deal with this measure fairly. The Government tells us that they want it for a permanent increase, and if you give it, it will be permanent; and we do not deceive ourselves or anybody else by putting upon this bill this amendment, and pretending that we are going to get rid of it in two years. We never shall get rid of it so long as the Government is able to pay, or has credit to borrow money. If you put this on for two years or two months, it will go on eternally until there is a different policy in the Government, and I do not expect that in two years; but I do in about three. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 19, noes 22.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment having been again modified by the mover, it will be read as modified:

The Secretary read it as follows:

Provided, That after two years from the passage of this act, or sooner, if the exigency of the public service will permit, it shall be the duty of the President to reduce the military establishment so as not to exceed the number of companies, either in officers or privates, as now authorized by existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. PUGH. Do I understand the committee to withdraw the rest of the bill?

MR. DAVIS. The second section.

MR. HALE. That must be done by a vote of the Senate.

MR. STUART. I move to strike out the second section.

MR. HOUSTON. I propose to offer an amendment to the first section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not now in order. The question is on striking out the second section.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. STUART. I move to strike out the fourth section, which changes the order of promotion.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment offered and pending to the third section of the bill, which would be strictly in order before acting on the subsequent sections.

MR. STUART. I suppose there will be no objection to taking the question on this motion?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will, if there be no objection, put the question on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, to strike out the fourth section.

MR. DAVIS. I wish to state to the Senate the object the committee had in preparing the fourth section; and I thought the committee were unanimous, though from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, I may have been mistaken in that. The object was to secure promotion by regiments, instead of arms of the service, believing it to be more equitable. If a regiment goes out to meet the enemy, or is exposed to perilous campaigns, or is exposed to the peril of climate, vacancies will occur, and it was thought that those who shared the hazard that created the vacancies, were best entitled to the promotions. Then again, it will sometimes occur that two lieutenant colonels of about the same date, being in different regiments of the same arm, may have had all that rivalry that belongs to their position, and a vacancy occurring at the head of a regiment, the lieutenant colonel senior, perhaps by one day, comes to the head of that regiment over his old rival. Again it inevitably follows, that a man promoted into a regiment he has not previously seen, as a major, lieutenant colonel, or colonel, ignorant of the officers and men, will be less efficient than a man who had been serving in the regiment, and knew both the officers and men. It is well known that the fate of the gallant Lawrence, at the beginning of the war of 1812, was due to his want of acquaintance with the men of his ships.

Then there is another point, and the only one which I shall notice. A regiment in the field, going frequently into battle, may lose its colonel and lieutenant colonel, and be commanded by its senior major; he may go through battle after battle as the commander of that regiment; and yet, when he returns from the campaign it is to meet officers who, perhaps, have been enjoying their ease at home, and who come into the regiment as colonel and lieutenant colonel, and slip him down to the position of major.

I think the equity is on the side of the provision. It is a reform, and therefore, it must bear upon somebody. No reform can ever be instituted that will not violate the just expectations of somebody. If the reform is proper, if equity is on the side of the provision, the sooner it is adopted the better. It so happens that we now have four new regiments in the Army; two of them are infantry, liable to cross promotion; but no cross promotion has yet occurred; and I think it is better if the provision is to be adopted at all that it should be adopted before such cross promotion has arisen than after it shall have occurred, and claims have been perfected in the hands of other officers.

MR. WILSON. I assented, as the chairman of the committee has said, to this section of the bill. Without alluding improperly to anything that happened in the committee, I may say that the chairman of the committee stated the case, and stated it clearly, as he has now done. I think it is a sound general principle. I assented that it should be reported. I carried into that committee-room some general principles in regard to the Army, but very little experience in detail, and I have paid great deference to the suggestions of the chairman, who, perhaps, more than any man in the Senate or in Congress, is familiar with all the details connected with the Army.

But, sir, after assenting to this section of the bill, I was told by officers of the Army, that although sound as a general principle, and that if we were to organize an army now it ought to be carried into effect, it would practically operate badly in the Army if introduced at this time; that it would do great injustice; that some officers appointed in the new regiments two or three years ago, would, under it, outrank in the field officers who have gone through public service of ten or fifteen years' standing, and that it would be unjust. In addition to this, wishing to learn the precise facts in the case, I made inquiry of the General-in-Chief of the Army. He said that as a general principle it was a sound one; that if we were about to establish a new army it ought to be adopted; but that if adopted now, it would lead to a great deal of trouble, and cause injustice in the Army.

I am satisfied that if it be adopted now, although I assented to the report of it in good faith, we shall have about the same trouble in the Army that we have had in the Navy in consequence of the retiring board—and we are all, I trust, sick of that. I do not wish to do any injustice.

A single word in relation to the allusion made by the chairman as to what I have said on the action of that committee. I went into the committee opposed to the five regiments; I did not see the necessity of any increase at all; but if we were to have an increase I preferred the bill proposed by the chairman to the five regiments. Without committing myself in favor of any increase of the Army, I assented to the report in this form. I did not suppose the chairman understood me as committed to its support here, because I certainly said in the committee that I did not see my way clear to vote for any increase of the permanent Army of the United States. My political associate on the committee, the Senator from New York, [Mr. KING,] was most emphatic in his declaration on that matter; and I told the chairman of the committee and the supporters of the Administration, those who took into consideration the recommendations of the President and Secretary of War, I wanted to interpose no obstacle to give those gentlemen a fair opportunity to bring the matter early before the Senate and the country.

I do not feel that I am committed to the support of the bill in any form. I must vote to strike out the fourth section, which, when it was proposed, for the reason stated by the chairman so clearly and forcibly, struck my mind as just. I believe it is just and sound in principle now; but I am satisfied, as we have established our Army in the way we have, and added one regiment to another, the effect will be to work injustice; and I fear we shall have great complaints from the officers, and we shall go over perhaps the same series of fault-finding, not so extensive I hope in regard to the Army, that we have had from the Navy. I am sure none of us wish to do any injustice to any officers of the Army.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—
Mr. DAVIS. The Senator will allow me a moment. I do not wish to go into any remarks other than to make a single reply to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COLLAMER. I shall wish to be heard on this subject; and if the Senator from Mississippi is to reply to each Senator, perhaps he had better wait and reply to us in the aggregate.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall not probably reply to anybody else. I was merely proceeding to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the injustice of which he speaks is rather the wounding of sensibility; and the mode he takes will not reach his result. A major, for instance, has been put into a new regiment. If you confine his promotion to that regiment, he never can, in any possibility, come in such connection with an officer who formerly ranked him as to wound his sensibility; but if you make the promotion run through his arm of service, it will follow, and not very remotely, that that major will become a lieutenant colonel of an old regiment, and there he will find majors and captains under him who once ranked him. Promotion by regiment, as long as you continue to add regiments, does save the sensibility much better than any other mode which could be adopted. It is true that some old captain, looking to a majority and hoping for a vacancy in one of the new regiments, may find his opportunities of promotion under the old system better than under the new; but that is not his right. He has left to him, if you adopt this system, all that he would have if the new regiments had not been raised, and exactly what he would have had if those regiments had been called riflemen, as was sometimes proposed. He loses nothing except that advantage which he might gain by having the right of promotion across into the new regiments.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate at this late hour. I simply propose to point out some of the injurious effects which will be produced on the service by the passage of this fourth section. I hold in my hand the Army Register, and from that I have collated a few facts which will not require more than five or eight minutes for me to read. I shall read them, although I did not propose to do so when I collated them.

Mr. FOSTER. With the consent of the Senator, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 11, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. SMITH PYNE, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WILKINS'S POINT—SELECT COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced, as the select committee under the resolution of the 9th instant, in reference to the purchase of a tract of land on Wilkins's Point for fortification purposes, Messrs. HASKIN, HOPKINS, WOOD, FLORENCE, and HALL of Massachusetts.

KANSAS—SELECT COMMITTEE.

Also, as the select committee to which the Kansas message of the President was referred, with instructions, Messrs. HARRIS of Illinois, STEPHENS of Georgia, MORRILL, LETCHER, WADE, QUITMAN, WINSLOW, BENNETT, WHITE, WALBRIDGE, ANDERSON, STEVENSON, ADRAIN, BUTFINTON, and RUSSELL.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 45, the better to provide for the security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me, in order that I may introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no objection to yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, it is proper that I should say to the Committee on Commerce, and to the House, that I do not pretend to contest the constitutional right of Congress to pass laws regulating commerce upon the navigable waters of the United States, either on board of sail vessels or steamers. My only purpose is to perfect this bill submitted after investigation by that committee; and in making the inquiry yesterday in relation to a tin rivet or plug, I did so to elicit the sort of information which I conceive it to be the duty of the committee to communicate to the House, and which gentlemen should know when they are perfecting a measure of so much importance as this is considered to be. By referring to the law passed in 1853, an act approved March 3, 1853, I find the following in reference to the subject of fusible alloys and the hydrostatic pressure required to test the strength of iron before it is made into boilers:

"That in or upon the outside flue of each outside high-pressure boiler there is placed in a suitable manner alloyed metals, fusible by the heat of the boiler when raised to the highest working pressure allowed, and that in or upon the top of the flues of all other high pressure boilers in the steamer such alloyed metals are placed, as aforesaid, fusing at ten pounds greater pressure than said metals on the outside boilers, thereby, in each case, letting steam escape; and that adequate and certain provision is made for an ample supply of water to feed the boilers at all times, whether such vessel is in motion or not; so that, in high-pressure boilers, the water shall not be less than four inches above the flue; Provided, however, in steamers hereafter supplied with new high-pressure boilers, if the alloy fuses on the outer boilers at a pressure of ten pounds exceeding the working pressure allowed, and at twenty pounds above said pressure on the inner boilers, it shall be a sufficient compliance with this act.

"Third. That in subjecting to the hydrostatic test aforesaid boilers, called and usually known under the designation of high pressure boilers, the inspectors shall assume one hundred and ten pounds to the square inch as the maximum pressure allowable as a working power for a new boiler forty-two inches in diameter, made of inspected iron plates at least one fourth of an inch thick, in the best manner, and of the quality herein required, and shall rate the working power of all high-pressure boilers, whether of greater or less diameter, old or new, according to their strength compared with this standard; and in all cases the test applied shall exceed the working power allowed, in the ratio of one hundred and sixty-five to one hundred and ten, and no high-pressure boilers hereafter made shall be rated above this standard; and in subjecting to the test aforesaid that class of boilers usually designated and known as low-pressure boilers, the said inspectors shall allow as a working power of each new boiler a pressure of only three fourths the number of pounds to the square inch to which it shall have been subjected by the hydrostatic test and found to be sufficient therefor, using the water in such tests at a temperature not exceeding sixty degrees Fahrenheit; but should such inspectors be of the opinion that said boiler, by reason of its construction or material, will not safely allow so high a working pressure, they may, for reasons to be stated specifically in their certificate, fix the working pressure of said boiler at less than three fourths of said test pressure; and no low-pressure boiler hereafter made shall be rated in its working pressure above the aforesaid standard: And provided, That the same rules shall be observed in regard to boilers heretofore made, unless the proportion between such boilers and the cylinders, or some other cause, renders it manifest that its application would be unjust, in which cases the inspectors may depart from these rules, if it can be done with safety; but in no case shall the working pressure allowed exceed the hydrostatic test; and no valve, under any circumstances, shall be loaded or so managed in any way as to subject a boiler to a greater pressure than the amount allowed by the inspectors, nor shall any boiler or pipe be approved which is made in whole or in part of bad material, or is unsafe in its form, or dangerous from defective workmanship, age, use, or any other cause."

That is so much of the present law which it is proposed to repeal. I now read, sir, the proofs from the third section of the statement of experiments upon the temperature of steam, which I hold in my hand:

FIRST PROOF.

Extract from the Report of the Board of Examiners at Washington City, acting under the Secretary of the Navy, by virtue of act of Congress.

By virtue of authority vested in the Secretary of the Navy by an act of Congress, Professor Walter R. Johnson of Philadelphia, Mr. Charles Reeder of Baltimore, and Dr. Thomas P. Jones of Washington, were appointed a board of examiners to make experimental trials of such inventions and plans designed to prevent the explosion of steam-boilers and collapsing of flues, as they might deem them worthy of examination.

The commissioners met at the navy-yard at Washington city, where their experiments were made. They found the safety-guard in successful operation on one of the boilers in use there; but determining that all their experiments, embracing other inventions, could not be efficiently made on boilers whilst the engines were in use for other purposes, they got a new boiler constructed purposely. Their experiments on the safety-guard were continued during many days, and were characterized by exceeding watchfulness and nicety. The following is an extract from their report:

Table of observations to show the degree of sensibility of Evans's fusible alloy, used in testing his safety-guard.

SECOND PROOF.

Extract from the Report of Hon. Edmund Burke, Commissioner of Patents, to the Senate of the United States, on the subject of steam-boiler explosions. Read in the Senate, January, 1849.

"The operation [of Evans's safety-guard] is simple; the alloy being melted, the spindle is as it were unsoldered, and allowed to turn; the chain is unwound from its drum; the weight falls on to a support prepared to receive it, and the safety-valve is entirely relieved. The advantages of this plan are that it not only indicates danger, but relieves it, and that the spindle is self-adjusting. The only operation requiring the attention of the engineer is the rewinding of the chain, an operation which could not be neglected without stopping the engine."

"The fusing point of the alloy does not change materially by the repetition of the melting process."

"Mr. Evans's apparatus, when the alloy is properly prepared, the apparatus fairly used and not tampered with, is one upon which considerable reliance may be placed for the purpose which it professes to accomplish—the indication and relief of a dangerous elevation of temperature in the metal of the boiler."

FOURTH PROOF.

Letter of the Chief Engineer at the Washington Navy-Yard.
UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
WASHINGTON, August 14, 1844.

DEAR SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, and, according to your request, have again tested your alloy. I find there is no difference whatever in its melting point. I have tried it at least twenty times since you were last here, and I find it uniformly melts at a pressure of one hundred pounds, or a temperature of three hundred and twenty-four degrees, corresponding to that pressure, which is the point it was set by you to melt at, three years ago.

I would also state, in the different trials I have made with your safety-guard, I have never, in a single instance, seen it fail in its operations at the given melting point—whether caused by deficiency of water or increase of pressure. I would further add as my humble opinion, that your apparatus, for efficiency and security, (if let alone and not tampered with,) cannot be surpassed in preventing those dreadful calamities caused by the explosion of steam-boilers. This is not a hasty opinion, but one which has been long and maturely considered and formed.

I am, with sentiments of respect and esteem, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM M. ELLIS.

C. EVANS, Esq.

FIFTH PROOF.

Report of Engineer in Chief of the United States Navy to Commodore Morris, Chief of Bureau, &c.

ENGINEER CORPS, UNITED STATES NAVY,
February 6, 1845.

SIR: The letter of Mr. C. Evans, of the 4th instant, to the Secretary of the Navy, which has been referred to me for an opinion, has been received.

In 1842 I witnessed several operations of Mr. Evans's safety-guard, and have since made myself fully acquainted with its construction. I am of the opinion that it is worthy of application to the boilers of all steam engines, and that, to the boilers of stationary engines, and to those of vessels navigating rivers, the application of it, or one of equal merit, should be rendered imperative by legislative enactment.

I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.,
C. H. HASWELL.

To Commodore MORRIS, Chief of Bureau, &c.

SEVENTH PROOF.

Opinion of Professor Henry, of Princeton College of New Jersey.

I have made a number of experiments with your apparatus, the results of which are perfectly satisfactory. To determine if the discharge of the steam always takes place at the same pressure, the composition of the fusible metal remaining the same, I attached to the apparatus a manometer gauge, and found that in each case the discharge took place at a pressure of about thirty-three pounds per square inch. The indications of the gauge did not vary from this more than a pound on either side in any of the experiments, although the quantity of water in the boiler was not precisely the same in all cases. I have also made some experiments on surcharged steam; for this purpose the water was suffered to get low in the boiler, and then the fire was removed from the bottom to the sides, so as to heat the metal above the water line, and thus surcharge the steam. Under these circumstances the fusible metal gave way at a pressure of about sixteen pounds.

These results appear so satisfactory, that I do not hesitate to state that I consider the plan of using the fusible metal inclosed in a tube, exposed to the steam, and your arrangement for relieving the safety-valve at the approach of danger, as the best contrivance which has been proposed to the public as a means of preventing the disastrous explosions from steam.

With my best wishes for your success in introducing your invention into general use, I remain respectfully yours, &c.,
JOSEPH HENRY.

To C. EVANS, Esq.

Now, sir, it will be seen, that, under the provisions of the present law, the pressure to be applied to the iron of which boilers are made, is one hundred and sixty-five pounds to the square inch. I will do the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] the justice to say, that the fusible alloy has not in every instance fulfilled its purpose; but in its application with Evans's safety-guard, it has answered the required purpose. The gentleman referred yesterday to one instance of an explosion, in which the safety-guard was used. I have no doubt that when inquiry is made, it will be found that the pressure upon the boiler to produce the temperature at which this alloy will fuse, was removed in that instance. I say to the gentleman from Illinois that I know of no single instance in which the fusible alloy has failed of its purpose, when it has been protected by Evans's improved safety-guard. I am willing to admit that when the plug is used in boilers, very often the pressure of one hundred and sixty-five pounds to the square inch will not sufficiently fuse the alloy to permit the steam to escape; but it has answered the purpose in every instance in which it has been protected by Evans's improved safety-guard, and I defy contradiction of that fact. I think I have satisfied the House, and can satisfy the committee, by incontestable chemical tests and testimony, that tin fuses at 442° of Fahrenheit; that it is not adapted either for the purpose of preventing the explosion of boilers or the fuse of boilers, or securing the safety of human life; and I presume that the object of the committee, in introducing this section into the bill, was to throw additional guards and protections around human life.

Now, sir, I asked the gentleman from Illinois, yesterday, who reported this bill, if he could tell me where these tin plugs are to be placed, in what part of the boiler or flue, or where they are to be placed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. When the gentleman gets through I will answer him.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire again to call the attention of the House to the ninth section of the bill, and I hope the House will listen attentively to it. It is as follows:

“SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That instead of the existing provisions of law relating to the use of fusible alloys upon high-pressure boilers, there may be substituted fusible plugs, or rivets, of pure tin, of such dimensions, and inserted in such position, as shall be prescribed by the inspectors.”

Now, I take this ground, sir, that there is no fusible plug or rivet of pure tin that will melt at a less pressure of steam than 442° of Fahrenheit, and I maintain that there is no boiler, no iron, that has undergone any hydrostatic test, that will bear any such pressure; and if that be so, I want to know how they will use fusible plugs of tin? I maintain, therefore, that to give to the builders and owners of steamboats the privilege of using plugs of tin or fusible alloy, as may suit their desires and purposes, is to endanger life to a greater extent by the explosion of boilers or the collapse of flues, than ever before existed.

Why, sir, if you were to put in a plug of tin in the crown-plate of the boiler, or in the top flue, with the fire immediately under it, and if, by any accident, the water should be reduced below the top flue, where the plug ought to be placed, the consequence would be terrible, for two reasons. If the metal becomes heated to 442° Fahrenheit, necessary for the tin plug to become fused, the pressure of steam upon the boiler, or on the doors of the flue, or on the boat generally, would cause a destruction of human life greater than can be conceived. And another reason is, that if the object is to keep the boat on her course, to prevent her from going on to a lee shore, I want to know how she is to be kept from shipwreck. The plug out, of course the draft occasioned by the rush of steam into the smoke-stack must greatly increase the heat of the boiler, and must produce a pressure of steam productive of the most terrible consequences. I cannot conceive how any of these inspectors, men, I suppose, learned in their profession, could, for a single minute, recommend, and I cannot believe they have understandingly recommended, the use of this tin plug.

Now I agree with all that has been said by gentlemen on this floor in relation to disasters and loss of human life. I agree that there may be a necessity for improvement in the existing steamboat laws. I will vote for the bill or amendment which has been presented by the gentleman from Illinois from the Committee on Commerce, if I can be satisfied that the changes they propose will accomplish the end sought to be accomplished. But I would ask here, Mr. Speaker, if it is not in order to give notice that I will move to amend the substitute of my friend from Illinois, by striking out the ninth section? I desire to have an opportunity of submitting that amendment, because I do not believe the Committee on Commerce will be able to satisfy me, from the examination I have been able to give to the subject, that this fusible plug of pure tin will answer the purpose for which it was intended. I think it would be very much better to leave the existing provisions of law to stand as they are, with these rivets of fusible alloy, rather than to give the inspectors the right to make the uncertain and dangerous experiment of changing the provisions of existing law by the substitution of tin plugs.

The SPEAKER. In response to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair would state that, with a motion to commit pending, a motion to amend could not be entertained. If the motion to commit be waived, it will then be in order to move to strike out the ninth section; but not after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] having made the motion to commit, if he will withdraw it, I will then move to strike out the ninth section. I desire merely that the House shall have an opportunity of voting upon this subject; but, sir, I consider it the most important feature in the bill, and unless I can be satisfied by the gentleman from Illinois, who will have an opportunity of answering the objections which have been urged against the bill, that the tin plug which it is proposed to give the inspectors power to substitute, will answer the purpose equally well, I shall be compelled to vote against this bill. I have constituents who are as much interested in the passage of this bill, and in the protection of human life, as the constituents of any other gentleman on this floor. I am willing to vote for such a bill as this, but I will not vote for it with this ninth section in it, unless they can satisfy me that it will answer the purpose for which it is intended. Will my friend from New York withdraw the motion to commit?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will excuse me. I am very desirous that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole. I have not discussed the bill at length upon its merits. I desire to do so. I know of no reason why the bill cannot be amended in Committee of the Whole; and I think that is the proper direction to give it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I cannot submit my amendment at this time.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can submit his amendment in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes, if the bill goes there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the motion to commit cuts off all further motions to amend until that motion has been disposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Has this bill been printed?

The SPEAKER. The bill, substitute, and amendments, have been all printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope it will go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is a very important bill; too important to be acted on in this way.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there more than one motion to commit pending?

The SPEAKER. Only one motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then, if the motion to commit were withdrawn, the amendment could be submitted, and the motion to commit renewed.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion, I will submit my amendment, and then renew his motion to commit.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest that we cannot perfect this bill by this amendment. I hope it will go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. I hope the motion to commit will not be withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I do not withdraw the motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am not disposed to concur with the gentleman as to the propriety of referring this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I am disposed, and I think the House is disposed, to consider it here. That seems to be the disposition. I appreciate, to some extent, the fears expressed by gentlemen who are in favor of the passage of a proper bill on this subject regulating the commerce of this country by steam. I think there should be a bill passed of some kind. A gentleman yesterday cited cases of dreadful disasters upon vessels propelled by steam. I know it is a fact that since the passage of the act of 1852, as the statistics will show, the accidents on these vessels have been reduced to almost nothing. Now, I do not want to do anything to impede the passage of a law for the protection of the lives of passengers; but I want gentlemen to be fully satisfied that the change they are making is a good change, and then I am willing to vote for the bill.

Mr. WHITELEY. Mr. Speaker, if I believed that the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would prevail, I would not trouble the House at this time with one word in reference to this bill. To my mind, the character of some of its provisions is so monstrous that I cannot vote for it as it stands. It appears to me to interfere materially with our internal trade even upon canals. It not only does that, but it creates a horde of office-holders, an additional horde of office-holders, whose only duty will be to receive their salaries from the Government and bribes from steamboat owners. But it is not on this ground alone that I object to this measure; but more particularly upon the ground taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE.] As he has truly said, appeals have been made to our sympathies in regard to the frightful accidents which have happened by the explosion of boilers both at sea and upon our inland waters. This was all right. The provisions of this bill in reference to boats may be all right. The provisions of the bill in reference to limiting the number of passengers may be right. But while the ninth section is ingrafted upon it, I think that risks more lives of steamboat passengers than the legislation of Congress has ever prevented. This ninth section consists of about five lines. Modest as it is in appearance, it contains the sting, in my opinion, that ought to cripple and kill this bill. Members may not have had their attention called to it, because of its modesty. I wish, therefore, to attract to it the attention of the Committee on Commerce and of this House. It sets out with saying that instead of the existing provisions of law relating to the use of fusible alloys upon high-pressure boilers, there shall be substituted fusible plugs, or rivets, of pure tin, of such dimensions, and to be inserted in such positions, as shall be prescribed by the inspectors. I do not know by what process of reasoning, scientific or otherwise, the Committee on Commerce came to the conclusion to ingraft this provision upon their bill. If there was no outside pressure for it, I should like the gentleman who reported the bill to give me the scientific reason why these tin plugs should be inserted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will endeavor to do so, when I get the floor.

Mr. WHITELEY. The eleventh section of the amended bill provides that all high-pressure boilers, whether old or new, upon passenger steamers, shall be subjected to the rules for inspection and test prescribed in the first part of the third clause of the ninth section of the law of 1852. Let us see what that is:

"That, in subjecting to the hydrostatic test boilers called and usually known under the designation of high pressure boilers, the inspectors shall assume one hundred and ten pounds to the square inch as the maximum pressure allowable as a working power for a new boiler, forty-two inches in diameter, made of inspected iron plates," &c.

It becomes important to know what pressure these tin plugs will bear per square inch. The highest pressure, under the law I have quoted, is one hundred and ten pounds to the square inch as the working power. They graduate the pressure from one hundred and sixty-five pounds to one hundred and ten in testing boilers. I undertake to say, and without fear of contradiction, that no tin plug will fuse under a pressure of three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch.

I ask, then, where is the protection from explosion when the law limits the working power to one hundred and ten pounds, and a tin plug is inserted as a guard against explosion, the fusing power of which is three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch—nearly three times as great as that required by the law? There is this difficulty in this ninth section. Your local inspectors, your supervising inspectors, the men who give authority to these steamboats to run, have to limit the pressure to one hundred and ten pounds to the square inch. The Committee on Commerce have provided in their bill authority to use a plug which will not fuse until the pressure reaches three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch. I desire the gentleman who reported this bill to tell the House how a boiler is to be prevented from exploding, when it can only be worked up to the pressure of one hundred and ten pounds, while the guard will not fuse until the pressure reaches three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch? Take it by the square foot: the monstrosity of this proposition will then become palpable to all. Multiply three hundred and seventy-five by one hundred and forty-four; and then you will see that the pressure will have to be fifty-four thousand pounds to the square foot, and then the plug must be in the hottest part of the boiler.

They say in this ninth section, that it is to be inserted in such place as shall be prescribed by the inspectors. They will not put it in the ladies' cabin, nor upon the rudder, nor in the wheel-house. If they do not put it in the hottest place, it will be of no use. When I asked where they were going to put it, the gentleman did not answer where it was to be put. The only places where they can put it are these: either in the crown-plate of the boiler, or in one of the flues. What will be the effect if it be placed in the crown-plate of the boiler? With the water lying upon it, and with the fire underneath, it will not melt at four hundred and forty pounds' pressure. It would bear a pressure of more than three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch; the water would protect it. If it be put there, the heat would have to be so great before it became a guard and protection—before it would fuse to let the steam escape—that the iron itself would have to melt.

So far as my knowledge extends, the most supposable place for it to be placed is in one of the flues. What is its effect there? There can be but two results, if it melts at all. I make the supposition that it will melt. If it melts in the flues there can only be two effects produced, so far as my knowledge extends. The steam escaping through the aperture will rush through the smoke-stack, and by producing a vacuum will cause a rekindling of the fires in the furnace; and, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the boilers becoming so hot—that the engineers call a white heat—the vessel will then be set on fire, a catastrophe as disastrous as an explosion; or, in the second place, it will so heat your boilers that after the steam has escaped, you cannot for hours, until the boilers cool, send a man into them to close up the aperture; so that, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has truly said, in a storm upon the ocean, or upon a lee shore, if you save your boilers from exploding, your vessel must either go down for the want of management, or go ashore for want of any control of it. Now, that is the effect, the sole effect, of this ninth section, providing for the insertion of these tin plugs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this House and the Committee on Commerce will examine this bill, and particularly the ninth section, they will find that there is not in it, throughout its whole forty sections, one single provision guarding against the explosion of boilers. I think I have demonstrated that this ninth section will not do it; that these fusible tin plugs will not do it. Where, then, is the provision? The law of 1852 was adopted, I take it, after hearing advice and suggestions from men of as high scientific attainments as those who have been consulted in reference to this bill; and the ninth section of that bill provided for the use of these fusible alloys. Now, any man who knows anything in reference to this subject, knows that two metals, be they what they may, if alloyed, melt at a much lower degree of temperature than either of the integral parts of that alloy. In most if not all high-pressure boilers it is this alloy, and it alone, that prevents explosion; because the alloy melts at a far less temperature than the iron will.

Well, sir, the bill of 1852 compelled the inspectors of high-pressure steamboats to say to every steamboat owner or captain who came to them for a certificate, that they must have on the outside of each high-pressure boiler alloy metal, fusible by the heat of the boiler when raised to the highest working pressure allowed. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, this is not an entire guard, and the wit of man cannot devise an entire guard against the explosion of steam; but, as he has well said, the number of explosions has been greatly reduced since the passage of the act of 1852.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that subjects of this kind do not commend themselves to the ear of the House. But if I had time, and thought it worth while, I think I could demonstrate to the House the use, the great benefit, and the necessity, of these fusible alloys, as I think I have demonstrated the utter inutility of the tin plugs. I do not mean, however, to take up the time of the House in arguing upon that subject. I could read to the House the recommendations of such men as Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution, Professor Locke, of Cincinnati, Professors Silliman and Olmstead, of Yale, and other distinguished scientific gentlemen who have examined this subject, and say that it is about the only thing that will protect your steamboats. Why not, then, I ask the Committee on Commerce—and I ask the gentleman from Illinois to answer the question—why not leave the matter as it was left in the bill of 1852? Why strike it out? Why strike it out, particularly when I am told that the local inspector at Pittsburg, the local inspector at Cincinnati, and the local inspector at New Orleans, will not give certificates, or permit a steamboat to go from their wharves, until they have one of these fusible alloys attached to their boilers? *What is the influence that is legislating this provision out of the act of 1852? Why, sir, I believe that it is intended, by influences which I will not name here, to break down this thing called Evans's safety-guard, by the operation of the ninth section, without letting us know what we are doing. I believe the effect will be to endanger the life of every man who goes on board a high-pressure boat as a passenger.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish this bill to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that we may at least inquire into the matter. For my part, I did not know until yesterday that the bill was printed. I did not know any of its provisions. I am willing, and I think the House is willing, and the country demands, that there should be some legislation in reference to ocean-going steamers. But to come down to every little raft and vessel that floats upon any canal or creek in the country, and make with reference to them such provisions as would apply, in my humble judgment, only to vessels navigating large streams, is, to my mind, so monstrous that I, at least, cannot give it my support.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think this matter has been pretty thoroughly discussed. There have been three speeches upon one side, and four upon the other; and I think the House is now prepared to second the demand for the previous question; which, I understand, will bring us to a vote first upon the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask the previous question.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I would ask the gentleman if he has considered that the bill makes a discrimination in favor of foreigners, and against our own shipping?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will answer that.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the demand for the previous question. This is a bill of great interest to the country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman want to make a speech upon it?

Mr. HATCH. No, sir, I do not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HATCH. I am opposed to this mode of legislation—legislation by committees.

The SPEAKER. The previous question being demanded, debate is not in order.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to inquire if the amendment is pending which I suggested yesterday?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE demanded tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes one hundred and two; a further count not having been demanded.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe the rules now give me an hour in which to close the debate. But I shall not occupy my whole time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to his hour after the main question has been ordered.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now submit whether the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to his hour while the motion to commit is pending. If he makes his speech now, and the bill should be committed, he may claim another hour to close debate in committee. If the House vote down the motion to commit, the gentleman will then be entitled to his hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to address the House for an hour now, under the rules, if he chooses to exercise that right. That has been the construction given heretofore to the rules; and the Chair thinks the reason a very substantial one. The gentleman may be able to give reasons why the bill should not be committed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that he may take his hour now, or after the motion to commit has been voted upon; but that if he chooses to avail himself of his right now, he will have exercised all the rights he has to address the House upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. HATCH. What is the precise question upon which the House is now called to vote? What is the main question?

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If that motion shall fail, the question will then come up upon the first pending amendment, and then upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is certainly very proper, on a bill of the importance of the one we are now considering, that every member of the House should fully understand its provisions. I desire very briefly to reply to some of the remarks which have been made in opposition to the bill; and let me say, right here, that I will endeavor to be as brief as possible, for no member of the House is more fully aware than I am, that bills of this kind are more frequently killed in this House by the speeches of their friends, than in any other way. I shall, therefore, endeavor to be as brief as possible, and make the necessary explanations.

In the first place, let me remind the House of what I said yesterday, in the opening of the debate, that I did not intend to call the previous question for the purpose of preventing discussion. I said, as gentlemen will see by referring to my remarks on that occasion, as reported in the Globe, that after the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR], and the gentleman from California, [Mr. SCOTT], who had presented amendments, should have spoken, if no other gentleman desired to speak, I hoped the House would sustain the previous question. If any gentleman desired, in good faith, to speak in opposition to the bill, I did not wish to cut him off. On the other hand, I desired that he should be heard.

Mr. CURTIS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I do not propose to oppose this bill, but I am not ready to vote upon it until I understand more of its provisions. I am satisfied that those who are most interested in the commerce of the great valley of the Mississippi do not understand its application to that kind of navigation; and until it is fully explained in view of that commerce, I shall feel compelled to vote against it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, sir, I profess to know something about the commerce of that river, as I have lived on its bank for nearly twenty years—longer, I imagine, than the gentleman from Iowa has. And in regard to his not understanding the provisions of the bill, and in regard to the suggestion yesterday made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK], that it was proposed to take a snap-judgment in this House upon it, I ask the gentleman to take the facts into consideration, and then see whose fault it is if the bill is not understood. Within a very few days from the commencement of the session, I introduced a bill, nearly all of the provisions of which are incorporated into this bill, which is now offered as a substitute, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. On the 18th day of January, the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR], and the gentleman from California, [Mr. SCOTT], introduced their amendments, which were printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce. And let me say here, that when the bill was originally introduced I gave notice to members that it was before them; that the bill would be printed; that they could examine it; and that I should ask that when it should be taken up in the House, it should be considered without being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The substitute now presented was printed more than a week ago. On Tuesday morning I gave notice that the substitute was printed; that the report was printed; and that gentlemen could examine them before the bill came up for action in the House; and I say, therefore, to my friend from New York, who seems to have awaked just now from a sort of a Rip Van Winkle sleep, that if he did not know about the bill and its position before the House, it is not my fault, nor the fault of the House.

Now, sir, to send this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, you, Mr. Speaker, have been here long enough to know, as every member of the House at all acquainted with the transaction of business here under the rules knows, is, at this stage of the session, equivalent to its defeat. It is a fact, that under the practical operation of the rules, no bill of this character referred to the Committee of the Whole is ever reached. The gentleman from New York is mistaken when he says that a majority of the House can call it up at any time. It cannot be done in point of fact. But my friend from New York says that the bill, if passed, will involve a forfeiture of property in the city of New York to the amount of $10,000,000. Well, sir, if it be true that the bill bears more heavily upon private interest than the public good demands, then I admit that it is an objection.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I alluded particularly to its effect upon sailing vessels.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The bill does not apply to sailing vessels at all. We are not legislating upon that subject now. And let me say that I do not think that the bill bears more heavily upon private interests than is demanded by the public good of the country. I must tell my friend that this is not a bill further to protect the interests of steamboat owners. That is not the title of the bill. It is a bill further to protect the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam. That is the object of the bill; and if, to carry out its just provisions, and save and protect human life, $10,000,000 in steamboat property, in the city of New York, has to be confiscated, I say let the confiscation take place. I will not place dollars and cents as an offset against human life.

The country has seen how these steamboat owners have outraged the public in their mode of carrying passengers; and the country has demanded that there shall be some further legislation on this subject in their restraint. Even though it does bear, as it undoubtedly does in this bill, and as we intended it should, upon these private interests, how is it, I ask the House, under the present law, in regard to ocean steamers? There is no reasonable limit to the number of passengers which can be put on board of these vessels.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. The number of passengers is represented by the number of superficial feet of deck.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand; but that amounts to nothing. In the California steamers which sail from New York, passengers are crowded on board like cattle, and fed like dogs. A gentleman told me that he saw the steamer Georgia going out of the port of New York with fourteen hundred passengers on board, besides the officers and crew. Instead of having place to sleep, they had scarcely place to stand, and they were fed absolutely like dogs. These men who have thus been compelled to travel are our constituents, who are engaged in lawful pursuits, and who, after paying exorbitant fares, are treated in this way. This is one of the things we intend to remedy by this bill. We say that these steamers shall carry only a given number of passengers.

But the gentleman is mistaken entirely as to the effect, as I will show the House. In the substitute, it is provided that no ocean-going steamer shall carry more than one passenger to every four tons. Does that bear oppressively upon steamboat owners? Take some of the ocean steamers, and let us see how the case stands. Here is the Fulton, of two thousand and three hundred tons burden. How many passengers can she carry under this bill? She can carry very nearly six hundred passengers. Is that not a sufficient number? The gentleman from New York says that if we pass this bill, the ocean-going steamers from New York will not be able to pay their coal bill. Take the Fulton again. She can carry six hundred passengers from New York to Panama at the rate of $100 each. That is $60,000. What is her coal bill? Her coal bill does not amount to $6,000, as I can prove, I believe.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, made a remark which could not be heard at the reporter's desk.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know what these rates have been under some rigorous opposition, but I have had very different information in regard to the prices. The fare from New York to California has ranged within a few years past from $400 to $600.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I understood the gentleman from New York to state on yesterday that the limit in the bill is one passenger to every seven tons.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say now that the Fulton, of two thousand three hundred tons burden, can, under the bill, carry six hundred passengers.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is at the rate of one passenger to every four tons. That is a change in the original bill proposed by the substitute. I think that neither the steamboat interest of New York, nor any other interest, can complain of that limit.

I will go on with the point at which I was when interrupted. The Vanderbilt is of three thousand three hundred and sixty tons burden. She would be entitled, under this bill, to carry eight hundred passengers. Is not that a sufficient number of human beings to intrust to one steamer?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. The Vanderbilt is seven thousand tons burden.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have taken the measurement of the Vanderbilt as set forth in the report of the committee appointed to examine into the loss of the Central America, which I have in my hand. But if the Vanderbilt has the tonnage which my friend claims, then so much the worse for him; she could, under this bill, carry one thousand five hundred passengers. But I have taken the tonnage as stated in the report I have referred to, and I presume it is according to ordinary measurement.

Now, sir, in regard to the number of life-boats. The Committee on Commerce did not pretend to know, of themselves, much about these things. So far as I am concerned, I do not profess to know about them. Instead of a seafaring man, I am what the sailors would call a land-lubber, residing as I do in the far off interior. We sought information from experts and from gentlemen who might be expected from their position to be informed on all these matters.

And who are the men, let me ask the gentleman from New York, who have recommended the provisions of the bill of the gentleman from California, which have been copied almost without a single change in my substitute?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. The Board of Underwriters.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will give you some of their names. One is Commodore Perry. He is supposed to be a tolerably good seaman. Charles H. Marshall. I ask the gentleman from New York to say whether he is a man competent to judge of this matter? Captain Nye, late of the Pacific. These are some of the men whose counsels we have followed. There is a difference of opinion between them and my friend from New York, and it is for the House to determine which counsels they will follow in this regard.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Can he remind the House of a single instance of class legislation like this? Can he remind the House of an instance in which a law has been passed discriminating in favor of one trade and against another? This bill would deprive steamers of the passenger trade and give it to sailing vessels.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We do not propose to make any such discriminations, and do anything in regard to sailing vessels. If legislation be necessary in regard to that branch of the marine, the gentleman from New York, with his knowledge of matters of that kind, if he sees the necessity for further legislation, will bring in a bill upon that subject. We are legislating now for the security of the lives of passengers in vessels propelled by steam. That is what we propose to do in this bill. We do not interfere with trade. We do not discriminate in favor of, or against, any interest. We merely ask Congress to pass some further provisions of law for the safety and protection of human life, which has been terribly sacrificed for the want, as we think, of provisions which are embraced in this bill. So much for the objections of the gentleman from New York.

I do not see the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] in his seat. He yesterday drew the Constitution upon the bill. Those of us who were here in the Thirty-Third Congress, and had the pleasure of serving with the genial and witty member from Mississippi, Mr. Wiley P. Harris, will recollect the remark that he made in regard to his Virginia friends always bringing up the Constitution. He said that they carried the Constitution about them, and drew it, like a pocket pistol, upon the slightest provocation. Well, sir, the gentleman from Virginia drew the Constitution upon this bill upon very slight provocation; and I might have been a little troubled by it, had not his colleague from the Norfolk district, [Mr. MILLSON,] who is known as one of the strictest constructionists in the House, and by his ability and fairness as a legislator, come up and answered, as I thought successfully, that objection of his colleague.

The gentleman objected to various other provisions and details of the bill, which I will not go into at any great length; but let me say that I think his objections were not well founded. He was certainly mistaken in one respect. He said, as I understood him, in response to his colleague, that he did not vote for the law of 1852. Well, sir, either the gentleman is mistaken, or the record which I have before me is erroneous. Let me say here, that although these steamboat passenger bills have been resisted in this House, yet when the House has come to a vote upon them, they have always passed; and, although there was a great deal of opposition to the bill of 1852, when the final vote came to be taken upon it, it passed by a vote of 147 to 27, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] amongst others, voting for it. There were the same efforts made to refer that bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union that are now made to give this bill that direction; but the House steadfastly refused to commit the bill, and it was considered in the House. There was one remark made by the then chairman of the Committee on Commerce, in his closing speech, which I desire to repeat; and that was, that while Congress had been tinkering the bill, seven hundred souls had passed into eternity by explosions and other accidents, which he thought might have been avoided, had the proposed law been in operation.

I come now to the objections which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] and the gentlemen from Delaware [Mr. WHITELEY] have urged. Now, sir, I do not profess to know much about the scientific operation of these things to which they have referred, but I will tell the House briefly what I do understand in regard to that subject. The bill of 1852 provided for the use of a certain fusible alloy, that had to be used and nothing else, because it was a provision of law that it should be used; and it can be used in no other way except through Evans's safety-guard, as it is termed, which is a patent right. The House will, therefore, see that there is a direct and special interest on the part of the patentees that they should continue to have this monopoly, whether it answers the purposes of the law or not. Well, the supervising inspectors, the local inspectors, and all men who have had any experience upon this subject have, as I understand, come to the conclusion that it does not answer the objects of the law; and what do they propose? Not to do away with this alloy entirely, but that a provision shall be made—which seems reasonable enough—that if anything else better is discovered it may be used, and they believe that the tin plug will answer every purpose.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to inquire of him whether, and if so, in what way, this tin plug can be used otherwise than in Evans's safety-guard? And whether there is any difference in that respect between the tin plug and the fusible-alloy plug? My impression is, that whether you use a plug of fusible alloy, or a plug of tin, it must be used, or at least the better mode of using it is to employ it in Evans's safety-valve. If I am mistaken, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to explain how it is that this tin plug can be used differently from the mode in which the plug of fusible alloy is used?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will endeavor to answer the gentleman. This tin plug, as I understand it, is to be inserted upon the top of the flue at the back end of the boiler, where the fire returns from under the boiler and enters the flue. That is the hottest part of the flue, and this tin plug fuses, according to a calculation which I have in my hand, the correctness of which, I think, cannot be disputed, at 442°, while the temperature at which the iron of the boiler is affected is much higher. That is according to the reliable experiment that has been made, I think, by the Franklin Institute.

Mr. FLORENCE. What experiment of the Franklin Institute? Have you the table there?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have not the full table; but I state the fact.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. What is the difference in degree?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Four hundred and forty-two degrees as against 450°. The tin plug fuses at a degree of heat which does not affect the boiler at all.

Mr. HOARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Certainly, although I do not want to be so constantly interrupted; because I do not profess, myself, to have the completest personal knowledge upon this subject. I am not a chemist, or a philosopher; but I have taken the opinions of competent practical men who have watched the operation of this thing from the time of the passage of the law of 1852 down to the present day. They have no interest in the matter, except to carry out the great object which I trust we all have in view, to obtain a law which shall produce the greatest possible safety to human life.

Mr. HOARD. I desire that the gentleman from Illinois will explain this fact. He is no doubt right as to the point at which tin will fuse, but will he tell the House what will be the pressure of steam upon the boilers at that degree of heat? I have no definite knowledge on the subject, but I hazard the opinion that to bring the boiler plate to a temperature that would fuse these tin plugs would involve a pressure of a thousand pounds to the square inch.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think I understand the gentleman from New York. It is known that nineteen out of every twenty explosions or collapses which occur, occur in consequence of want of water in the boiler. Now, sir, this tin plug is a perfect and complete remedy against accidents from that cause; because, from the nature of the case, before the boiler can become so heated as to explode, the tin plug will fuse.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust the gentleman will give way to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should be very glad to accommodate the gentleman; but I do not desire to detain the House longer.

Mr. FLORENCE. I just want to explain the matter involved in the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOARD.] When the boiler arrives at a degree of heat to cause the tin plug to fuse, to wit: 442° Fahrenheit, the water must be below the top flue; but by this time the boiler will have undergone a hydrostatic pressure of three hundred and seventy-five pounds to the square inch; and I tell you that when you get the heat up to the point of fusing the tin plug, so as to let the steam out into the smoke stack, you will have produced a pressure upon the boiler that no iron ever manufactured can stand. It will tear the boat in pieces. This is why I oppose the use of this tin plug.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There is a difference of opinion in regard to that matter between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and other gentlemen, who—without any injustice to that gentleman—are quite as competent to judge as he. The House will determine between the evidence of both.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman will permit me, I will give him proof. I will read him the tables on which I make my statement. I will give him the statistics on which I controvert his position.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] says he has not the Franklin Institute table. I have it here, and will submit the more elaborate results of an examination of the elasticity of steam by a commission appointed by the Parisian Academy of Sciences—Dulong and Arago taking a leading part in the examination. This differs im-materially from the table the gentleman has referred to:

It will be seen that one atmosphere is equal to fifteen pounds; therefore, multiply the atmospheres opposite the degrees of heat by fifteen, and the result is the pressure of steam to the square inch. For example: multiply the 25 opposite 439.34° by 15, and the result is 375 pounds. Tin fuses at 442° Fahrenheit, being 2,66° greater heat. I trust this table will satisfy the gentleman from Illinois that the position I have taken is the just one; and, as he has not answered the question I propounded him in my general remarks, he will abandon the tin rivet or plug.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am sorry my friend from Pennsylvania has got so much excited. I am sorry this "plug-ugly" subject affected him so deeply. But, sir, I do not propose to dwell longer upon this subject. The provision here made is a perfectly safe one; there is no doubt about it. There is a manifest impropriety in this House, tying up, as it did in the law of 1852, and confining the action of the inspectors to a certain mode of accomplishing the object, to the rejection of all other modes.

Now, sir, I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House, nor shall I, except to refer to one other objection made by my friend from Virginia, to the bill. Many of the objections urged by him to the details of the bill were only enlarging and carrying out the principles of the bill of 1852, which the gentleman himself voted for. But he refers specially, as an objection to the bill, to the number of officers it would create. Well, sir, I only want to submit to the House this fact. We have established new offices of supervising inspectors only at points where they were absolutely necessary; in Florida—which was, in fact, a casus omissus in the original bill of 1852; one in Oregon; one at Paduca, in Kentucky; one at Memphis, Tennessee; and one in Galena, Illinois. All these points, it was shown, absolutely required the establishment of these boards, for the reason that the boats running from those points frequently could not be inspected, and had to run without inspection if they ran at all, subjecting themselves to the penalties of the law.

But, sir, in regard to the outlay or expense involved. The gentleman from Virginia said it would be $20,000. Now, sir, I have made a calculation, and find, according to it, that it cannot be more than $12,000; and the additional boats that will come in to be inspected will bring more than that amount into the Treasury; so that it will not cost the Government, in reality, a single dollar in addition to the present expense.

But, sir, I wish to say, in conclusion, that I have no interest in the passage of this bill more than any other member of the House. The committee which reported it considered it thoroughly before reporting it for the consideration of the House. It has been fully and fairly discussed here for two days; and I think the House is now prepared to act, if they ever will be prepared. If they propose to pass the act at all, they had better pass it at once, and not send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me for a moment, I wish to correct one statement of his. He yesterday told the House that this bill failed at the last Congress for want of time. Now, I would be glad for him to explain to the House that he, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce in the last Congress, postponed this bill to a day certain, for eight or ten times, commencing in April, 1856, and from time to time postponing it, until finally it was postponed until the 3d of March, one day before the final adjournment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee. I think there were only two postponements of this bill in the last session, and they were made at the earnest request of members—I think the gentleman from Tennessee among them—who wanted further time to examine the bill. The day to which it was postponed the last time was a dies non; there was no session on that day, and the Speaker ruled that the bill went to the Speaker's table. I made repeated attempts to get it up afterwards but failed.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. The gentleman from Illinois says the bill was postponed but twice. Now, sir, I have a memorandum in my hand taken from the record, in which the dates are given to which it was postponed eight different times. First, the bill was postponed on the 22d of April, then on the 1st of May, then on the 5th of May, again on the 6th of May, then on the 8th of May, then on the 10th of June, again on the 15th of August, and finally on the 10th of December.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill was postponed, then, oftener than I had any recollection of. These postponements are, however, only another argument against the postponement now asked for.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact, that some of the material changes made by this bill are to increase the salaries of the supervising and local inspectors, the effect of which will be unnecessarily to burden the commerce of the country; to increase the salary of the supervising inspectors from $1,500 to $2,000, and to $3,000, and to establish an inspectorship at Galena, Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not yield the floor for the gentleman to make a long speech.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. One other word, and then the gentleman can give me the benefit of an explanation.

Mr. Speaker, I observed, during the last Congress, some evidences of an understanding—and I confess I felt that there was a combination—between the supervising inspectors and the Committee on Commerce. Perhaps that word “combination” is too strong; but I noticed that whenever this bill came up, these supervising inspectors were here, or some of them, looking to the interests to be subserved by it. Now, what are those interests, as indicated by leading features of this bill? Let me here remark, that the only effect of the change proposed, as to fusible alloy, is to give these supervising inspectors a dangerous discretionary power. This bill does not provide that the tin plugs shall be substituted for the fusible alloy, but that it may be substituted. If there is one body of men who are selling fusible alloy, and another who are selling tin plugs, it gives to these supervising inspectors the sole power to determine whether they will purchase the one or the other for all the boats.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will answer that question of my friend from Tennessee. One of the points he makes is in regard to the supervising inspectors being about here during the time the steamboat bill was under consideration last Congress. This is true. They came here at the request of the Committee on Commerce of this House and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, in order to give us the information upon this subject which they, from their experience and knowledge, are so well calculated to furnish. One of the men who came here and who gave the committee his suggestions—and very wise suggestions they were—was the constituent of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. HUMPHREY MARSHALL,] Captain Shalleross, of Louisville, a man, who as I stated yesterday, had been upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, running a steamboat for thirty-five years, and during all that time had never cost an insurance company a dollar, or lost the life of a single passenger. Such men, we thought, were able to give us information upon which we could report to the House with the full belief that it would be satisfactory.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Allow me to say a single word in conclusion. I ask the House to take care to ascertain whether the only material changes in this bill are not, first, to give to the board of supervising inspectors a dangerous power, a power that no body of men should be intrusted with unless, like Caesar's wife, above suspicion; next, to increase the salaries of local and supervising inspectors; and next, to establish an inspectorship at the town of Galena, where the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the last Congress resides. I ask, why is this necessary?

We only ask, Mr. Speaker, that the House will not pass this bill without deliberation and reflection, but will give us time to put proper questions to the committee, that they may be answered before we shall pass upon a complicated and important measure like this.

Mr. CURTIS. When I asked the gentleman from Illinois a question in reference to the navigation of the Mississippi river, he only replied to me that he knew more about the Mississippi river than I did; but this answer did not satisfy me. He has said a good deal about witnesses and testimony. I do not care to put him upon the stand; I only wish to obtain information, that I may vote understandingly on this question. Now, what is the use of compelling every ferry-boat running across the Illinois, the Mississippi, the Missouri, or the Arkansas rivers, to have licensed pilots and engineers? What is the necessity for this upon boats which only run across rivers? I will ask him, too, whether these licensed pilots have not monopolized the business until they have actually stopped the commerce of the great trunks of the lower Mississippi? In some instances they have charged as high as one thousand dollars a month under the license provisions of these steamboat bills, which it is now proposed to extend.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman from Iowa on the last point first. If he had listened to my remarks yesterday morning, he would have seen that in the bill I have proposed as a substitute, the very evil of which he complains is remedied. We make it a criminal offense for these pilots to combine in that way; and when they do thus combine, under this bill, they render themselves liable to punishment. If the gentleman asks how this law applies to the lower Mississippi, I will tell him that, as it is a general law, it applies everywhere in this country, to the lower Mississippi as well as to the upper Mississippi, to Keokuk as well as to Galena.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, as to freight-boats: Why should they carry as many life-boats and life-preservers as passenger-boats on the lower Mississippi? because, in one sense, they are all passenger-boats.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No such thing. It has nothing to do with freight-boats.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask whether freight-boats on the lower Mississippi are not also passenger-boats?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was deemed by the committee a very important matter that these freight-boats should be brought within the law, in order to guard against the explosion of boilers, and that they should be obliged to have their boilers examined. Now, in regard to ferry-boats, I do not know of any class of boats where there is more necessity for inspection. They are crossing our rivers crowded, loaded down with passengers. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to that terrible accident on the Delaware river which occurred only a year ago. I allude to the burning of the ferry-boat, while crossing from Camden to Philadelphia, by which over fifty lives were lost. The boilers of that boat had not been inspected. I have said all I want to say.

The question now being on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Barksdale, Bishop, Blair, Bocock, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Burns, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Glimer, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Haskin, Hatch, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kelly, Lamar, Lawrence, Leiter, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, Stephenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Walton, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicofer—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Billingham, Bingham, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hawkins, Hickman, Howard, Kettog, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leach, Lovejoy, Samuel S. Marshall, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Sherman, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—79.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, stated that Mr. LETCHER was confined to his room by indisposition—not anything serious, but he was unable to be in the House to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, when his name was called, said: I desire to ask a question, the answer to which will govern my vote. If the House refuse to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, will it not afterwards be in order to recommit it to the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been seconded, and the main question ordered. If the motion to refer fails, the previous question does not exhaust itself until the bill has been engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Will it be in order to recommit the bill after the previous question is exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I vote “no.”

The result of the vote having been announced, Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider it; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. STANTON. I am sorry to be under the necessity of again troubling the House with a question of privilege from the select committee of which I am chairman; but we find it difficult to make any progress, and I am instructed by the committee to make a special report. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The select committee appointed to investigate the charges against the members and officers of last Congress, growing out of the disbursement of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., or other persons, now report:

That on the 8th day of February, A. D. 1858, John W. Wolcott, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, was called and sworn as a witness, and was examined by said committee, and, amongst other matters not material to the matter which the committee now desire to bring to the attention of the House, testified as follows:

“Question. Had you any funds placed in your hands, belonging to any of the manufacturers in Massachusetts, for the purpose of influencing members of Congress upon the passage of the tariff act?”

“Answer. I had not.

“Question. Were you ever authorized by any of them to make any promises of future benefits, in the event of the passage of that act?”

“Answer. I was not.

“Question. Did you, after the close of the last session of Congress, receive from the manufacturers, either in Boston or elsewhere, any funds, money, negotiable securities, or anything of that sort, to be used in that way?”

“Answer. No, sir.

“Question. Did you, at any time during the months of March or April, 1857, receive from Mr. Stone any negotiable securities, or money, or credits of any kind?”

“Answer. Never. Never for any such purpose as that, either directly or indirectly.

“Question. Did you receive at any time in the early part of March a considerable sum of securities for any purpose?”

“Answer. Never for any purpose connected with the tariff, either to be paid to members of Congress, for the purpose of influencing their action, or to be paid to their agents.

“Question. Nor for their benefit?”

"Answer. Nor for their benefit, either directly or indirectly."

"Question. Nor in satisfaction of previous arrangements or promises?"

"Answer. Nor in satisfaction of previous arrangements or promises."

"Question. Did you receive any securities at any time during the month of March last, to the amount of $30,000, at one time?"

"Answer. Not for any purpose of that sort."

"Question. Did you ever for any purpose?"

"Answer. Well, that would be a matter of strictly private business; I did not for the purpose of influencing members of Congress, or their agents."

Whereupon the witness asked for time to consult counsel in regard to his obligation to answer the question last propounded to him, which was granted.

That on the 11th instant, the witness again appeared before said committee, and submitted the following as his answer to said question, and peremptorily refused to make any other or further answer thereto.

"Question. Did you receive from the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co., sometime in March last, a sum of securities or money of the amount of $30,000, more or less?"

"Answer. I did not, in March last, nor at any other time, receive from Lawrence, Stone & Co. any money or securities of any amount, for the purpose of influencing, or to be used in influencing, directly or indirectly, the action or vote of any member or officer of the present or the last Congress upon the tariff or any other act or measure considered by Congress, or before it, or contemplated to be before it; nor did I ever pay, or promise to pay, directly or indirectly, any money or pecuniary consideration to any officer or member of any Congress for his vote or services in the passage of, or to influence his action in relation to, the tariff or any other law; nor did I ever give any money or securities to any person for the purpose of being paid to any officer or member of Congress for his vote or influence, directly or indirectly, upon any act under the consideration of Congress, nor have I any knowledge that any such act or thing was done by any other person."

"I am advised by my counsel, Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and James M. Keith, whose opinion I have obtained since the present question was propounded to me, that the above answer is a full answer to everything which such a question may involve, falling under the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives, touching the inquiry which the committee are constituted, and could only be constituted, to investigate. And, acting under the same legal advice, I most respectfully submit that the question, in its present form, is not of itself 'pertinent' to the only inquiry which the House, in this instance, has a legal right to institute."

"If, acting under such a power, a committee of the House can compel a witness to answer such a question as this except by saying that he did not use at all, directly or indirectly, any money, coming from any quarter, to influence directly or indirectly the action or vote of any member of Congress, and that he has never paid any money to any one for such a purpose, and has no knowledge that any money was used for that purpose, or any other illegal purpose, regarding Congress, or any of its officers, I respectfully submit that it gives to the committee or the House the right to inquire into my private business and social relations, which, except so far as they may tend to prove the alleged improper influencing of members of Congress in some official duty, is as much beyond the jurisdiction of the House, and, of course, of the committee, as it would be beyond their power to investigate the private business and social relations of any other citizen, without such a charge or implication of corruption, or attempt to corrupt Congress or any of its members, having been made."

J. W. WOLCOTT.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11, 1858."

Your committee having heretofore had evidence that the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co. had, early in March, 1857, paid to the said John W. Wolcott the sum of $58,000 in two payments, one of $33,000, and the other of $25,000, which constituted a part of the charge of $87,000, which appeared from the books of Lawrence, Stone & Co. to have been expended in procuring the passage of the tariff of 1857, believe it very material and important to the elucidation of the matter referred to them, to know from Mr. Wolcott whether he admits the receipt of any such sum; and if so, how it was expended; that the House and the country may judge whether it was designed to influence the legislation of Congress, or not.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, commanding him to arrest the said John W. Wolcott wheresoever he may be found, and have his body at the bar of the House forthwith to answer as for a contempt in refusing to answer a proper and competent question propounded to him by a select committee of this House, in pursuance of the authority conferred by the House upon said committee.

Mr. STANTON. I have but a word or two to say in regard to the resolution. The House will understand from the statement which is made in the report in regard to the testimony that has already been taken, that so far the proof before the committee shows that of the $87,000 charged upon the books of Lawrence, Stone & Co., as having been expended in procuring the passage of the tariff of 1857, $58,000 have gone into the hands of Mr. Wolcott. That is the proof as it now exists before the committee. Upon the inquiry being propounded to Mr. Wolcott as to whether he received that sum, he answers that he received neither that nor any other sum for the purpose of influencing the action of Congress, but he peremptorily refuses to answer whether he received it for any purpose.

Now, sir, in the judgment of the committee, that question as to whether the payment to Mr. Wolcott, and the disbursement by him of that sum, was designed to influence the action of Congress, is a question of opinion, about which the committee, the House, and the country, might differ with Mr. Wolcott. We believe that it is indispensable, in order to ascertain whether the action of Congress was influenced by the disbursement of this sum or not, that we should know whether any portion of the money charged upon their books as having been disbursed for corrupt purposes, was so used; and that we have, therefore, a right to know how it was disbursed. That is the single, simple, and sole inquiry. The agent who, as the proof shows, was charged with the disbursement of a large proportion of that money, says that it was not disbursed for corrupt purposes, but he refuses to answer how it was disbursed, whether he received it at all, and to whom he paid it. The simple question for the House to determine is, whether the committee have a right to demand of this witness an answer as to the simple fact of the receipt of that money; whether he received it for any purpose, and if he received it, to whom, and for what purpose he paid it?

Now, I submit it as a legal proposition, that any court of justice has a right to know all the facts which may or may not tend to elucidate a question submitted to the court and jury. The question of the intention of the witness; the question of the object of the appropriation of money; the question as to whether the manner in which it was disbursed may have influenced properly or improperly the action of the House—these are not questions for the witness, but they are questions for the tribunal that is called upon to decide whether that disbursement was an honest or a dishonest disbursement. I submit to the House that if this committee cannot compel a witness to disclose any fact except such facts as, in his opinion tend to show that disbursement operated corruptly upon Congress, then the committee had better be disbanded at once. If this House is thrown upon the judgment of the parties to these transactions, upon their opinion as to what is criminal and what is not; as to what is a corrupt appropriation of money and what is an honest appropriation of it; why then there is an end of all investigations into corrupt practices in this House.

All that this committee ask, is that the House shall confer upon them power to know the facts in relation to this disbursement, that they may report to the House for its action their judgment as to whether the disbursement was corrupt, or whether it was honest. The witness may be right, or he may not be right. The committee may draw an erroneous inference, or a just inference, from the facts as they may be exhibited before them, but they want the facts which are within the knowledge of the witness.

Mr. Speaker, I will now ask for the reading of the act of Congress, passed at the last session, in regard to the duty of witnesses in making answers to the questions propounded to them, and in regard to the power of Congress, and committees of Congress, over witnesses called before them for the purpose of testifying. It will be remembered that, by that act, the common-law rule in relation to a witness having the right to protect himself from answering any interrogatory propounded to him, because his answer might tend to criminate him, disgrace him, or subject him to liabilities, was changed, and that the House have a right, under that act, to demand of the witness an answer to any question propounded to him material to the inquiry before them, without regard to its effect upon the civil or criminal rights of the witness. Upon the reading of the law, which is now in the hands of the Clerk, I have no further remarks to make. I submit the question upon this plain statement. There is a simple and distinct issue between the witness and the committee, as to whether he is bound to give an unqualified and categorical answer to the question whether he received this money or not. That is the whole question. It is suggested to me that I should call the previous question. This witness has had eminent counsel to advise him as to his rights in this matter, and I take it for granted that he has prepared himself, in the answer which he made to the committee, and which is now submitted to the House, to test the power of the House by an application to the courts.

I do not desire to precipitate any action upon the House that will not be sustained by the judicial tribunals, when they are called upon to decide the question. I ask the Clerk to read the law of the last session upon the question.

The Clerk read the law, as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That any person summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony, or to produce papers upon any matter before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, who shall wilfully make default, or who, appearing, shall refuse to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry in consideration before the House or committee by which he shall be examined, shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment as and for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and not less than one hundred dollars, and suffer imprisonment in the common jail not less than one month, nor more than twelve months."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person examined and testifying before either House of Congress, or any committee of either House, shall be held to answer criminally in any court of justice, or subject to any penalty or forfeiture, for any fact or act touching which he shall be required to testify before either House of Congress, or any committee of either House, as to which he shall have testified, whether before or after the date of this act; and that no statement made or paper produced by any witness before either House of Congress, or before any committee of either House, shall be competent testimony in any criminal proceeding against such witness in any court of justice; and no witness shall hereafter be allowed to refuse to testify to any fact or to produce any paper touching which he shall be examined by either House of Congress, or any committee of either House, for the reason that his testimony touching such fact or the production of such paper may tend to disgrace him, or otherwise render him infamous: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt any witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed by him in testifying as aforesaid."

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That when a witness shall fail to testify, as provided in the previous sections of this act, and the facts shall be reported to the House, it shall be the duty of the Speaker of the House or the President of the Senate to certify the fact, under the seal of the House or Senate, to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action."

Mr. PHILLIPS took the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] which I think will perhaps obviate the necessity of his addressing the House. We are called upon, it seems to me, to tread upon very delicate ground, and I do not think we ought to act precipitately. I rise, therefore, to suggest that, by general consent, the subject be passed by informally for to-day, until the answer of the witness shall have been printed, and each member may be able to know exactly the question propounded by the committee, and the answer given by the witness. I make this suggestion, which I hope will meet the approbation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the House, as I am sure it will conduce to the proper action of the House.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I differ very much from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in this matter. I think this is a question upon which the House should take prompt action. It is time the House should establish some rule of action upon this subject, by which it is to be governed. The House should either abandon these investigations, or compel the answers of reluctant witnesses. The fault, in my opinion, is partly in the committee themselves. I think they have been too indulgent. But I agree with the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] that it is time now for the House to act, and to make a refractory and contumacious witness disclose all he knows on the subject of inquiry. I can imagine no case of action more directly calling for the exercise of the authority of the House than the present. A committee of this House, clothed with the authority of the House, authorized to send for persons and papers, authorized to examine witnesses upon a matter affecting the character of members of the present or preceding Congress, ask this witness a question which can affect him in nothing. To be sure, it may be the first of a series of questions which may bring upon him consequences which, if his conduct has subjected him to it, ought to be brought upon him. But, sir, if you consider the question propounded in itself, it is eminently proper. I ask if there be any member of this House, whether lawyer or otherwise, who will stand up here and allow a witness to substitute his own judgment for that of those who are to judge from his testimony?

Mr. Speaker, how is the issue presented? The committee report here that they find the fact that there is charged upon the books of certain gentlemen $87,000, expended to procure legislation; that there are charges upon their books, if I rightly understand the report, of that sum having been paid in money, or in bills negotiable, to this witness.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. And the fact is established by other testimony, aside from the books of Lawrence, Stone & Co.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The fact is established by the books of Lawrence, Stone & Co., and by other evidence before the committee, which satisfies them, and that satisfies me, that this witness received fifty-seven thousand or fifty-eight thousand dollars of this money. With this state of facts the witness refuses to answer the question propounded him in reference to this money; and yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] suggests that we should postpone our action, to see whether or not there is not something to examine—whether or not there is something to hesitate about.

Sir, when these facts have been disclosed to the House, they leave no room for inquiry. It is the right and it is the duty of the House to clothe that committee with all the powers of the House, and to make that witness answer all their questions categorically, one by one, which may lead to the truth in the inquiry they are pursuing.

The committee propounded this question: "Did you at such a time receive such an amount of money, or bills negotiable?" The question, with the information before them, was one eminently proper. They are met with what? By an attempt, upon the part of the witness, to set up his opinion for theirs as to what were correct and what were improper appliances of this money. Now, sir, the members of that committee and the members of this House may differ as to what were proper and what improper uses for the money.

The committee ask whether he received the money, and he responds that he did not receive it for corrupt purposes. Sir, that is our right, and it is the committee's right to judge. We want the facts, and we can judge whether the purposes for which it was used were corrupt or not. What would be said to a witness in a court of justice, when he was asked if he received a sum of money, if he answered: "I did not receive any money for corrupt purposes?" The judge would say to him: "Did you receive the money? Answer that." If he answers, "I did;" then, "For what purpose did you receive it?" would be the next inquiry. "What did you do with it?" Then, knowing that he received it, knowing what took place when he received it, the court would learn what he did with it. If that did not enable the committee to ascertain the truth of the charge that it was for a corrupt purpose, it would do what is a legitimate thing—it would turn them to others by whom this corrupt purpose could be ascertained if it existed. There can be no doubt about that.

My purpose in rising was not so much to vindicate the action of the committee, which needs no defense from me, as to remind the House that there is something due to its own dignity. There is hardly a case of investigation where some witness does not attempt to make a hero of himself, and a martyr sometimes. These cases of contumacy are repeated, and are growing more and more frequent. Why? Because we encourage them. If contumacious witnesses were treated as they ought to be, we would have few of them hereafter. If the committee will pardon me for saying it, if, instead of indulging this gentleman, they had called upon him to give an answer to the question, and refused to receive any that was not, in their judgment, an answer, the example would have been worth something.

The question now is, whether we shall abandon this inquiry? We might as well abandon it as only partially to carry it on. Shall the inquiry be abandoned, or shall this witness, who is proved to have received money, be made to testify before this House to the facts which he alone knows?

Mr. SEWARD. As I desire to be enlightened on this subject, and especially on the law of the case, I would inquire whether the witness has not expressly stated that he never received any money, to be used either directly or indirectly to control the legislation of Congress?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have already stated that the witness has substituted his own judgment for the judgment of the committee. We are the judge of that.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the gentleman if that is an opinion? It is not an opinion of the witness. The only question arising, if the money has been traced to his hands, is this: if the witness has committed perjury, he is then liable to be indicted; but, sir, he has sworn unequivocally that he never used any of that money, directly or indirectly, to affect the legislation of this House. That is not an opinion. It is true that, in answer to a preceding question, the witness stated he never used any money for corrupt purposes. That was an opinion; but, when he declared under oath, that he never used any money, directly or indirectly, to control the legislation of the country, that was a fact; and if the money be traced to his hands, and he received the money for that purpose, then, having denied it, he could be indicted for perjury.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I differ with the gentleman. That is as much an opinion as the other. Let him tell us how he used the money, and then we can tell whether it was for a corrupt purpose or not. He has no right to say that he did not use it to control the legislation of the country; that he did not use it directly or indirectly for that purpose. What did he get that money for? Did he get it from Lawrence, Stone & Co.? What did he get it for? To whom did he pay it? Perhaps he would have told to whom he did pay it, and who did use it directly for the purpose charged in this inquiry.

Mr. SEWARD. I put the question to the gentleman in this shape: Suppose he was upon the bench adjudicating a case, and a question was propounded to a witness in relation to a matter which did not affect the merits of the case; would he compel the witness to answer? A court would judge of that point, and that is what this House is going to do now. And, sir, a committee created by authority of this House has not a right to ask a witness a question on other matters than those confided to them to be investigated. The witness has some rights as well as the House; and I lay it down as a proposition which cannot be denied, that neither this House nor any court has the right to go into the private affairs of witnesses unless the transaction relates to the business the court or House has under investigation. It is so with a court, and this House should be governed by the same rules.

Mr. PHILLIPS. There can be no real difficulty about this question. I would say to the gentleman from Georgia, that no judge, and no committee, would make or sustain any inquiry that was not pertinent to the matter before them. But of the pertinency of the question the House is the judge. Did the gentleman ever hear of a witness attempting to judge that? I ask the gentleman to answer.

Mr. SEWARD. I never did. I understand that, leaving the committee, he has come here to the proper tribunal to decide the question. I do not understand that the committee is competent to decide the question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If it is competent for the committee to inquire whether money or other means were used for the purpose in influencing the legislation of Congress, the proceeding must be carried on as such examinations are made before courts. They must do it as they say lawyers get to Heaven—by degrees. They must ask one question at a time. They must begin and ask: "Did you get the money from these people? There has been a charge that certain persons expended money to procure the passage of certain legislation. There is, at least, foundation for the charge, as I am told, in testimony already taken, and in the books. This gentleman is represented to have received the money. The first question is, 'Did you receive the money?'" I apprehend the gentleman will find no instance to the contrary, that because the witness thinks it is his private business, he can arrest an investigation. Where would this thing end?

Mr. SEWARD. I do not deny that the private business of the gentleman can be inquired into, if that is under adjudication. I take it that the gentleman has answered, in fact, that he did get some money from Lawrence, Stone & Co. The question was never propounded to him what he did with it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask that it be read. I have never heard it. He said that he never used any money, directly or indirectly, to control the legislation of Congress.

Mr. PURVIANCE. The question stated by the gentleman was asked.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the record to be read. The committee has never asked the witness what he did with the money.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The question asked by the committee was, whether he ever received the money with which he appears charged upon the books? I beg to remind the gentleman that that was the question asked—whether he received this sum of money—whether he received these two particular sums of $24,000 and $33,000? If he did receive them, there is a manly way of answering. There is a truthful way of answering.

I differ with the gentleman from Georgia, who says that the witness has already admitted its receipt. He admits it with an equivocation. He does not admit it in such a way that, if it is not true, it could be the ground of an indictment for perjury. The question propounded was, "Did you receive these two sums?" The answer is, "I never received them for a corrupt purpose; I never received them for the purpose of influencing legislation." It by no means follows that he received them at all. That is not a fair inference to be drawn. On the contrary, the witness denies that this House shall draw that inference; for he undertakes to tell the House, through its committee, that we have no right to make an inquiry whether he received it absolutely, and that the only inquiry we have the right to make is the one to which he has limited his answer.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I wish, in the first place, to correct a misrepresentation under which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] labors. The witness absolutely refuses to answer whether he received the money; and, as a matter of course, refusing to answer that question, in the first instance, it would be idle to ask him the second question: "What did you do with it?" And yet, sir, in the course of the examination, the witness was asked that question in that way, and he turned to the committee and said: "I have not yet told the committee that I have received a single dollar." Now, it appears from the evidence before the committee that the sum of $58,000 was paid over into the hands of this man; and that it was paid into his hands for a corrupt purpose, is believed from the testimony of the witness who paid it. The witness refuses to answer whether he received the money. The committee say they have a right to the answer; and I think it will be obvious to the House, at once, that we have a right to the answer, because, if he answers that he did receive the sum of $58,000, but disclaims having made any application of it for a corrupt purpose, that may be consistent with the truth; and yet the $58,000 may have been applied for a corrupt purpose, for he may have paid it to A, B, C, and D, without reference to the mode and manner of its application. We have a right to have answers to these questions: First, "Did you receive the money?" Second, "If you did receive it, did you disburse any portion of it?" And third, "If you did disburse any portion of it, to whom did you disburse it?" If he says he disbursed a portion of it, we have a right to the names of the parties to whom he disbursed it, for the reason that we can subpoena those parties, and question them, and they may, perhaps, be the very parties who made the corrupt application of the money; so that, in any point of view, I think that this witness stands in a contumacious attitude towards the committee, and towards the House.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Let us have the answer read.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The answer is equivocal from beginning to end.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask permission to interpose a motion to have the report printed and postponed to some hour to-morrow, so that we can have it before us, and can understand it better than is possible from merely hearing it read.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not yield for that purpose, but I will allow the question and answer to be read.

The Clerk read the question and answer as follows:

"Question. Did you receive from the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co., some time in March last, a sum of securities or money of the amount of $30,000, more or less?"

"Answer. I did not, in March last, nor at any other time, receive from Lawrence, Stone & Co., any money or securities of any amount, for the purpose of influencing, or to be used in influencing, directly or indirectly, the action or vote of any member or officer of the present or the last Congress upon the tariff or any other act or measure considered by Congress, or before it, or contemplated to be before it; nor did I ever pay, or promise to pay, directly or indirectly, any money or pecuniary consideration to any officer or member of any Congress for his vote or services in the passage of, or to influence his action in relation to, the tariff or any other law; nor did I ever give any money or securities to any person for the purpose of being paid to any officer or member of Congress for his vote or influence, directly or indirectly, upon any act under the consideration of Congress, nor have I any knowledge that any such act or thing was done by any other person."

Mr. PHILLIPS. That answer is as equivocal as it possibly could be made. He denies having paid any money, or given any pecuniary consideration, and he limits his answer to that. He denies the receipt of money for corrupt purposes, and then goes on to say that he did not pay away any money, or give any pecuniary consideration; and then he again uses the word "money," and, I think, "securities."

Mr. STANTON. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will find that he peremptorily declines to give a direct answer to the question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I was coming to that. He says:

"Nor did I ever pay, or promise to pay, directly or indirectly, any money or pecuniary consideration to any officer or member of any Congress, for his vote or services in the passage of, or to influence his action in relation to, the tariff or any other law; nor did I ever give any money or securities to any person," &c.

Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] argued just now that, when he said he did not receive the money for that purpose, it was a fair innuendo that he did receive it for some other purpose. I do not think the gentleman's inference is well founded; but it is just as fair an inference from that answer that he gave some consideration other than a pecuniary consideration. But the witness goes on to say to the committee what I think is most contumacious of all. He says:

"I am advised by my counsel, Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and James M. Keith, whose opinion I have obtained since the present question was propounded to me, that the above answer is a full answer to everything which such a question may involve, falling under the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives, touching the inquiry which the committee are constituted, and could only be constituted, to investigate."

Now, I have never known an instance in which a witness has endeavored more to evade the force of the inquiry, or been more contumacious, than the present one. And the question with me is, whether this committee shall be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, or whether the witness shall be properly dealt with as a contumacious witness—not, as I said before, made a hero or a martyr, but when brought to the bar, treated, as a contumacious witness ought to be treated, and not allowed, as has been too much the practice, to deliver to the House a harangue or homily upon the duties of members of the House. As I said before, I almost blame the committee for indulging the witness to this extent. The time has come, now that we have so many investigating committees around us, when the House should exert all the authority possible for the purpose of making witnesses answer directly and fully all inquiries.

A word now as to the inquiry. The question asked the witness was: "Did you receive this money?" If he did not receive it for any improper purpose, he could have answered "yes." Then would have followed the inquiry as to why and how he received it; then as to whether he used intermediate agents; and then as to his own imputation—I mean the imputation conveyed by his own evasive answer—to find out whether some consideration, even if it was not pecuniary, whether some inducement, whether some temptation, if it was not a consideration or inducement, was ever held out to any one in authority to procure the passage of the law.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the action of the House will not be delayed; that the witness will be brought to the bar of the House at once, and the matter disposed of before we adjourn. We encourage these things. Each successive attempt seems to bring on new ones. If this case is dealt with as it ought to be, properly, sharply, and promptly by the House, by making the witness answer, or subjecting him to pains and penalties if he refuses to testify, and handing him over to the authorities, under the act of last session, depend upon it we shall not be troubled again in this way.

Mr. REAGAN. The question propounded by the committee is clearly a legal and proper question. Did the witness give a legal answer? He had no legal privilege to refuse to answer the question; but, in order to excuse himself for refusing to answer it, he goes on to answer a series of questions never propounded by the committee. If the witness desires to rely upon the ground that he might criminate himself by his answer to the question propounded, let him make that point. But he does not attempt to do it. He refuses to answer a legal question propounded by the committee, and goes on to give answers in response to questions never propounded by the committee, thereby treating that committee and this House with contempt. I trust this House will not indulge any such captiousness by deferring this matter until to-morrow. I call the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. REAGAN. I will withdraw it, at the request of the gentleman.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will not detain the House for more than a moment. Mr. Speaker, the issue has been fairly tendered by the witness who has been summoned before this committee of the House as to its powers. He has tendered it under the advice of counsel. He has declined answering categorically a plain, direct question; and it is now for this House to determine whether under these circumstances it will accept the issue and enforce its authority.

Under these circumstances I think it is unwise, nay, more, it is undignified for this House to delay. I think the time has arrived when we are to assert the power of the law. I think the time has arrived when we cannot with honor to ourselves, when we cannot without disgrace, declare that we will not meet the issue, or that we will postpone it. It seems to me that we have hardly yet arrived at the true point in issue between the House and the witness. There are two exigent cases provided for in the law. In either of these it becomes the duty of the Speaker to enforce certain acts. In either of them it is devolved upon the House to vindicate its authority. The one, is where a witness refuses to appear before the committee. The other is, where, having appeared, he refuses to answer. In this case the witness appeared; and the question is, whether, from the report of this committee, he has refused to answer a proper question. Nay, I may say more. It is immaterial whether the question be proper or improper. It is a question propounded under the authority of the House by a committee acting as its instrument, and it is not for gentlemen to take their positions that the question was an improper one.

But to pass from that point; the question is clearly a proper one, notwithstanding the fact that the witness is informed by his counsel that the question is not pertinent to the matter in inquiry before the committee, or within the scope of the authority of the House.

But there is another act of contumaciousness which clearly places him in the contempt of the House, and which is worthy of our serious consideration. Has there been here a refusal upon the part of this witness to answer the question propounded by the committee, under authority of the House? If we can only answer the question in the affirmative, then the witness should be summoned, and dealt with by the authority of the House. Now, then, what is the question propounded? It is, whether he has received a certain sum, in money or securities? What is the answer? That he has not received that or any other sum for a specific purpose. Why, sir, it is an evasion. It is no answer of the question at all. Let me illustrate. Suppose, in one of the courts of law, the question is propounded to a witness: "Did you, on a certain day, receive of your neighbor a horse?" Answer: "I did not upon that day or any other day receive a horse of my neighbor, for the purpose of going from Washington to Georgetown." Is there any man of common sense who will pretend that is an answer to the question? It is not. A full, categorical answer to the question is yea or nay; and he who attaches a condition to his answer evades the question, and in every tribunal would be held as refusing to answer, especially when the witness declines to answer in any other way, and is held to be a contumacious witness.

Now, sir, there is the issue. It is full, well defined, naked. Gentlemen cannot close their eyes to it. And if it is thus presented, and if it is presented to us with care, and under the advice of counsel, with deliberation, under which the authority of this House is not only doubted, but scorned, there is no position which this House can take except to accept the issue, and bring the witness before us under the allegation for contempt.

Mr. SEWARD. I know nothing about this witness, and care but very little; but the law ought to be respected in this matter. If we have got arbitrary power here, that is no reason why we should exercise it. Now, sir, what is the issue to be tried before this House? It has been charged that the legislation of Congress has been corrupted by the improper use of money. That is the issue. That is the record, and I hold gentlemen up to it. Analogizing this case to an indictment where an individual is charged with stealing property, or with the commission of any other crime, I put it to legal gentlemen upon this floor, whether they can travel out of the record and compel witnesses to relate facts outside of the indictment upon which the issue is made up and is to be tried?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. The evidence is never put into the bill of indictment.

Mr. SEWARD. It never is; but your proofs must correspond with the allegations. That is the law. Now, I deny that this witness is in contempt of the authority of this House in this stage of the proceedings. He had a right to say to the committee, when they put questions to him, "I think your questions are improper, and I deny your authority to compel me to answer them. You have no right to compel me to disclose facts connected with my private transactions in life. I will go before the House of Representatives, and will there present my legal rights." Is there any contempt in that? Is there anything which should subject this witness to reproach?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the gentleman whether this witness sets up any such defense as not recognizing the authority of the committee? Or, rather, does not he assert, in the broadest language, that this is all the answer he is willing to give, under any circumstances, to the question?

Mr. SEWARD. I do not understand the witness to say any such thing. He says what is right, and what every man in the country has a right to say. He says to the committee, "I deny your right to propound the question;" and then what? He had no power to bring it before the House. The presumption was that the committee would come to the House, and ask its opinion on the subject, and when the House decides the question on proper legal principles, that the witness shall answer this question, I undertake to say then that the witness will answer it.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Speaking of the record in this case, I would inquire of the gentleman from Georgia whether, in the first place, the House did not raise the committee upon a statement derived from the books of Lawrence, Stone & Co., that $87,000 had been expended to influence legislation of Congress? and whether, in the course of the investigation of the committee, it does not appear by other evidence than the evidence of the witness in this case, that a large portion of that money passed into the hands of the witness himself? Now I desire to know of the gentleman whether he thinks that the witness, standing in such circumstances, can avoid and evade all further answer? Must we be satisfied with the answer that he does not know whether it was expended directly or indirectly to influence legislation? I ask him whether, as a lawyer, or a judge, or as a member of this House, he will not hold it to be the right and duty of the House and the committee to require him to say how it was expended by him, in order that the House or the committee may call upon the other persons into whose hands it may have passed, and still another, and still another, until at last they find how it was expended?

Mr. SEWARD. Upon the case made up by the gentleman in his speech—

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. It is according to the facts.

Mr. SEWARD. It is not. It is not the record; and I will show the gentleman that it is not.

"Did you receive from the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co., sometime in March last, a sum of securities or money of the amount of $30,000, more or less?"

That is the question. The answer is:

"I did not, in March last, nor at any other time, receive from Lawrence, Stone & Co. any money or securities of any amount, for the purpose of influencing, or to be used in influencing, directly or indirectly, the action or vote of any member or officer of the present or the last Congress, upon the tariff or any other act or measure considered by Congress or before it, or contemplated to be before it. Nor did I ever pay or promise to pay, directly or indirectly, any money or pecuniary consideration to any officer or member of any Congress for his vote or services in the passage of, or to influence his action in relation to, the tariff or any other law. Nor did I ever give any money or securities to any person for the purpose of being paid to any officer or member of Congress for his vote or influence, directly or indirectly, upon any act under the consideration of Congress. Nor have I any knowledge that any such act or thing was done by any other person."

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. Does the gentleman regard that as an answer to the question?

Mr. SEWARD. I do not consider it an answer to the question whether he received $30,000 from these parties or not. I say it is not an answer.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. Then is not the House entitled to a direct answer to the question?

Mr. SEWARD. I say that when the witness informed the committee that whatever money he received related to a private transaction, they had no right to make him disclose that private transaction. He denied that it had any reference to the matter which was being tried by the committee, on the record made up by the resolution referring this whole subject to the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman upon what legal principles he excuses the witness from answering as to what disposition he made of this money?

Mr. SEWARD. I will answer that; that question was never propounded to him, what he did with the money?

Mr. PURVIANCE. I will tell the gentleman for the second time, as a member of the committee reporting the pending resolution, that the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. SEWARD. Then if I am mistaken, I am mistaken because the record does not enlighten me. I ask the gentleman to show it to me. I am trying this matter upon legal principles, and upon the record made here by the committee, and upon which they ask the judgment of the House.

Mr. MOORE. I desire to explain in regard to the examination of this witness before the committee. The gentleman from Georgia is clearly under a mistake. When the witness was asked whether he received this money, he refused to answer the question.

Mr. SEWARD. I cannot yield any further. I cannot go back into the committee room to inquire what transpired there.

Mr. MOORE. Then you must not make the charges. You do not give the members of the committee time to make an explanation of the matter.

Mr. SEWARD. I will take the explanation that is upon the record. It is upon that we are called to decide. I say that if the record shows that the question had been propounded, "What did you do with the money?" and the witness had refused to answer, then I should have insisted upon exerting the full authority of the House.

Mr. PURVIANCE. The answer of the witness was, that he had not yet said that he received any money.

Mr. SEWARD. That may have happened in the committee room. I do not know about it. I hope the committee, for the purpose of enlightening us, will complete the record, that we may have the whole case before us, and not have it made up of statements first of one and then of another. We are trying the legal right of the House, not to punish a witness for contempt, for contempt will only attach to a witness that shall have disputed the orders of the House. When the House shall decide the question, whatever may be that decision, right or wrong, if the witness does not stand up to it I am for imprisoning him.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to call the gentleman's attention, and the attention of the House, to the answers of the witness to three different questions propounded by the committee, which the gentleman seems to have entirely overlooked in the course of his remarks:

"Question.—Did you receive any securities of any kind during the month of March last, to the amount of $30,000 at one time?"

"Answer.—Not for any purpose of that sort."

Implying that he had received the sum of $30,000.

Mr. SEWARD. I said before I got the floor to make my speech that the witness had impliedly acknowledged he received $30,000; but he denied that he received it for the purpose of corrupting the legislation of Congress—the very matter which the committee had invited the attention of the witness to.

Mr. CLEMENS. Here are other questions:

"Did you ever for any purpose?"

"What does the witness say? His answer is:

"Well, that would be a matter of strictly private business."

Mr. SEWARD. I say so too. I will defend the witness in that. I will say that the committee never had the right to ask the witness whether he received money for any purpose.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me a word. Suppose this case: that the witness received from Lawrence, Stone & Co., $30,000 without a word being said as to the purpose for which it was given, and handed it over to a third person in the same manner, who used it corruptly. In such a case, if the committee must be satisfied with the answer that witness did not receive or pay over with corrupt purpose, I ask the gentleman from Georgia how he would ever get at the truth? Would he excuse the man for not answering under such circumstances?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; I would not. But I should say it would be a very fruitless act of generosity to hand over to any gentleman $30,000 for no specified purpose, especially in these hard times.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. That may be; but it is doubtless often done in such cases.

Mr. SEWARD. But this witness denies that any money was used by him, or by any other person, for the purpose of corrupting any member or officer of the House.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. That he knows of.

Mr. SEWARD. That he knows of, of course. I presume you do not want the witness to state things which are beyond his knowledge. I say that the witness has disclosed every fact which would go to show that he had received money for a corrupt purpose, or in any shape, manner, or form, to buy votes, to influence members, or to control the action of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I merely wish to say, that I think that the question put by the committee was a very proper one; that the witness is in contempt in refusing to answer it; and that he ought to be made to answer it. I thought, from the remarks of my colleague, that the resolution contemplated the immediate imprisonment of the witness. I would not go that far; but I think he ought to be brought to the bar of the House.

Mr. SEWARD. It does contemplate immediate imprisonment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. No, sir; it only contemplates that he shall be arrested and brought to the bar of the House to answer.

Mr. SEWARD. That is imprisonment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is arrest, but not exactly imprisonment. It seems to me to be perfectly right that the witness should tell whether he got any money from Lawrence, Stone & Co.; and if so, what he did with it. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I will inform my colleague that the record does not show that the question was ever put to the witness what he did with the money.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I know that; but he does not answer the question whether he got it or not. I maintain that he is bound to say, and that we should require him to say, whether he got it; and then, if he did get it, what he did with it.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to have the resolution under which the committee was appointed read, so that the whole subject may be before the House.

[Cries of "No, no!" and "Object!"]

Mr. BOWIE. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think enough has been said upon this subject, and I insist on the previous question.

Mr. MOORE. I desire, with the leave of the gentleman from Georgia, to say a few words.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Well, I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MOORE. I will renew it, and I will occupy the time of the House for but a few minutes.

Mr. BOWIE. I believe I have the floor if the gentleman from Georgia withdraws the previous question; and I object to his farming it out to any one else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that if the previous question is withdrawn absolutely by the gentleman from Georgia, the gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have withdrawn it.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as a grave question. It involves, in fact, the rights—the private rights—of every citizen of this Republic. We are now called on to enforce the sovereign power of this House against a citizen who claims as against it his private rights; and I am for considering considerably the question of power between the sovereign and the subject. A citizen is brought up here before this House as the grand inquest of the nation, the great grand jury, in the exercise of a criminal jurisdiction; and is called on to answer certain questions. That you have a general inquisitorial power, under the Constitution of the United States, in regard to offenses against this House, no man can deny; and to that extent, and to that extent only, have you any jurisdiction whatever. It is said that a contempt of this House has been committed by a contumacious witness. One exercise of that power, which is given to you by the Constitution of the United States, is to preserve your order and to punish offenses committed in the presence of the House, or the misbehavior of members. Whence is the power derived? What is the power at last? What is its nature? It is, simply, and nothing more nor less, than that power which belongs to the Parliament of England, and has been transplanted to our soil. It is the law of all public bodies. It is the necessary law, incorporated into our Constitution—the law of self-defense, simply, and nothing more. You have power to protect your majesty, if you choose to call it majesty. You have power to protect and defend yourselves against disorder of every kind, and against violence of every kind. It is but the law of nature, the law of necessity, incorporated into the parliamentary law of England, and thus transplanted to our soil.

But if you attempt to go beyond that, you become usurpers and tyrants. You dare not go beyond that. Power is given to you to the whole extent of the purpose for which it is given. You propose to punish a man now for contumacy, for contempt of this House because he does not choose to answer a certain question. I assure you that upon every principle of common law his answers given to the committee of this House have purged him of contempt and you have no right whatever to pursue this subject any further.

"Question. Had you any funds placed in your hands, belonging to any of the manufacturers in Massachusetts, for the purpose of influencing members of Congress upon the passage of the tariff act?"

"Answer. I had not.

"Answer. I was not.

"Question. Did you, after the close of the last session of Congress, receive from the manufacturers, either in Boston or elsewhere, any funds, money, negotiable securities, or anything of that sort, to be used in that way?"

"Answer. No, sir.

"Question. Did you at any time during the months of March or April, 1857, receive from Mr. Stone any negotiable securities, or money, or credits of any kind?"

"Answer. Never. Never for any such purpose as that, either directly or indirectly.

"Question. Did you receive at any time in the early part of March a considerable sum of securities for any purpose?"

"Answer. Never, for any purpose connected with the tariff, either to be paid to members of Congress, for the purpose of influencing their action, or to be paid to their agents.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 44.

"Question. Nor for their benefit?"

"Answer. Nor for their benefit, either directly or indirectly."

"Question. Nor in satisfaction of previous arrangements or promises?"

"Answer. Nor in satisfaction of previous arrangements or promises."

Now, in the question and answer which follow, I say there is an admission, by implication, that he did receive money:

"Question. Did you receive any securities at any time during the month of March last, to the amount of $30,000, at one time?"

"Answer. Not for any purpose of that sort."

Now comes up the rights of the individual; now comes up the question between the Congress of the United States and the individual citizen of this country, as to their respective rights:

"Question. Did you ever for any purpose?"

"Answer. Well, that would be a matter of strictly private business; I did not for the purpose of influencing members of Congress, or their agents."

Having acknowledged that he did receive this $30,000, and having denied that it had been, in any form or shape, either directly or indirectly, used for the purpose of influencing the legislation of Congress upon the tariff, or upon any other subject before Congress—having denied that it had any connection with the Federal Government, it was all the answer you could require of him.

Now, sir, I do not know whether this gentleman is a lawyer or a physician. I do not know whether he comes within the pale of privileges. I do not know whether he has professional pretensions or not; but I tell you that there is a law equal to the common-law—the law of honor, sir, of honesty and justice—a law which gives every man the right to take care of himself. If he has trespassed upon the criminal law, he is answerable to that. If he has made obligations which he has not discharged, the law will require him to discharge them. But that there is any process of law by which a man may be compelled to disclose his own private relations, I will even deny.

Mr. Speaker, when upon oath this witness purges himself of contempt, your jurisdiction is gone; you cannot lay your hands upon him; you have no more power than the courts of law have. The power which you can exercise is a legal one, and you cannot make it more. If you compel him to answer further than he has answered, it would be tyranny. This committee was instituted for the purpose of investigating fraud. So conscious am I of my own integrity that I am slow to charge fraud upon others. Men are ruled by their dispositions. Some are well disposed, and some are evil disposed. The spirit of good and the spirit of evil rules the world. [Laughter.] I choose to belong to the spirit of good. [Laughter.] That very spirit of good would make me hate vice, fraud, and crime, in every shape.

It has got to be a sort of fashion here to get up investigating committees on every subject. We have had investigating committees on our own members and our own officers. The other day an investigating committee was appointed on the late Doorkeeper. Now one has been appointed on the present Doorkeeper. It is a Rowland for an Oliver. [Laughter.] You have an investigating committee on the late Clerk, and I have not the least doubt that Mr. Allen may look out for an investigating committee upon him. [Laughter.] We have in consequence these sort of scenes—that side of the House is arrayed against this, and this against that. What is the effect? It is anything but creditable, and ought not gentlemen to be ashamed of themselves, when we come to look at the matter in serious soberness? [Laughter.]

Now, for the lack of something better to do, we must have a poor, unfortunate devil brought here, and the alternative presented to him either to divulge his private business or to go into imprisonment. He must tell about $30,000 received from Lawrence, Stone & Co., when, by his answer, as every lawyer must know, he has ousted this House from propounding any further interrogatory. He has purged himself of contempt. The jurisdiction to which he was confined was the fraud and bribery and corruption of members and of outside persons in regard to the legislation of Congress; and when he declares, on his oath, that no money he ever received was intended to be applied to such a purpose, then the jurisdiction of the House ceases. That is the principle in reference to every court at common law. It is the principle in reference to every tribunal where justice is attempted to be enforced. You propose to go further. The chairman of a committee puts his opinion against the opinion of a contemptuous witness. The witness does not disclaim, as I understand, that he received the money; but he does disclaim that he received it for any purpose connected with the jurisdiction of the House. What would you think of a court which, when a man was brought before it, would not listen to his affidavit and sworn protest? Is this House to say to this witness, "We have had a spite against you, and we must satisfy it?"

My friend from Ohio wishes to incarcerate this man because he has declined to answer questions concerning his own private business, and unconnected with the jurisdiction and the purposes of the investigation instituted by this House. It will not do for gentlemen to say that the witness has put his opinion against the opinion of the House; but in such a case he has the right to do so. If we were to compel a man, who has fairly answered all questions within the jurisdiction of the law, to divulge sacred matters of private business and confidential relations of the strictest character, then, indeed, we would be deserving of the scorn and contempt and anathema of every honest and patriotic citizen.

Mr. MOORE obtained the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman yield to me, that I may send up an amendment to be read for information?

Mr. MOORE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HUGHES's amendment was read, as follows: Whereas, John W. Wolcott, a witness duly summoned before a select committee of this House, has appeared before said committee, and refused to answer and testify concerning matters pending before said committee: Therefore, Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be requested to certify the facts to the proper district attorney of the United States, according to the statute in such case provided.

Mr. MOORE. I know that the House must be already fatigued—

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama whether he gives way for the purpose of having that amendment offered?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; merely to allow it to be read.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman will not allow it to be offered as an amendment.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] asked several times why it was that the committee had not asked the witness what he did with the money? Again and again was the witness asked whether he received the money; and no direct response was given to that question; and it will be seen from the report that again and again he answered it evasively. When he was asked whether he had received the money which we had traced to his hands, he answered that he had received it for no such purpose as to influence the legislation of Congress. But the direct question whether he received the money, traced to his hands by other testimony, he directly and positively refused to answer. I cannot believe that there is a member on this floor who will hesitate for a moment to come to the conclusion that this question was a pertinent, legal, and proper question. If he answered in the affirmative, the question would be followed by other questions. But unless this question be answered, the committee might as well suspend any further attempt or effort to elicit truth in this case, or to ferret out fraud, if fraud there be.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Alabama, that this was a proper question, and that the answer of the witness was not only an evasion but a volunteer statement. But I wish to inquire whether the witness did not distinctly refuse to answer the question?

Mr. MOORE. Most positively he did. He came in this morning with a written plea, in which he steadily refuses to answer, denying the pertinency of the question, and claiming that it was an inquiry into his private affairs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not a member on this floor, acquainted with the simplest rules of evidence in courts of law, who does not know that this furnishes no excuse. It is no excuse for a witness who refuses to answer a question to say that he cannot do so without betraying private confidence, or that it relates to his social transactions, as this witness says the questions propounded to him does. Even in a criminal case it is no excuse for a witness who refuses to answer to say that the question relates to a communication made to him in confidence.

This has been decided over and over again, and is laid down in all the elementary works. And I say, then, that unless it is the will of the House to clothe the committee with all legal power to ferret out this matter and to bring to light this fraudulent transaction, if there be a fraud, it should repeal the resolution under which the committee acts, and close the investigation here. I say, for one, Mr. Speaker, that unless the House sustains the committee in its efforts to bring to light these transactions, I shall ask to be excused from serving any longer as a member of the committee. It is an unpleasant position, at best. I will say for the rest of the committee as for myself, that we have endeavored diligently to bring the matter to light, considering it due to the reputation of the House, and due to the country, that this transaction, so publicly brought to view, should be investigated and the truth elicited. And I ask that, if the committee be not sustained in its efforts, I may be excused from further service on that committee, and some other member put in my place. I would suggest the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] as my successor. But, believing that this House will sustain the action of the committee in the course it has thus far taken, and believing that the House has already grown weary of the subject, I move the previous question.

Mr. SICKLES. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am very anxious that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] may have an opportunity of submitting his amendment to the House. Let it be submitted, and then let us have the previous question.

Mr. MOORE. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SICKLES. Then I offer the following amendment:

Resolved, That the witness be again subpoenaed to appear before the committee, and that the interrogatory in question be again propounded to him by the committee, and if he shall not then answer the same directly and fully, that the Speaker, on the report of said committee to that effect, issue his warrant for the arrest of the witness, and that he forthwith be brought before the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt.

Mr. GOOCH took the floor.

Mr. MOORE. The witness has been already indulged for three days, and still he persists in not answering the question. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama as withdrawing the demand for the previous question, and recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GOOCH. I do not desire at this moment to discuss the propriety of the question propounded to the witness, or the sufficiency of the answer. It seems to me that the proceedings which we have already had on this question fully demonstrate to us that we are not at this moment prepared to decide it. It is a question which, if we decide at all, we are to decide as judges, and we can only decide it with a full knowledge of all the facts. Now, I would ask if there is any man in the House who can say that he has fully considered the answer given by the witness, and that he is prepared to pronounce it insufficient?

Mr. FLORENCE. I say it.

Mr. GOOCH. How can any member who has only heard the answer read once or twice by the Clerk, be prepared to pass on every part and portion of it? Is it to be presumed that a majority of the House are prepared to say that they have fully considered the question, and are ready to pass upon it as judges? It seems to me that we are not in a condition to decide this question now, and that the matter should be postponed till some hour to-morrow, so that each member may have an opportunity of reading and fully considering the question and answer, and of deciding for himself as to the propriety of the one and the sufficiency of the other.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GOOCH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish simply to ask if there is a single member of this House who is not convinced that that answer is a mere shuffling evasion of the whole thing; and are we to postpone a matter so simple till to-morrow, and then spend another day in its discussion? If the witness received the $30,000, it is no great hardship for him to tell what he did with it.

Mr. GOOCH. I only yielded for an interrogatory, not for a speech. The gentleman from Illinois says it is a matter of slight consequence to the witness. I do not consider it a matter of slight consequence for a citizen to be arrested and brought before the bar of the House—and that, too, before the House has had full time to decide whether or not the question propounded is proper, or the answer that has been given sufficient.

I say that we, as judges, cannot decide the question as we should decide it, without a full knowledge of the facts.

It seems to me there is another question in connection with this matter. That question is this: Is it a contempt of this House for a witness to refuse to answer a question before a committee? It seems to me that, neither by parliamentary law nor by statute, is it a contempt of the House for a witness to refuse to answer a question propounded by a committee. It is the duty of the committee to report the matter to the House; and it is for the House to pass upon the propriety of the question and the sufficiency of the answer; and when the House shall have decided that the witness shall answer the question, or that the answer given is insufficient, then it is for the committee to call the witness again before it; and, if he again refuse to answer, after having been informed of the decision of the House, his refusal is a contempt of the House; and he should then be brought before the bar of the House, in order that he may there give the reason why he has not answered the question. The committee is in session at hours when the House is not in session; and, it seems to me, that the only safe rule which we can adopt is, that when a witness refuses to answer a question before a committee, the fact shall be reported to the House, and the House shall decide whether or not the question is a proper one. If the House decide that the question is a proper one, and the witness, on being again brought before the committee, still refuse to answer, then it is unquestionably a contempt of the House. But, it seems to me, there can be no contempt of the House before that. Can there be a contempt of a court of law, in refusing to answer a question, before the court itself has decided that the witness shall answer? Now, we, and not the committee, are the parties to determine this matter; and there can be no contempt of the House until the House shall have decided that question for itself.

Mr. BOWIE. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that the refusal of a witness to answer a question asked by a committee of the House is not a contempt of the House, because it is only a contempt of a committee? Does he not consider that a committee of this House is an emanation from the House, designated for useful purposes?

Mr. GOOCH. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Maryland by saying that I am informed by a gentleman near me that the House has decided that a refusal to answer a question asked by a committee is a contempt of the House. If it has been so decided, of course I yield to the decision. But if we were now to establish a precedent, if we were now to settle the question whether or not a refusal to answer questions asked by a committee is a contempt of the House, I should say that I hoped the House would not come to the decision suggested, but to the opposite decision. I believe in protecting the rights of citizens. I would not assume that the refusal of a witness to answer a question asked by a committee is a contempt of the House; because I think that the witness should have the right of appeal from the decision of the committee to the House. The witness may well say to the committee, "I refuse to answer your question; but if the House decide that it shall be answered, then I will bow to the decision, and will be ready to answer the question."

Mr. ADRAIN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to make a motion?

Mr. GOOCH. Yes, if it is a motion to adjourn. Mr. ADRAIN. It is perfectly apparent that the House is not ready to decide this question. I am not; the gentleman from Massachusetts is not; and he speaks for many on this floor. Therefore, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion, and let us dispose of this matter.

Mr. SEWARD called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GOOCH. I was saying that, if we were now to establish a precedent in this matter, we should give it such time and attention that we shall be willing hereafter to abide by the decision which we shall make in this case. I think that, if the matter were fully discussed and considered, it is more than probable that the House would come to the conclusion that we can decide this matter properly only by first taking up the question propounded by the committee, and considering whether it be proper or not; and if we come to the conclusion that the question is a proper one, then consider the answer which the witness has given; and if we decide that the answer is not sufficient, direct the witness, through the committee, to answer further; and, if he then refuse, bring him before the House to answer for his contempt.

It seems to me that we are in more danger of sacrificing the dignity of this House by moving hastily and inconsiderately in this matter, than we are by taking the time necessary for us duly to consider the question. When we have fully considered this question, we can then so decide it as to establish a precedent by which we shall be willing to abide. As I promised the gentleman from Alabama, I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered.

The question recurred upon the following amendment to the resolution of the committee:

Resolved, That the witness be again subpoenaed to appear before the committee, and that the interrogatory in question be again propounded to him by the committee; and if he shall not then answer the same directly and fully, that the Speaker, upon report of said committee to that effect, issue his warrant for the arrest of the witness, and that he be forthwith brought before the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I hope that will not pass.

Mr. STANTON. The witness has had time. He has consulted counsel. He has uniformly declined to answer the question.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider, be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Then, on motion of Mr. HALL, of Ohio, the House (at ten minutes past four o'clock) adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 12, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL REGISTER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

The SPEAKER reported to the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms made the following return, in reference to a resolution adopted yesterday:

In obedience to the written warrant, I arrested the within named John W. Wolcott at his lodgings in this city (at Willards' Hotel) this 11th day of February, 1858.

And now, February 12, 1858, I produce the within named John W. Wolcott in person, at the bar of the House of Representatives to answer as within ordered.

A. J. GLOSSBRENNER,

Sergeant-at-Arms, Ho. of Reps. U. S.

To Hon. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The warrant of the Speaker is as follows:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the United States.

To A. J. GLOSSBRENNER, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives:

You are hereby commanded to arrest John W. Wolcott whosoever he may be found, and have his body at the bar of the House forthwith, to answer as for a contempt in refusing to answer a proper and competent question propounded to him by a select committee of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the authority conferred by the House upon said committee.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 11th day of February, 1858.

JAMES L. ORR, Speaker.

Attest: J. C. ALLEN, Clerk.

Mr. STANTON. I move the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That John W. Wolcott be now arraigned at the bar of the House, and that the Speaker propound to him the following interrogatories:

Question. What excuse have you for refusing to answer the question propounded to you by the select committee of this House, before whom you were summoned to appear, as to whether you had received any sum of money from Lawrence, Stone & Co. sometime in March, 1857?

Question. Are you now ready to answer that, and all proper questions which may be propounded to you by that committee?

And that said John W. Wolcott be required to answer the same in writing, and under oath.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, the practice of the House in these cases is so well known, that there is no occasion for further discussion. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and the resolution, under the operation thereof, was adopted.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared before the bar of the House and announced, that in obedience to the order of the House, he presented John W. Wolcott in person.

The SPEAKER, (to Mr. Wolcott.) I have been instructed by the House of Representatives to propound to you certain interrogatories.

The Speaker then read the questions of the resolution just adopted.

The written answers of the witness were sworn to before the Speaker, and were read, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Representatives: I am in your presence, in obedience to an order of the House of yesterday, to answer for a contempt alleged to have been committed by me in declining to answer otherwise than I did a certain question propounded to me by your committee.

Assuring the House, as I do, in all sincerity, that I did not design, nor suppose that I could be thought guilty of, a contempt of the House or of its committee, I respectfully request of the House to give me time until Monday to purge myself of all alleged contempt, and to place my conduct in this particular fairly and fully before your honorable body. To do this I need the assistance of counsel; and the indisposition of my senior counsel, together with a pressing engagement in the Supreme Court of the United States, he has assured me will render it impossible for him to afford any professional aid this week.

I hope, as a citizen of our common country, never before charged with violating any law, and conscious of no intended offense to the House or its authority, and believing that I will be able to justify myself in the well-considered judgment of this House if the time asked is allowed me, that the indulgence now respectfully asked will be granted.

J. W. WOLCOTT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, February 12, 1858.

JAMES L. ORR, Speaker.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the witness have until one o'clock on Monday to make his answer to the interrogatories propounded, and that meantime he be recommitted to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and have the benefit of counsel in preparing his answers.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. It is, perhaps, an ungracious task to interpose objection to a request for delay, and they must certainly be very remarkable circumstances which would authorize or impel any gentleman to rise in his place to make such an objection. But under well-considered reflection upon the circumstances which surround this case, and those which have preceded the introduction of the witness here this morning, I cannot remain quiet without entering my protest against this delay. If there were reason for it, I should be among the first to comply with the request; but I see no such reason; on the contrary, the record displays good reason for opposition to the request. Questions have been propounded to the witness. There is yet no answer. A request is made for postponement, that a day may be given to the gentleman alleged to be in contempt, for answer and purgation; and the cause of that delay is, that his counsel, his senior counsel, is engaged in professional duties before the supreme tribunal of the United States. And yet the advice of that senior counsel was obtained and presented to us here yesterday; that advice was fully discussed; and in respect to its nature, the House deliberately came to the conclusion that there had been a contempt of its authority.

In this connection I may ask at the proper time that the answer of the witness, reported to us yesterday, be read again to the House. If I recollect aright—and I am sure that gentlemen do not forget what occurred then, or what is indited there—the witness stated that upon consultation and receiving advice from two gentlemen learned in the profession of the law, he was counseled that the question itself was not pertinent to the inquiry or within the scope of the authority of the House of Representatives. If this gentleman has taken that position—if he then proffered that issue to us which we then and there accepted, I ask what reason is there for any delay now, when it is requested by the gentleman to enable him to seek further advice in respect to the issue which he then and there proffered to us?

Now, if we are engaged in a transaction which is surrounded by dignity; if we are engaged in the pursuit of an alleged culprit; if we are determined to administer with caution, but with due severity and promptitude, the punishment proper for the offense committed, let us proceed in order; and I ask, therefore, of the House, that before voting on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, we may consider what is the position of the witness before us, and whether there is any propriety in granting him further time to review the position which he took yesterday, under the advice of that counsel of whose absence he now complains. I ask that his answer to the committee may be read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. Speaker, I concur generally in the views expressed by the gentleman from New York, on the question now presented for the consideration of this House; and in order that we may know precisely the issue presented for our determination, I desire to read that portion of the answer of the witness which was laid before the House yesterday. This question was propounded to the witness:

"Question. Did you receive from the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co., sometime in March last, a sum of securities or money, of the amount of $30,000, more or less?"

Now, what does the witness answer? He says:

"Answer. I did not, in March last, nor at any other time, receive from Lawrence, Stone & Co., any money or securities of any amount, for the purpose of influencing, or to be used in influencing, directly or indirectly, the action or vote of any member or officer of the present or the last Congress upon the tariff or any other act or measure considered by Congress, or before it, or contemplated to be before it; nor did I ever pay, or promise to pay, directly or indirectly, any money or pecuniary consideration to any officer or member of any Congress for his vote or services in the passage of, or to influence his action in relation to, the tariff or any other law; nor did I ever give any money or securities to any person for the purpose of being paid to any officer or member of Congress for his vote or influence, directly or indirectly, upon any act under the consideration of Congress; nor have I any knowledge that any such act or thing was done by any other person."

Now what does he still further say, sir?

"I am advised by my counsel, Messrs. Reverly Johnson and James M. Keith, whose opinion I have obtained since the present question was propounded to me, that the above answer is a full answer to everything which such a question may involve, falling under the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives, touching the inquiry which the committee are constituted, and could only be constituted, to investigate. And, acting under the same legal advice, I most respectfully submit that the question, in its present form, is not of itself 'pertinent' to the only inquiry which the House, in this instance, has a legal right to institute.

"If, acting under such a power, a committee of the House can compel a witness to answer such a question as this except by saying that he did not use at all, directly or indirectly, any money, coming from any quarter, to influence directly or indirectly the action or vote of any member of Congress, and that he has never paid any money to any one for such a purpose, and has no knowledge that any money was used for that purpose, or any other illegal purpose, regarding Congress, or any of its officers, I respectfully submit that it gives to the committee or the House the right to inquire into my private business and social relations, which, except so far as they may tend to prove the alleged improper influencing of members of Congress in some official duty, is as much beyond the jurisdiction of the House, and, of course, of the committee, as it would be beyond their power to investigate the private business and social relations of any other citizen, without such a charge or implication of corruption, or attempt to corrupt Congress or any of its members, having been made."

Now, sir, what is the issue which he presents to the House in that answer? Upon full consultation with his counsel, as he himself alleges, he prepared an answer which was reduced to writing and which I have read to the House. To-day, in order to purge himself of the contempt of which he says he is unconscious, he desires until next Monday to have still further benefit of the counsel of Messrs. Johnson and Keith, both of whom he had consulted before the obnoxious answer was given.

Is there any reason, under the facts presented, to give to this gentleman, until next Monday, time to deliberate upon a matter upon which he alone is in full possession of the information required? He is either guilty or not guilty of using this money for improper purposes. He acknowledges that he has received the money, as I understand his answer. He acceded indirectly to the charge that he had received $30,000 from Lawrence, Stone & Co. But when the question is put directly, whether he received the money, he evades the answer by saying that he received the money for no such purpose. Now that he did receive the $30,000, he indirectly admits in his answer, because he acknowledges that he did not receive it for the purpose as alleged by the committee; indirectly admitting that he had received that sum, but denying that he applied it or used it for the purpose which the committee was called upon to investigate.

Now, sir, he, under his answer as presented to the House, is the only competent person to lay the truth, as it is, before the committee. Why have the benefit of counsel when he had it before? Why have the benefit of Messrs. Johnson and Keith in order to chaffer about the phraseology to which he may reduce his answer? If he is not guilty, as he himself alleges, of having used this money in any manner, either directly or indirectly, for influencing legislation in Congress; if he does not know for what purpose it was used; if he stands before the House and country purged of all attempt directly or indirectly to influence the legislation of this House, or to influence the vote of any member of this House, or of the last Congress, why can he not come up and state so plainly, distinctly, directly, and honestly? Why have time to deliberate upon a matter in which the truth is only required to be told? If he did not intend to place himself in contempt of the House and its authority, it is very easy for him to go before the committee, and if he knows nothing about this money, how it was used, how he got it, or how he disposed of it, it is very easy to say so; but it is very remarkable that $30,000 could have come into his possession without his knowing why he received it, or without his retaining a single voucher in regard to its disposal, or knowing into whose hands it went. It has been proved, and virtually admitted by him, that $30,000 was paid by Lawrence, Stone & Co. into his hands. What disposition was made of it? If he has not disposed of it at all, but still retains it, that is a matter between Lawrence, Stone & Co. and himself to settle. But if he has paid it into the hands of some one, and does not know for what purpose, then it is the right of the committee to pursue that money into whosesoever hands it passed.

Under these circumstances, while I am willing to extend to this gentleman, and every other gentleman similarly circumstanced, every possible liberality and magnanimity, and while I am not disposed to use the power of this House against any man placed in its power, yet under all the facts of the case as they have been presented under the answer of Mr. Wolcott himself, it is perfectly competent for him to appear before the committee to-morrow and answer the question truthfully and magnanimously as a man; and to do that he does not require any consultation with his counsel, Messrs. Johnson and Keith.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I entirely agree with what appears to be the sense of the majority of the House, that the question propounded to this witness was a proper one, and that the committee were entitled to a direct and categorical answer thereto. The House yesterday pronounced that this witness was in contempt, and he has been arraigned this morning to answer to that charge. In this written answer, he applies to this House for time to purge himself from contempt until Monday next. He alleges, as a reason for asking this indulgence of the House, that one of his counsel is sick, and the other necessarily occupied in other professional engagements.

Now, sir, it appears to me that there is nothing unreasonable in this appeal to the House upon the part of this witness. There is no principle involved in granting this indulgence. My own judgment is clear that the question was a proper one, and that the House will feel itself called upon to compel him to answer the question directly. The position which the gentleman occupies is not an enviable or pleasant one. It is one of great embarrassment. He has been arrested here, charged with a grave offense against the House. Now, sir, shall we deny to him the advice of counsel—a right granted to every criminal arraigned before your judicial tribunals? The right to the advice of counsel is a constitutional right, guaranteed to every man throughout the region of the common law. It may be that both the witness and his counsel desire to reconsider this case, to reexamine this question, and to see whether or not the advice given to the witness on the previous occasion was safe and satisfactory. I am in favor, therefore, of allowing him this further time for the purpose of purging himself from the contempt under which he stands arraigned.

Mr. DAWES. This witness brought before the House, is a citizen of Massachusetts. I have never had the pleasure of seeing him before to-day, nor did I ever see or know any member of the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co. I am not here in his behalf, or in their behalf; nor am I here to interpose any obstacle to any investigation of the charges brought against the members of the last House, or of this House, or its officers. If any money, from any source, has been used to corrupt any man in high place, I will contribute what little aid is in my power to ferret it out. Sir, the question before the House is not whether the witness has answered truthfully or not, for if he has committed perjury, he is to answer for that to another tribunal.

The question before the House yesterday was, whether the committee had propounded to him a proper question; and also whether he had answered that question in full? We differed here yesterday about the record that the committee had made up. Some of us thought that he had not answered the question properly—that he had not answered it in full—that he had not admitted that he had received that money; while others of us were just as certain that he had admitted its receipt. I observe that members here differ this morning on that point. I observe that the chairman of the committee, when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] declared a moment ago that the witness had answered that he had received this money, shook his head, and said he had made no such answer. A record has been made here; and we cannot tell, from the record itself—we who are here called upon to pass as judges upon this question—whether he has answered in one way or the other. It is true that he said he made that answer under the advice of counsel. It is true that the House declared yesterday that by that answer he had committed a contempt of the House; and he is brought here to-day to purge himself of that contempt. And what does he say? He says that he was not conscious of having committed any contempt. It was not his intention to have committed any contempt of this House or its committee. It was the furthest thing from his mind to have done so.

The House having declared that the answer he made in good faith, as he says, intending to answer all proper questions of the committee of this House, is a contempt of this House, he asks you to give him until the next day this House meets to prepare an answer, which will fully purge him of this contempt. He asks for time to purge himself of contempt; and gentlemen rise up here and say that it is inconsistent with the dignity of this House to give him one single day to prepare his answer. I was astonished to hear from the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] that this House owed it to itself to give no time to this witness to answer. I have not forgotten that a few days ago a citizen of New York was brought before this House, in contempt of its precept, who answered under oath that he took advice of counsel before the warrant of the Speaker reached him; and that his counsel advised, and he also entertained the idea, that this House had no authority even to bring him before it; and that it was his intention to have contested that question before the legal tribunals of the city of New York before you got him here; but that the officer of this House had taken him with such hot haste from the city of New York that he had not time to carry out the settled purpose which he had come to under the advice of counsel. He came here with this sworn answer. This was the manner in which he undertook to purge himself of contempt; and my friend from New York rose here and begged the House to give him another day to take back and amend that answer, and purge himself more fully of this contempt; and not a man objected to it, as I recollect.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I think the gentleman has entirely mistaken the circumstances under which I rose on that occasion, if I understood them rightly, and I believe I did. The witness had not said, in his answer, that he made that specific answer by advice of his counsel. He did state, as I understood, and that was the presumption upon which I proceeded, that he acted upon the advice of his counsel; that the excuse which he possessed was full and sufficient. His answer, in respect to the insufficiency of the authority of the House, as I understood and believed it to have been, was, that his own private opinion was that the House had no authority to force him to come here.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the witness, and I understood my friend from New York, to say to the House that the witness, in whose behalf he rose to ask for time, came here on the advice of counsel, and said that the answer which he gave under oath was a sufficient one.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. It is upon that point I base my position—that the witness here has made a blow to precede the threat; that having taken the advice of counsel, whose absence he now complains of, he comes into the House with his red right hand, and defies its authority. It is upon that ground, and that alone, that I have interposed an objection to his request for delay.

Mr. DAWES. I so understood the gentleman. I understood him, a few days ago, to declare to the House that it was but just and fair to grant a witness, in precisely the same category, a day's time, not only to make a further answer, but to take back what he had said by the advice of counsel. The only difference is, that the counsel of the witness, a few days ago, was in New York when he gave this advice, and the counsel of this witness—I do not know where they live; I never saw them any more than I ever saw this witness before to-day.

I do not care what this witness is charged with. He comes here, and, under oath, says that he cannot answer fully; that he cannot purge himself of this contempt unless he has the advice of counsel, and that he cannot avail himself of that advice to-day. I want to know on what charge in your district court, or any criminal court in this country, a man can be arraigned on the very day upon which he is arrested, and brought to answer upon an indictment, when he comes with an affidavit that he cannot be heard in person, advisedly; that he cannot be heard by counsel without one day's delay? Who suffers by this delay? In what critical condition are we at this moment? Is the dignity of the House so far gone that it will not last a day? Are we in such peril from this witness, or from any source, that we cannot give him what we accord to the meanest criminal upon God's footstool—a day to answer to our charge? What is the occasion, Mr. Speaker, of this hot haste? I wished for time yesterday; I tried to find the commission under which this committee acted; I applied to the chairman of the committee, and I applied to other members of the committee, and at the Clerk's desk. I would like to know myself, to-day, the force of that commission. I do not ask delay in behalf of the witness merely—I ask it for myself. I am a judge here, and I am to pass upon this question as a judge. I want time myself. I ask for it in my own behalf, as well as in behalf of the witness. The witness comes here under these circumstances, and respectfully declares to the House, on his oath, that there was no intention on his part to commit a contempt; and that if he has committed a contempt, he will purge himself from it if we will allow him one day's time. And now, I ask, will any member say that it is inconsistent with the dignity of the House to grant this much delay?

Mr. STANTON. If I had supposed there was the remotest probability that this motion would lead to any discussion, I should have moved the previous question when I made the motion. But it seemed to me that when a party is arraigned here for a contempt, and stands in the light of a criminal, and not of a witness, subject to have such punishment visited upon him as the House in its wisdom may see proper; when he is arraigned here and interrogatories are propounded to him for the first time, and he is required to answer them in writing and under oath, it is a matter of absolute necessity that he should have some time, however short, to prepare his answers. Now, we shall probably not sit to-morrow. I supposed, therefore, that the request was reasonable that he should have until one o'clock on Monday to prepare his answers. As he sets up some claim of constitutional right as a citizen, and desires to test the power of the House by a judgment of the courts, I see no reason why he should not have the opportunity and the benefit of counsel to do it. I therefore move the previous question, and I hope the House will sustain it, and let us get rid of this business at once.

Mr. GOOCH. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the demand for the previous question, that I may ask him a single question, which, I believe, it is important that he should answer, for the benefit of the House.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I want to ask twenty questions, if he will withdraw it.

Mr. STANTON. This is not the proper time to discuss the question. Wait till the witness's answer comes in.

Mr. RITCHIE. The previous question has been demanded, and I object to all debate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being upon agreeing to Mr. STANTON's motion,

Mr. HUGHES demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARYLAND CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. BOYCE, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the memorial of Henry P. Brooks, contesting the right of the Hon. H. Winter Davis to his seat as a Representative from the fourth congressional district of the State of Maryland, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the memorialist for the appointment of a committee to take testimony.

Mr. PHILLIPS presented the views of the minority of the committee, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses and evidence in the case of the contested election of the Hon. H. Winter Davis, from the fourth congressional district of Maryland.

Mr. BOYCE moved that the consideration of the reports be postponed until Monday next, and that they be printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is a privileged question, and the gentleman can call it up at any time. The motion to postpone is not necessary.

The SPEAKER. It is necessary to postpone it, because some disposition must be made of it now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It had better be passed over informally.

Mr. HATCH. We had better fix a day for the consideration of these reports. This is a very important question, and one in which a large portion of our fellow-citizens feel a deep interest.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina to indicate Monday as the day on which he will probably call up this question; and I hope his motion will prevail.

Mr. Boyce's motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. FLORENCE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Barksdale, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Caskey, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Cox, Cragin, Burton Craigie, Crawford, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Gillis, Gooch, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Lamar, Lawrence, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Montgomery, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Niblack, Nichols, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Shorter, Robert Smith, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Underwood, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollieoffer—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bocoek, Brayton, Bufinton, Burns, Chaffee, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Covode, James Craig, Curry, Darnell, Davis of Mississippi, Daves, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Granger, Greenwood, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mills, Morgan, Morrill, Mott, Murray, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Seales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippie, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, and Wortendyke—87.

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. HUGHES stated that Mr. GREGG had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that Mr. LANDY had been compelled to leave the city in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, stated that Mr. LETCHER was still too unwell to be in attendance on the House.

Mr. REILLY stated that Mr. LEWY was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. FOSTER stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called he should have voted in the negative.

EXECUTIVE INFLUENCE.

Mr. HOARD. I rise to what I suppose to be a privileged question. There have been many rumors afloat with regard to interference with the rights and dignity of this House, and with its duties and its legislation, by the executive department of the Government. Those rumors have taken some shape in correspondence, and articles in newspapers, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. I do this, sir, I hope the House will believe, in no factious spirit, but with a desire, if any such interference has taken place, that the House may vindicate its dignity and its rights. For myself, I have heard frequent expressions of confidence on the part of one side of the House, that certain measures would be carried here by executive influence; and on the other side, fears that measures would be so carried, although, if members were left to themselves, such measures could not be carried.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York stated that he rose to a question of privilege.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope the gentleman will state his question of privilege, and let us hear what it is. He has said nothing that indicates a question of privilege. I shall object to the gentleman proceeding until he states his question of privilege, unless, indeed, he has charges to make against a member of the Cabinet; and in that case I will listen to him, although that would probably not be a question of privilege.

Mr. HOARD. I was about stating my question of privilege, and calling the attention of the House to it, as I supposed, in a proper manner. At the close of my remarks, I shall send a resolution to the Chair, which I suppose is all that is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps it would be more regular for the gentleman to send up his resolution and have it reported, so that the Chair may be able to determine whether it be a question of privilege or not.

Mr. HOARD. I send up the resolution which I propose.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and investigate whether any improper attempts have been or are being made by any persons connected with the executive department of this Government, or by any person acting under their advice or consent, to influence the action of this House, or any of its members, upon any questions or measure upon which the House has acted, or which it has under consideration, directly or indirectly, by any promise, offer, or intimidation of employment, patronage, office, or favors under the Government, or under any department, officer, or servant thereof, to be conferred or withheld in consideration of any vote given or to be given, withheld or to be withheld, with power to send for persons or papers, and leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a question of order. I consider this resolution as nothing more nor less than a direct insult to the House. It is no question of privilege at all, and I therefore object to the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not understand that the resolution has been received by the House.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly not; and I object to its being received. I understand the gentleman from New York to present it as a question of privilege. Sir, it is no question of privilege.

Mr. CLAY. If a proposition has been made to the gentleman from New York himself by the Executive, it is a question of privilege for the gentleman to demand an investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a question of order, and I would like to have the question determined by the Chair. I understand the gentleman from New York as presenting that resolution as a question of privilege. Now, sir, as I understand that resolution, it does not go far enough to involve any question of privilege. If there has been a proposition, of the character alluded to in that resolution made to the gentleman from New York, or if he can point his finger to any member on this floor to whom such a proposition has been made, then I admit it would be a question of privilege; at all events, it would be one that I should be willing to vote for as such. But I am not willing to sit here in my place, and see this whole House insulted by a proposition such as the gentleman has presented upon such a statement. If the gentleman will say, on his responsibility, that such a proposition has been made to any gentleman in this House, I care not whether on this side or the other, I will go as far as any gentleman here in investigating the matter to the bottom. But I object to entertaining any such proposition as this as a question of privilege.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I object to this debate. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no statement of fact upon the responsibility of the gentleman who offers the resolution. There must always be a statement of fact upon which to base a question of privilege. If the gentleman from New York will allege any fact upon his responsibility, then it may be a question of privilege to inquire into. But with no statement of fact, a mere resolution, general in its terms, like this, involves no privilege.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow me one moment: the statement of fact which he wants is just what the gentleman from New York was proceeding to give when he was called upon to send up his resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I think the question of privilege should be reduced to writing. If the gentleman from New York has any statement to make, let him make it in writing, and not verbally in his place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to make one suggestion. It is this: if the gentleman from New York will state upon his responsibility that improper influences have been attempted to be used upon members, then that is something tangible upon which we can act. But if the gentleman proposes only to read scurrilous and false articles from irresponsible newspaper correspondents, for the purpose of laying the foundation for his resolution, then it is no question of privilege at all. The gentleman must state upon his responsibility. He must indicate who has been tampered with, and by whom, so that this House can know what it proposes to do.

Mr. HOARD. That is exactly what I propose to do, if the gentleman will allow me to go on. I propose to state, so far as I can, what I know, and to call the attention of the House to the facts of the case.

Mr. GROW. I wish to know whether the House has not raised committees of investigation during the present session without any specific statements of fact?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will send up the articles he proposes to read to the Clerk's desk, and have them read. Let us hear what they are.

Mr. HOARD. I know that this is not the first time committees have been raised to investigate charges made upon mere newspaper reports.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask the gentleman from what paper he proposes to read?

Mr. HOARD. I propose now to read from the South, a paper printed in Richmond. I did not suppose that I should see what I have seen here. I did not suppose such a proposition, in such plain language, would meet with such opposition. I suppose it is the desire of the House to vindicate its dignity and its prerogative, and I suppose that committees have been raised to investigate charges made in newspaper reports. I propose to state to the House, very frankly, what I have heard, and what are the facts in this case. If the House, after hearing them, thinks they are not sufficient for the raising of a committee to investigate them, certainly I am satisfied. I have raised this question in the discharge of what I believe to be my duty to the House and to the country.

I read from the South of the 10th instant: "It is evident that the Black-Republican-Douglas coalition in the House of Representatives achieved a barren victory in their vote for a special committee on the Lecompton constitution. While that committee are wandering over the earth in quest of frauds, the Senate will take the initiative, and decide the matter by sending the Lecompton constitution to the House with a bill for the admission of Kansas. Then, doubtless, the influence of the Administration will prevail."

The following is from the Washington correspondence of the Richmond Enquirer:

"WASHINGTON, Monday, February 1, 1858. "The Lecompton constitution has arrived, and will be to-day submitted to Congress with a special message from the President of the United States. The fate of the constitution is uncertain. Strict party discipline may carry it through the Senate, but in the House there is a majority of four against its reception, under any and all circumstances; and yet it is said that Mr. Buchanan has declared his determination to put it through Congress in thirty days or burst. These four votes may be had, as there are a number of desirable executive appointments ready to be given out; but it will require nice party engineering."

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a point of order. I wish the Clerk to read from the Manual, at page 59, for the purpose of showing that the gentleman himself has committed a breach of privilege in reporting these newspapers to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And in 1783, December 17, it was declared a breach of fundamental privileges, &c., to report any opinion or pretended opinion of the King, on any bill or proceeding depending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influence the votes of members."

Mr. WARREN. I like this sport very well, but I deem it my duty again to interpose my point of order. The Chair must see now that the question raised by the gentleman from New York is not one of privilege. And, sir, let me say that I think that it is radically wrong, this attacking, or attempting to attack, gentlemen whose reputation has heretofore been unblemished, and who now stand fair before the country. I hope, therefore, that the Chair will determine at once the point I raise.

I take this occasion to say, that I am ready to investigate the conduct of any member upon this floor, or even the conduct of the Chief Magistrate of the Union, on good cause; but the charge must be made. I detest this way of attacking members by insinuation and innuendo.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York before deciding on the question whether it is one of privilege or not.

Mr. HOARD. My only object is to present to the House considerations which have influenced me in taking this step.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to propound an interrogatory to the gentleman.

Mr. HOARD. I decline to yield. Let me say that I do not come here to be constantly interrupted with questions. I wish to present to the House a plain case, or such a case as might have the consideration of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, upon its face, does present a question of privilege.

Mr. HOARD. The following is from the New York Tribune:

"WASHINGTON, February 10, 1858. "I learn that until Monday morning it was expected that Burns, of Ohio, would vote against the Lecomptonites. On the morning of that day, however, he came to another perception of his duty, on the understanding with the President that his son-in-law should retain the valuable place of postmaster at Keokuk, Iowa, and that he himself should be gratified with the office of marshal of the northern district of Ohio, when his present term in the House is completed."

Mr. BARKSDALE. What is the signature to that correspondence?

Mr. HOARD. There is none. The third section of the Constitution of the United States contains the following in reference to the Executive:

"He shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient."

That, sir, I believe, limits the constitutional power of the Executive in his intercourse with the legislative department, excepting the signing and vetoing of bills, &c.

As I said before, these rumors floated about. I heard them and discredited them until I saw these newspaper reports; and in talking with members, discovered that there was a hope on one side and a fear on the other, that executive power would prevail. I desire now to call attention to an extract from Washington's Farewell Address, and hope it will not be out of order. I want to show this House that Washington foresaw the tendency of executive power to absorb the entire Government. It is a serious subject for reflection on our part, and the part of the country.

The extract to which I desire to call attention is the following:

"It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking, in a free country, should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism."

Washington foresaw this danger; and I fear that we are running upon it:

"A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it, which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal, against invasion of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country, and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them."

Now I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House a moment longer. I know the House must see the consequences that would result from any interference on the part of the executive department of the Government with members of the House in casting their votes. I cannot present to the House any new considerations bearing upon this subject. But I do desire to say that all these rumors, these newspaper articles, these hopes on one side of the House, and fears upon the other, have a basis; and under these circumstances, we are called upon, in my judgment, to vindicate, by the investigation asked for, the dignity and the prerogatives of this House.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to call the attention of the Chair in a moment to the question of order to which I rose in the first instance. Before doing so, however, I desire to say that I am satisfied that the gentleman from New York mistakes the character of at least one side of this House when he talks about hopes on one side, and fears upon the other. I cannot speak for the other side of this House. They may be afraid. I make no such allegation. The gentleman has said, however, that gentlemen who represent the sovereign people, and who profess to be honorable and high-minded, can be bribed and influenced by such means in the discharge of their duties here. A sentiment of that sort may attach to the other side of the House, but I take occasion to tell that gentleman that if he intends to insinuate that there is a member upon this side of the House who can be influenced by reward, or the hope thereof, or by fear, he is very much mistaken, sir. [Laughter on the Republican side of the House.] I tell him that he has mistaken the character of this side of the House altogether; and I tell gentlemen upon the other side that if they are afraid that such a state of things exist, they may allay their fears; we are not made of that sort of material. [Renewed laughter from the same quarter.] Neither the Executive, nor anybody else, could influence us.

But, sir, this thing has gone far enough. I rose to a question of order when the resolution was first proposed. The Chair, however, and gentlemen all over the House, were disposed to hear the whole matter. It strikes me that it is not a question of privilege to attack any gentleman upon mere newspaper report. Why, I can find newspaper articles—articles emanating, too, from this Hall, and claiming high authority, that condemn the very best men upon this floor; and I am now upon the track of a distinguished reporter who has taken occasion to write an article, for which, if I can find him out, I will move to expel him from the Hall. I want gentlemen upon this floor who wish to make insinuations against the character of anybody, to meet us face to face. If you want to attack the President, or any member of the Cabinet, or any Democrat upon this side of the House, come up boldly and attack him, and we will meet you; but do not stab him behind the ribs when he has not a chance to see from whom the blow comes. I now raise the question of order that this is not a privileged question.

Mr. BURNS. I would like to have that article from the New York Tribune read again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will suspend until the Chair makes a statement. The resolution on its face presents a question of privilege, and the Chair has so ruled. The Chair has heard the statement of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hoar,] and there was nothing in it which, in the judgment of the Chair, justified the predicate of the resolution. The Chair will not, however, undertake to say that this is not a question of privilege, but will refer that question to the House so far as to submit the question to the House whether it be a question of privilege or not.

Mr. BURNS. I would now ask to have that extract from the Tribune, which was read by the gentleman from New York a little while ago, read again.

The extract was again read by the Clerk.

Mr. BURNS. Is that from the correspondence of the Tribune?

The CLERK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURNS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I pronounce it a falsehood from beginning to end; a lie from beginning to end; and the man who penned it is about as corrupt as the man who delivered it from the stand a moment ago. [Laughter, and cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman to make personal reflections.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. In such a case as this the Chair submits the question to the House whether it is a question of privilege or not. That was the course pursued here in the Thirtieth Congress by Mr. Winthrop.

Mr. GIDDINGS addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks to have read a precedent which arose in 1850, in the Thirty-First Congress, under the administration of Mr. Speaker Cobb.

The Clerk read as follows:

"JULY 5, 1850.

"Mr. GIDDINGS stated that he rose to a question of privilege, and submitted to the House a communication from the Washington correspondent of the Boston Atlas of the 2d instant, charging him with having abstracted from the files of the Post Office Department certain papers relating to the appointment of postmaster at Oberlin, Ohio. The same having been read, Mr. GIDDINGS was proceeding with some remarks thereon, when Mr. JONES raised the question of order that said communication did not involve a question of privilege, and consequently that its consideration by the House was not in order.

"The SPEAKER decided that when a member rises upon the floor and brings before the House matters relating to the privileges either of the House or a member, the question must be entertained by the Chair so far as to submit to the House to determine whether it is a question of privilege or not. The Chair would not entertain every motion which a member might think proper to say was a question of privilege. But it is the duty of the Chair to see that the matter relates to the privileges either of the House or a member. When it does, as in the present case, then, under precedent in the Twenty-Ninth and Thirtieth Congresses, the Speaker holds it to be his duty to entertain it as a privileged question to the extent of submitting it to the House to determine whether it is a question of privilege or not for its consideration."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That would apply to the other precedent to which I alluded, where the Chair first decided the question of privilege.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] and then asked him to suspend until he could have a paper read. I think the gentleman from Ohio is on the floor. I merely call the attention of the Chair to the fact.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it was the gentleman from Ohio on the right [Mr. BURNS] whom he recognized.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am perfectly willing the gentleman from Georgia should proceed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I was proceeding to say that it has been usual, when questions have been presented by a member claiming them to be questions of privilege, for the Chair to submit the question to the House, as the Chair proposes to do in this case. It is for the House to determine whether the statement made involves a question of privilege or not. In the case cited by the Chair, the member presenting the question of privilege brought before the House charges against himself—against his integrity; and the Chair submitted it to the House to determine whether it was a question of privilege or not. I do not distinctly remember how it was determined. My impression is that the House decided that it was not a question of privilege.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The House determined both ways on that occasion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It decided one way, as I have stated. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question we have got to decide is, whether the statement made by the gentleman from New York is a question of privilege. I stated, when the question was first presented, that I did not think it was. I repeat the same opinion to the House now. It is no question of privilege; and why? Because there is no statement made by any responsible person containing any charge against a member of the House.

Mr. STANTON. Is this question debatable?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It certainly is, as I understand it.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the Chair to decide.

The SPEAKER. Following the precedent set in 1850, when debate was allowed, it is.

Mr. STANTON. Does not the Manual decide that questions of this description shall be decided without debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. Questions of priority of business are to be decided without debate.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is in this statement nothing from any person known to this House. The statements are from newspaper articles, written by correspondents, the names even of whom are not known—vague rumors. The member who presents them does not vouch for them. He does not rise in his place and present, upon his responsibility, such an instance as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] presented. He presents nothing but vague rumors; and, in my judgment, the House upon them cannot entertain the resolution as a question of privilege. If the member will rise in his place and present allegations against the Chief Magistrate, which, if proved, would justify an impeachment, let him do it, and I venture to say it will be met promptly on this side of the House, and that a committee will be raised. But the member who presents this resolution makes no such statement. Why, sir, if we were to raise committees to investigate every charge made by an anonymous newspaper scribbler, we might cease to legislate and resolve ourselves into nothing but committees till no one would be left to do any other business. Now, sir, I think it is time that we should put an end to these proceedings. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot.

Mr. GIDDINGS. As allusion has been made to me personally, I hope the gentleman will yield to me.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot withdraw the motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I suppose the motion to lay on the table assumes that it is received by the House as a question of privilege; and being in possession of the House as a question of privilege, the gentleman from Georgia moves to strangle this investigation.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the House wish to vote down the motion, they can do it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I appeal to the gentleman as a personal favor to withdraw the motion; I will renew it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Very well; I will withdraw it and yield the floor.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Very well; then I will withdraw the motion unconditionally.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will renew the gentleman's motion. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see so much excitement upon this grave question. We are sitting here as statesmen, and as representatives of a mighty people, and it becomes us at all times to purge ourselves of all charges of corruption and misconduct on our part. When I first rose I did so for the purpose of calling the attention of the Chair to the very decision to which he has referred. It is not a question of order for the Speaker to decide; it is a question which appeals to the conscience of the members of this body. Are we willing that these charges, insinuations, and distinct declarations shall go forth to the public, and we not meet them? That is a question which every man must decide for himself.

Sir, when charged with misconduct, in the instance to which allusion has been made—I speak of it with emotion—I did rise and appeal to my fellow-members to give me a committee, that I might meet the foul charge—for a more dishonorable charge could not have been made against me. The House gravely denied the request. They would not give me a committee to purge myself; but when these charges came from a man outside—from a member of one of the Executive Departments—when he had reiterated the foul slander, the House did then appoint a committee to investigate the matter, as you will see from your Journals.

My friends tell me that I must not go on. I wish to allude to another precedent. At a later period, a colleague of mine from the opposite side of the House, [Mr. Sawyer,] was charged by a correspondent of the New York Tribune, with partaking of refreshment outside the bar, of a very peculiar character; in other words, that he was eating sausages in the House; and gentlemen of the House, then Democrats, made it a question of privilege, and excluded the reporter from the Hall because he thus assailed a member.

Now, sir, I felt for my colleague during the reading of that paper this morning at the Clerk's desk. He is a stranger to me. But, sir, my heart beat in sympathy for him when he was thus assailed; and I want to give him an opportunity to repudiate the foul calumny. I want to disenthral him, and let him stand forth free from the imputation. It is a grave, infamous charge; and I hope he will not allow it to be passed by without throwing it off. But, sir, I only rose to call the attention of the House to the instance in which I was concerned. In obedience to the promise made to the gentleman from Georgia, I now renew the motion to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I desire to have the extract from the Tribune read again.

Mr. HOUSTON. While the motion to lay upon the table is pending debate is out of order, and the paper cannot be read.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I hope that motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I decline to withdraw it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockeill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—88.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, that all bounty land warrants issued in consideration of military service under the provision of existing laws, and which may have been issued subsequently to the death of the applicant, shall not, by reason of such death, become invalid, but shall descend to the heirs or be subject to the devisee of the applicant, and be subject to location and patent in the name of the party entitled thereto, and report by bill or otherwise.

TITLE TO LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to introduce a bill on the same subject, which was before the last Congress, but failed for want of time. It is a bill declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I yield for that purpose.

The bill was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CALIFORNIA MAILS.

Mr. McKIBBIN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the transportation of the mails of the United States between New York, New Orleans, and the city of San Francisco, and to reduce the expense thereof; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MASON. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I decline to yield further.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn; there being, on a division, ayes 72, noes 97.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman yields the floor it must be given to the gentleman from Kentucky, who rises to move a privileged question.

Mr. CHAFFEE. We have been here for more than two months, and the Private Calendar has not yet been taken up. There are two hundred and thirty-seven cases upon that Calendar. I ask now that the white people of this country shall have some legislation.

Mr. CHAFFEE's motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. MILLSON in the chair.)

ADVERSE REPORTS FROM COURT OF CLAIMS.

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be an adverse report from the Court of Claims, (No. 90,) upon the petition of Frederick Griffing.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that by unanimous consent the committee pass over these adverse reports, and commence with the bill which follows.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object, and insist that they shall be taken up in order.

Mr. SEWARD. Then as they come up I shall move to postpone their further consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And I shall ask that the report in each case shall be read. These adverse reports are upon the Calendar, and, until disposed of, will stand in the way of other business. We might dispose of them as well now as at any other time.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. In view of the requisition made by the gentleman from Tennessee that all these adverse reports shall be read, and looking to the late hour of the day at which it is proposed that we shall enter upon that work, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw that motion for a moment until I put a question to the Chair. I ask the Chair whether it will not be in order, on taking up each one of those adverse reports, to move to postpone it, and if the question on that motion must not be decided without debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose these reports have to be disposed of some time or other, and we might progress with some of them now. They are upon the Calendar, in the way of everything else, and we ought to dispose of them, so that they may not be in the way when next we go into committee.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Tennessee calls for the reading of each of the reports.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee only to ask that cases shall be disposed of as they are reached on the Calendar.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, I will withdraw the motion to rise, that we may see whether we can make any progress.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to require that each report shall be read before it shall be laid aside. Now, I make the point of order that a case is not up for consideration. Under the rules of the House, each case upon the Calendar is to be called by its title. If any member objects to its consideration, then the question is to be put whether the case shall be taken up or not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is not objection day.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not care whether it is or not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The rule to which the gentleman refers applies to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I say that the rule prevails in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, as well as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. No, sir; it applies only to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that he will receive a motion to postpone any case as it is called.

Mr. STANTON. What objection is there to beginning at the top of the Calendar and recommending that the decision of the Court of Claims be concurred in where there is no objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that this debate is not in order. The first case on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If it is the disposition of the committee, or the will of the committee, to report those cases upon the Calendar in which the Court of Claims have reported adversely to the House, with a recommendation that the House concur in those adverse reports, I shall not object to it.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly; that is precisely what I desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is no question before the committee.

The first case on the Calendar was an adverse report (C. C. No. 90) upon the petition of Frederick Griffing.

Mr. STANTON. I move that that case be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the committee that they should agree to lay aside all these adverse reports, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the adverse reports be concurred in, except such as any gentleman present may desire to have excepted. If there be any cases upon the Calendar which have been reported on adversely by the Court of Claims, which any gentlemen here wish to have considered and discussed with a view of overruling the decision of the court, let those be excepted from the proposition; but let all the others be reported to the House with the recommendation that the report of Court of Claims be concurred in.

[Loud cries of "Agreed!"]

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

The cases were then called in their order upon the Calendar, as follows; when those to the disposal of which no objection was made were severally laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the decision of the Court of Claims be concurred in:

An adverse report (C. C. No. 92) upon the petition of Francis Picard, administrator of Pierre Ayott. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 93) upon the petition of Francis Picard, administrator of Pierre Ayott. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 94) upon the petition of George W. Dow and John H. Dittmas.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 95) upon the petition of Daniel Vanwinkle.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 96) upon the petition of Joseph Lorenger.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 97) upon the petition of Michael Musy and Andre Galtier.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 98) upon the petition of Henry G. Carson, administrator of Curtis Grubb.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 99) upon the petition of Philip Lamoy and others. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 105) upon the petition of Ezra T. Marnay, administrator of Louis Marnay. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 106) upon the petition of Henry Miller.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 107) upon the petition of Stephen C. Hayden.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 108) upon the petition of David Noble. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 109) upon the petition of Joseph Stokely and others, heirs of Nehemiah Stokely. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 110) upon the petition of Jeremiah M. Williams and others, heirs of Thomas Williams. [Objected to by Mr. THOMPSON.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 111) upon the petition of Arnold Harris, administrator of Robert Armstrong. [Objected to by Mr. COVODE.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 112) upon the petition of E. B. Chamberlain and others, heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 114) upon the petition of Eliza Shafer, widow of Jonathan Shafer.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 116) upon the petition of Augustine Demers and others, administrators of Francis Chaudonet. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 122) upon the petition of Alexander H. Cook.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 123) upon the petition of Joshua R. Jewett, heir of Joseph Jewett. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 124) upon the petition of James M. Thorne.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 125) upon the petition of J. C. Buckles.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 126) upon the petition of James Thompson, surviving partner of C. M. Strader & Company. [Objected to by Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 127) upon the petition of Robert Harrison. [Objected to by Mr. HAWKINS.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 128) upon the petition of J. H. King and others, heirs of James Green.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 129) upon the petition of T. S. J. Johnson.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 130) upon the petition of Abraham King, administrator of John Mandeville. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 131) upon the petition of Llewellyn Jones.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 132) upon the petition of Robert S. Garnett.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 135) upon the petition of Robert C. Thompson, administrator of William Thompson. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 136) upon the petition of Ann W. Butler, administratrix of General Richard Butler.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 137) upon the petition of Christiana Dener, widow of George Frederick Dener.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 138) upon the petition of Stephen C. Phillips, administrator of Jonathan Porter Felt.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 139) upon the petition of Ellen Martin, heir-at-law of Francis Martin. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 140) upon the petition of Francis Nadeau, heir of Basil Nadeau. [Objected to by Mr. PALMER.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 141) upon the petition of Abraham R. Woolley.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 142) upon the petition of Ralf Richardson, executor of Margaret B. Cameron, daughter of James Bell.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 145) upon the petition of Nathaniel Williams. [Objected to by Mr. THOMPSON.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 146) upon the petition of the heirs of Hugh Hughes.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 148) upon the petition of Richard L. Page, administrator of William B. Page.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 4) upon the petition of Robert Roberts.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 5) upon the petition of Samuel M. Puckett.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 6) upon the petition of John P. McElderry.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 7) upon the petition of Louis G. Thomas and others.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 8) upon the petition of Shepherd Knapp.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 11) upon the petition of Cyrus H. McCormick. [Objected to by Mr. PURVIANCE.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 12) upon the petition of William W. Cox.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 18) upon the petition of J. D. Holman, executor of Jesse B. Holman.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 19) upon the petition of John C. Hale.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 21) upon the petition of Cassius M. Clay. [Objected to by Mr. CLAY.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 22) upon the petition of Susan Decatur.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 30) upon the petition of William Neill and others. [Objected to by Mr. Cox.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 31) upon the petition of Thomas Phenix, jr. [Objected to by Mr. UNDERWOOD.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 32) upon the petition of H. L. Thistle.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 33) upon the petition of Abel Gay.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 43) upon the petition of J. Boyd.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 46) upon the petition of J. K. Rogers.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 67) upon the petition of Cortland Palmer.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 81) upon the petition of David Myerle. [Objected to by Mr. FLORENCE.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 149) upon the petition of the claimants of the brig General Armstrong. [Objected to by Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana.]

An adverse report (C. C. No. 159) upon the petition of Rebecca Heald, widow of Major Nathan Heald.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 151) upon the petition of Benjamin H. Springer.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 152) upon the petition of John Etheridge.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 153) upon the petition of the Illinois Central Railroad Company.

The CHAIRMAN then proceeded to call up those reports to which exception had been made, and which had not been laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 93) upon the petition of Francis Picard, administrator of Pierre Ayott.

On motion of Mr. CHAFFEE, the report was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 99) upon the petition of Philip Lamoy and others.

On motion of Mr. CHAFFEE, the report was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be concurred in.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I presume if the exceptions be withdrawn, the reports to which the exceptions are withdrawn will go with the others already disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it is not competent for a gentleman who made an exception to withdraw it at this time.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I would suggest that the proper motion is, that the committee do confirm the decision of the Court of Claims. It is so provided in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that a report is not a decision of the Court of Claims; but an opinion, to be concurred in by the House or not, as it chooses.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I ask that section nine of the law be read.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

"The claims reported upon adversely shall be placed upon the Calendar when reported, and if the decision of said court shall be confirmed by Congress, said decision shall be conclusive, and the said court shall not at any subsequent period consider said claims, unless such reasons shall be presented to said court as, by the rules of common law or chancery in suits between individuals, would furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Then the proper question, as I think, is, "Shall the decision of the Court of Claims be confirmed?" and not "Shall the report be concurred in?"

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the question is one merely of form. The Chair, however, has supposed that these were opinions of the Court of Claims, and not, technically, decisions.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 105) upon the petition of Ezra T. Marnay, administrator of Louis Marnay.

On motion of Mr. WINSLOW, the report was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be concurred in.

Mr. DEWART moved that the committee rise. The motion was not agreed to.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 108) upon the petition of David Noble.

Mr. PALMER moved that the further consideration of the report be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. CHAFFEE moved that the report of the Court of Claims be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be concurred in.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the latter motion will be agreed to; let us dispose of the case before we leave it.

Mr. PALMER's motion was disagreed to; and the report was then laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be concurred in.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 109) upon the petition of Joseph Stokely and others, heirs of Nehemiah Stokely.

Mr. COVODE. I ask that that report be read.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That we may settle these definitely, I move that the committee rise, and report the reports which have been laid aside.

Mr. COVODE. I have not yielded the floor. This report is not a decision on the merits of this case. I want the report referred to the Committee of Claims, with instructions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the case? The CHAIRMAN. No. 109.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] is upon the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to give this case a direction which the Committee of the Whole cannot give it. I suggest to him that he move that it be reported to the House, with a view of asking the House to refer it to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. COVODE. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, and move that the case be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a view to its receiving that reference.

Mr. STANTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] and to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PALMER,] that perhaps the best way of disposing of the reports which have been excepted to, will be to make a motion that they be all reported to the House with the recommendation that they be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think as we have got them here we had better dispose of them in this committee. Let us give them consideration here. Let us take them up and hear the reports read, and see what the decisions of the court are based on.

Mr. COVODE's motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the cases which have been acted on to the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. By the time we have disposed of them it will be time to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 69, noes 43.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MILLSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had instructed him to report to the House sundry adverse reports of the Court of Claims with the recommendation that the decisions of said court be concurred in.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the House concur in the report of the Committee of the Whole upon the several cases reported by the chairman; and upon that motion I ask the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The question is, "Shall the decisions of the court be confirmed?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to submit this proposition to the Chair, with a view to prevent this case being drawn into a precedent hereafter. I do not understand that the question can be put upon all these cases at the same time, if objection be made; but that, if a separate vote were called for upon each, it could be had.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not ask for a separate vote in this instance; but this is the first case of the kind we have had this session, and I wish to provide against its being made a precedent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold that any member had a right to demand a separate vote upon any case he might indicate.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then taken; and the recommendation of the Court of Claims was concurred in, in the following cases:

An adverse report (C. C. No. 90) upon the petition of Frederick Griffling.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 92) upon the petition of Francis Picard, administrator of Pierre Ayott.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 93) upon the petition of Francis Picard, administrator of Pierre Ayott.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 94) upon the petition of George W. Dow and John H. Ditmas.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 95) upon the petition of Daniel Vanwinkle.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 96) upon the petition of Joseph Lorenger.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 97) upon the petition of Michael Musy and Andre Galtier.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 98) upon the petition of Henry G. Carson, administrator of Curtis Grubb.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 99) upon the petition of Philip Lamoy and others.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 105) upon the petition of Ezra T. Marnay, administrator of Louis Marnay.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 106) upon the petition of Henry Miller.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 107) upon the petition of Stephen C. Hayden.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 108) upon the petition of David Noble.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 112) upon the petition of E. B. Chamberlain and others, heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 114) upon the petition of Eliza Shafer, widow of Jonathan Shafer.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 122) upon the petition of Alexander H. Cook.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 124) upon the petition of James M. Thorne.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 125) upon the petition of J. C. Buckles.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 128) upon the petition of J. H. King and others, heirs of James Green.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 129) upon the petition of T. S. J. Johnson.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 131) upon the petition of Llewellyn Jones.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 132) upon the petition of Robert S. Garnett.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 136) upon the petition of Ann W. Butler, administratrix of General Richard Butler.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 137) upon the petition of Christiana Dener, widow of George Frederick Dener.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 138) upon the petition of Stephen C. Phillips, administrator of Jonathan Porter Felt.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 142) upon the petition of Ralf Richardson, executor of Margaret B. Cameron, daughter of James Bell.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 145) upon the petition of Nathaniel Williams.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 146) upon the petition of the heirs of Hugh Hughes.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 148) upon the petition of Richard L. Page, administrator of William B. Page.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 4) upon the petition of Robert Roberts.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 5) upon the petition of Samuel M. Puckett.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 6) upon the petition of John P. McElderry.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 7) upon the petition of Louis G. Thomas and others.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 8) upon the petition of Shepherd Knapp.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 12) upon the petition of William W. Cox.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 18) upon the petition of J. D. Holman, executor of Jesse B. Holman.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 19) upon the petition of John C. Hale.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 22) upon the petition of Susan Decatur.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 32) upon the petition of H. L. Thistle.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 33) upon the petition of Abel Gay.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 43) upon the petition of J. Boyd.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 46) upon the petition of J. K. Rogers.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 67) upon the petition of Cortland Palmer.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 150) upon the petition of Rebecca Heald, widow of Major Nathan Heald.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 151) upon the petition of Benjamin H. Springer.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 152) upon the petition of John Etheridge.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 153) upon the petition of the Illinois Central Railroad Company.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote just taken, by which the recommendation of the Court of Claims was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was concurred in.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I move to refer the report (No. 11) of the Court of Claims, on the case of Cyrus H. McCormick, to the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this is one of the cases reported from the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. PURVIANCE. It is not.

The SPEAKER. The proposition, then, can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I move, then, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at a quarter to four o'clock) adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 15, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. W. D. HALEY.
The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the memorial of M. Chambers, of New Jersey, submitting a plan for the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean; which was referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

He also presented a communication from F. S. Seybold, proposing to transfer to the United States, for the use of the two Houses of Congress, his invention for taking the yeas and nays, divisions, and other votes of legislative bodies, in an instant of time; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of the surviving children of Jerathmiel Doty, deceased, praying to be allowed arrears of pension due him as an invalid pensioner; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWARD. Some ten years ago, Mr. President, the State of New York appointed a board of commissioners whose duty it was to receive, protect, and assist emigrants from Europe arriving at the port of New York, which, it is well known, is the gate through which the emigration from Europe flows into this country. At the head of that board is Mr. Verplanck, once distinguished in the halls of Congress, and in every way a man of eminent merit. The board enjoys the confidence of the people of that State, and has done a vast deal of good. They have sent me a petition in which they represent that, since the multiplication of steam vessels, and the withdrawing of sail vessels from employment in the bringing of emigrants into this country, there has grown up a practice on the part of the officers of abusing the female passengers, which has become not merely a matter of scandal, but of reproach and dishonor, both in this country and in Europe. The representations which they make can be sustained by evidence; and inasmuch as this offense is committed on the high seas, where the State of New York has no jurisdiction, but the United States has, they pray that Congress will pass a law for correcting that great abuse. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce. There are laws for the regulation of passenger vessels, and perhaps this would come within the province of that committee. At an early day, I shall submit the evidence in support of this petition, and also ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Dunlieth, Illinois, to Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the memorial of George M. Weston, commissioner of the State of Maine, praying for the reimbursement to that

State of the expenses incurred in organizing a regiment for the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Benjamin Ward; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the memorial of Ambrose Whitlock, praying for additional compensation for services as receiver of public moneys at Terre Haute and Crawfordsville, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FOSTER presented the memorial of Nathaniel Hayward, praying for an extension of his patent for an improvement in the manufacture of India-rubber goods; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented a communication from C. J. Fox, United States consul at Aspinwall, asking for an increase of his salary; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STUART presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a grant of land for the endowment of the Michigan Agricultural College; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in relation to a northern Pacific railroad; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. IVERSON presented the memorial of Thomas Rainey, praying that the Postmaster General may be authorized to contract with him for the transportation of the mails between Philadelphia and Savannah, and Para or Maraham, in Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, Barbadoes, and Demarara; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JONES presented the petition of James W. Rea, administrator of James H. Mattocks, deceased, praying for compensation for property destroyed by the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TOOMBS presented a memorial of citizens of Georgia, praying that they may be secured in the quiet enjoyment of lands in their possession, which were claimed by certain Cherokee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DURKEE presented the petition of Daniel Whitney, praying for the confirmation of his claim to a certain tract of land at Green Bay, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented the memorial of Walter James, praying for compensation for a horse lost while employed in transporting baggage and munitions of war, in the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of Lee county, Iowa, and two petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that the public lands may cease to be considered a source of revenue, and that all entries of them may be confined to actual settlers; which were ordered to lie on the table.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE WATROUS.

Mr. HOUSTON. I present the resolutions of the State of Texas, requesting their Representatives to take such steps as may be necessary to cause a full investigation to be made during the present session, of charges that have been made against Judge Watrous. I ask that the resolutions may be read.

The Clerk read them, as follows:

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That whereas, divers charges have been made against John C. Watrous, district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Texas, before the House of Representatives of the United States, with a view to his impeachment, and a committee of said House have reported the following resolution: "Resolved, That John C. Watrous, United States district judge for the district of Texas, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors;" and it is required for the honor of the State of Texas, and is due to the accused, that all of said charges be promptly and fully investigated and finally acted upon: that without intending to express any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Judge John C. Watrous, the Representatives in Congress from this State are hereby requested to take such steps as may be necessary to cause a full investigation to be made by the House of Representatives of the United States, during the present session, of all the charges that have been made against said John C. Watrous, and to use their best exertions to cause definite action to be taken thereon.

SEC. 2. Be it further resolved, That the Governor is hereby requested to forward to each of the Senators and Repre- sentatives in Congress from this State, and also to said John C. Watrous, a certified copy of this joint resolution.

Approved January 19, 1858.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
AUSTIN, TEXAS, January 23, 1858.
I, the undersigned, Secretary of State of the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a correct copy of the original on file in this Department.
Given under my hand and the seal of the Department of State, the day and year first above written.

T. S. ANDERSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the resolutions be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. GWIN. Some days ago I offered two resolutions, which I ask may be now acted on. They are merely resolutions of inquiry.

Mr. HAMLIN. If they give rise to no debate I will interpose no objection.

Mr. GWIN. They will not lead to debate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to increase the facilities for refining gold for coinage in the branch mint of San Francisco.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. GWIN. I now ask that the other resolution be considered.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War furnish to the Senate a copy of the military topographical memoir, report, and maps of the military department of the Pacific, by Captain T. J. Cram, of the corps of topographical engineers.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that resolution. I do not want any more books printed. I want to know what that report is?

Mr. GWIN. It is no book. The Senate can tell whether it should be printed or not, when it shall be received.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw the objection.

The resolution was adopted.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Harrison Sargent, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. POLK, it was Ordered, That the petition of William G. Dove, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. SEWARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to reorganize the Supreme Court of the United States and the circuit courts of the United States, so that the several States shall be represented by judges in said courts more nearly on the basis of their federal population, while the administration of justice shall be made more speedy and efficient.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 138) further to provide for the safety of passengers on steam vessels; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MR. MEADE'S INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. WILSON. I submit the following resolution; and as I may have something to say on it, let it lie over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, the instructions given to the Hon. Richard K. Meade, United States Minister to Brazil, previous to his departure from the United States.

The resolution lies over for consideration under the rules.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the message of the President of the United States on the subject of contracts made in Europe for inland passage tickets for intending emigrants to the United States, reported that the usual number of the message and the accompanying documents be printed; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of J. E. Martin, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 134) for the relief of the legal representatives of J. E. Martin. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the House bill (No. 81) to amend an act for the relief of White-marsh B. Seabrook and others, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James M. Hand, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 136) for the relief of the heirs of John B. Hand. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Y. Hansell, William H. Underwood, and Samuel T. Beecher, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 135) for the relief of W. Y. Hansell, W. H. Underwood, and the representatives of Samuel Rockwell. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Nason and others, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 137) for the relief of the heirs-at-law of the late Abigail Nason, sister and devisee of John Lord, deceased. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 12) making an appropriation for the payment of expenses of investigating committees of the House of Representatives; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. HUNTER. The joint resolution which we have received from the House of Representatives ought to be passed to-day. It provides for an addition to the contingent fund of the other House to enable them to pay witnesses summoned before the investigating committees.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It makes an appropriation of $35,000 as an addition to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to pay the expenses of the various investigating committees of that House during the present session.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, relating to the contested seats from the State of Indiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived when it is the duty of the Chair to announce the special order.

Mr. HAMLIN. This is a matter of privilege which overrides all special orders.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes, on reflection, that that is proper. That resolution, by a vote of the Senate, was laid on the table some time ago, and the Senator from Maine now moves to take it up and proceed with its consideration now.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think, if I insist on proceeding with it, it comes up as a matter of course. It was so ruled the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the right of the Senator to call it up. He does not perceive any difference between its present position and that which it occupied on the former occasion. The report is now before the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, this matter has been a long time delayed, and it seems to me it is just and appropriate that it should now be determined. It is important in every point of view in which it can present itself to our minds. It is important in relation to the State of Indiana; it is important in relation to the persons who are holding seats here from that State; it is important in relation to the Senate. It ought long since to have been decided, because it goes to the very organization and existence of this body. It is the first duty of this body, I hold in all cases, paying regard of course to the just rights of other parties, to examine as promptly as may be any question which arises involving the title of a Senator to a seat on this floor. I think I can appreciate the feeling which the Senators, or the persons sitting here claiming to be Senators from the State of Indiana, must possess. I think each of those persons has stated in his place that it is his desire that this matter should be decided by the Senate. I can well understand why they so desire. They are entitled to seats on this floor, or they are not; and they have a right to know whether they are rightfully here. The Senate is bound to determine that question, because, if they are not here rightfully, the Senate ought to know it.

The people of that State have a right to have this matter investigated. I repeat again, that it is a question which ought long since to have been settled; and the record furnishes an account of a delay which is to me inexplicable. I cannot understand why it has been postponed and procrastinated, when the Senators themselves are asking for a decision, and the importance of the case demands a settlement of the question. Why procrastinate it? Why should it not be determined at this time? Whenever an attempt has been made to get the attention of the Senate to the question, and to settle it by formal votes, with the yeas and nays recorded, it has been thrust aside; the Senate has refused to act on the matter, and it has been laid upon the table.

The original remonstrance in this case I find was presented against the right of one Senator [Mr. Fitch] who took his seat during the last Congress. The memorial or protest was referred on the 9th day of February, 1857, to the Committee on the Judiciary; and that committee held the protest until the 26th day of February, before any report was made upon it. On the 26th of February a report was made, accompanied by a resolution, which I think was, in substance, if not precisely, the same resolution that has been submitted to the Senate by the Committee on the Judiciary at this session of Congress. It was a resolution to authorize the sitting members to take evidence, but no action was had on it. I know it is said that there could have been no action; but that is not true. The majority of the Senate might have chosen, as they did choose, not to act upon it; but they might have acted upon it if they had been so disposed. There were no obstructions; there were no objections that could not have been overcome, if the Senate had been disposed to determine the question at that time. It is enough for me to say that after the matter had been delayed before the Committee on the Judiciary, and a report made at that late hour, the Senate did not see fit to act. It is not true, in point of fact, that they might not have acted. They might have acted if they had so chosen.

Then, sir, at the extra, or executive session, which commenced immediately succeeding the 3d day of March, that protest was again referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, involving the rights of both the sitting members from that State, the other Senator [Mr. Bright] having at that special session taken the oath of office under the same election. I have examined the papers carefully, and I believe I am right when I say that there is no difference in the two cases; they rest upon the same basis; both are entitled to their seats here, or neither is. The Committee on the Judiciary again reported a resolution to take evidence. On the 9th of March, at the extra session, the papers were referred, and on the 13th of March the committee reported; and upon that report no action was had, the Senate adjourning on the same or the subsequent day. Certainly, it was not more than one day after that report was made when the Senate adjourned.

Mr. BAYARD. It was referred on the 9th of March. The Senate had on the 12th determined to adjourn on the 14th. The report was made on the morning of the 13th, and went over in consequence of an amendment being offered, and debate arising.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is very probable that it was impossible at that stage of the proceedings to have acted definitively on the resolution. It may be true that there could have been no action at the extra session after the report of the committee was made; but I insist that these reports could have been made by the committee in as many hours after they were submitted as were taken days.

The papers were again referred to the Committee on the Judiciary at this session of Congress. I have not the day of the reference; but they were referred early in the session—I think about the middle of December; and the committee reported again the same resolution on the 21st of January.

Why is it that this delay has taken place? Why this procrastination? Why not examine and settle a question so vital to the organization of the body, and so necessary in every view which can be taken? There may be votes of this body, affirmatively and negatively, depending here daily on the votes of these two gentlemen. Are those Senators entitled to their seats? They ought to know it. Are they not entitled to their seats? Then any vote determined by them is a vote which gives to the Senate a majority that does not belong to it by the legal voters of the Senate, by those entitled under the Constitution to hold seats here. There is no view in which the matter presents itself to my mind in which it is not the bounden duty of the Senate to settle it, and to settle it now, in preference to any and all other subjects; and the parliamentary law has so regarded it, by making it a question of privilege, a question of more importance to the body than any other which can be presented.

It presents a peculiar feature. I do not understand—and I suppose the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. BAYARD,] will give me the information which I desire—why a resolution authorizing the sitting members to take testimony is reported by the committee without limitation, and without express specification as to what they propose to prove. If that Senator were sitting as a judge, and a motion were submitted to him for a continuance of an action on account of the absence of a witness, I ask is it not law, is it not reason, is it not good sense, that the affidavit in support of the motion shall specify precisely what is expected to be proved by the absent witness, so that it may be known whether, if the witness were in court and could testify, his testimony would be relevant to the issue, and would be admissible? I have looked this matter over, and I want to know precisely what is the point, and what is the evidence which they propose to furnish to establish that point. Do they propose to offer parol evidence to contradict the records of the State of Indiana? If so, every man here knows that such evidence, even if offered, could not have binding force.

It is a most remarkable feature of this case that the committee have reported a resolution, the necessity of which I have failed to understand, and that the Senate, by vote after vote, have refused even to proceed to its consideration. Here are gentlemen holding seats as Senators; and certainly they ought to know, we ought to know, the State of Indiana ought to know, whether they are entitled to them. A resolution is offered allowing them to take evidence, without specifying, according to my understanding, upon what point that evidence is to be taken; and then the Senate, by a formal vote, refuse even to proceed to the consideration of that question; or when called up, as it has been, as a question of privilege, by a formal vote of the Senate, it is laid upon the table, thus cutting off the right to debate, the right to settle, and the right to determine it. It is remarkable, sir. I have no disposition to go into the merits of the case; but I want the matter settled: I want the resolution considered; and if it is appropriate and just that the resolution should pass, then let it pass. If it be not, then let the case be determined upon its merits.

Another thing, I think, will not escape the public attention; I have no comments to make on it; I desire to make none. The public, however, will not fail to draw their own conclusions; and I think they will draw them justly. We had presented here, some weeks since, a constitution from the Territory of Minnesota, which asks to be admitted as one of the States of this Union. We all recollect the language which was used by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] on that occasion. I am not going to misquote his language; I am not going to state what his idea, or what could be drawn from what he said; but I am going to read precisely the language which he used, and let those who please make their own application of it.

Mr. PUGH. If this debate is to go on, I should like to ask what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is on the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair will have it read for the information of the Senator. The Secretary will read the resolution and the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

The Secretary read them. The resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee is as follows:

Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH, and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators returned and admitted to their seats, from the State of Indiana, that the sitting members, and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves, or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting members, touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceedings in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis.

The amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL is to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That the Senate will now proceed to a final determination of the right to seats in this body, of GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, claiming to have been elected Senators by the Legislature of Indiana.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. PUGH. The point I wish to make is, whether it is in order for the Senator, in debating that resolution, to go off into the questions relative to the admission of Minnesota?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is a debatable question. The Chair does not perceive how he is to limit the debate, and determine on the relevancy of remarks.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will endeavor to make my remarks so relevant that both the Chair and the Senator from Ohio shall understand the point I propose to make. I am now urging action on this matter, and I am going to read an extract from the speech of the honorable Senator from Virginia, and another extract from a speech made by the honorable Senator from Delaware, and I think the Senator will not fail to draw his own conclusions as to the reason which induces me to read them, and to see that they are both pertinent in the use which I make of them, to wit: to urge the necessity of the action of the Senate on this matter now. That is the point on which I am speaking. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] said, on the occasion to which I have alluded:

"And now the Territory of Minnesota, for they are both Territories, applies for admission. I do not know the circumstances under which the Territory of Kansas is to apply for admission as a State; and I apprehend that no honorable Senator knows them; but we do know that the sources of information which have been open to the Senate and the country upon every question attending the passage of Kansas from a territorial state to that of an independent political community have been of a character to carry with them distrust and doubt. We know, however, that the constitution of that State is now in Washington. We have reason to believe that, within a very short time, it will be sent to the Senate, and we may presume—we cannot take it for granted—that when it is sent to the Senate, it will be accompanied by authentic information touching every matter connected with it; but it is not done yet. I trust when that question comes up, that it may not be attended by the opposition, or the extent of opposition, that is anticipated to the application of that State for admission; but if it is, it certainly interests me and those whom I have the honor to represent on this floor, greatly, that not one single step shall be taken by this body in reference to the admission of new States until every question connected with the Territory of Kansas has been matured, and we shall be enabled to see exactly where that question stands, and how it is to be received."

The other day, when the Senate had under consideration this very question, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] remarked:

"I disagree with the honorable Senator from Illinois altogether. If this were a case in which there were contesting members from the State of Indiana, and the individual rights of others claiming to be representatives of that State on this floor were before us for decision, I should think that we ought to dispose of it before we entered upon any other question; but the State of Indiana has sent to us, with the prima facie evidence of proper election, two Senators, who have their seats upon this floor. I am perfectly aware that there are questions which must be decided by the Senate ultimately as to the legality of the election; but of the broad, general fact, which I can look at outside of that, that these Senators represent the public sentiment of the State of Indiana, I can entertain no doubt. Under these circumstances, when a question is to arise important to the destinies of this Union, why should not a sovereign State of the Union be represented, even though it be that it may turn out ultimately that the election was not in that form which the Constitution of the United States requires, and therefore invalid? I think the distinction is a clear one. As there is no individual interest connected with this matter, no contesting persons who claim to be entitled to the seats; as the result of the decision, if it shall be what the Senator from Illinois desires, will simply be that the State of Indiana will be unrepresented on this floor; as there is prima facie evidence of the right of these gentlemen; and as I believe the public sentiment of that State, even if the election was not regular in itself, is represented by them, I am not willing to lessen the number of the Senate when a question so grave and important as that of the admission of Kansas is to come before us."

I have read these two extracts for the purpose of showing the importance of a decision of this question now. The Senator from Virginia affirms what I have read in relation to the admission of Minnesota. I do not, as I said, propose to misstate what the Senator has said. I have therefore read his language, and I leave every person present to draw his own conclusion. I do not propose to draw any deduction from what I have read of what was said by the Senator from Delaware. I have read that; and I leave every Senator, and I leave the country, to draw their own conclusions. But I do insist that both the questions to which they have referred are important; and they are of that importance which not only justifies, but demands, of the Senate a settlement of this question before any votes are taken on either. I think the Senators from Indiana themselves would well come precisely to that conclusion; indeed, they could well come to no other.

Why, then, is this matter thus delayed? Why has it not been long since settled? It will not escape the attention of the Senate that a memorial was presented, signed by a majority, I think, of the Senate of Indiana, and by quite a respectable number, nearly half, of the members of the House of Representatives of that State, at the last session of Congress. That memorial was presented to the Senate on the 20th of February. They asked that the question should be settled by the then Congress; and they did it upon the ground that the Legislature was then in session, and if the opinion of the Senate was adverse to the rights of the sitting members here, they desired to know it, so that they might proceed to the election of their successors. If the Senators here were entitled to their seats, they claimed to know it, so that the thing should be settled, and the State should not be unrepresented. That has passed by, but it is only one other link in this chain of delay which is to me inexplicable.

I hope that we shall proceed now to its final settlement. I do not propose to discuss the resolution which is offered by way of amendment. I want distinct and unequivocal answers as to what are the facts to be proved. If there are facts which do not contradict a record, if there are facts which go to the merits of the case, far be it from me to interpose a vote against the right of these persons to present those facts, notwithstanding all the delay which has been granted; but if the facts to be proved are in contradistinction to record evidence, then every Senator knows that in any court of law, or here, they are facts that cannot be received in proof. For that reason, certainly I would not vote for a resolution which, taken as reported, would give them the whole six years of their senatorial term in which to gather their evidence; because the resolution is without limitation, fixing no time within which they are to take the evidence; and the procrastination already had, I think, is pretty good evidence that it would be procrastinated to any given length of time unless the resolution itself were limited. But, sir, my object now is to draw the attention of the Senate to the matter, and then I shall act as I think the justice of the case shall require.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Maine, in the observations which he has just made to the Senate, has made statements I think not entirely consistent with candor: not that the Senator has stated anything that was not accurate, that I am aware of at the present moment; but that he has not stated all the facts which would lead to a just apprehension of the question. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a few dates. The protest made against the right of the sitting members from Indiana was referred by the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary on the 10th of last February.

Mr. HAMLIN. On the 9th.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman says on the 9th. I will not quarrel as to a day, but the report says it was referred to the committee on the 10th. That was about twenty days before the adjournment of the Senate, less than twenty working days remaining of the term. It was the short session. The committee, in sixteen days, examined the question, so far as the documents placed before it enabled it to make an examination, and reported to the Senate a resolution authorizing an examination into the facts. That resolution was reported on the 26th day of the month. An examination into the facts was proposed to be made during the recess of the Senate, during the summer vacation, so that at the present term the Senate, being in possession of the entire facts of the controversy, might be enabled to come to a definite conclusion. The adoption of that resolution, thus directed to an inquiry into simple matters of fact, was opposed, vehemently opposed; and the result was, that in the press of important public business at the close of a short session, when we were all trembling for the fate of the appropriation bills, it was impossible to come to a conclusion on so debated a question as the one before the Senate, and necessarily the motion fell through.

At the extra session which was called upon the 4th of March, the protests were again referred to the committee on the 9th of the month. The Senate adjourned on the 14th. There were then but five days; and yet within those five days the Committee on the Judiciary again made a report, and proposed to the Senate to allow the testimony to be taken of the facts relating to this election during the vacation, so that it might be possible for us to determine the cause at the present session. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] who had charge of the protests, again objected to the resolution. We had but one day left of the session, and the resolution was again necessarily lost: not by any action of the majority of the Senate; not by any vote of the Senate; not by any supposed favor that could be extended to the Senators from Indiana by those who entertained political sentiments in conformity to theirs; but by the action of the opposition, by the gentlemen who were opposed to their right to seats.

What has been the consequence? That, at the beginning of the present session, the Committee on the Judiciary has found itself just where it was upon the day when this question was first submitted to its consideration. It has not the facts. We have again brought forward a resolution proposing an inquiry into the facts, and we are met by a minority report, going into the merits of the controversy, attempting to show that no inquiry into the facts is requisite; and that minority report is backed upon its merits this morning by the Senator from Maine.

Now, sir, what I complain of in relation to the want of candor in the statements of the Senator from Maine is this: that Senator has stated that the Senate has again and again voted to lay upon the table this proposition when it came up for debate; but the Senator has omitted to state that the reason for laying it on the table was, that there was an important public matter then under discussion, uncompleted; and that it was urged by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] that we should allow him to finish the discussion of the Army bill, and take a vote on that before another debatable matter should be taken up. It was suggested, and has been suggested at all times by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, that if the object of taking up this resolution was simply to pass it in order that we might get the facts, and proceed to the investigation of the right of these gentlemen to their seats, we should readily take it up, and were all ready to pass it at any moment; but the object is not to pass the resolution of inquiry, but to take it up with a view of instituting a debate into the merits of the whole question, when large numbers of Senators on this floor declare that their view of the subject will be controlled by the facts elicited on the examination. For myself, I am free to declare that, on many points on which it is proposed to take testimony, I do not perceive that the testimony would change my opinion. There is one point on which the testimony would change my opinion, if it was offered in accordance with the averments of the gentlemen who claim the seats. I do not see, on several of the questions of fact raised, how they touch the merits; but other gentlemen do see it.

It is to be remembered, Mr. President, that the Committee on the Judiciary is not a tribunal sitting to judge this cause. The Committee on the Judiciary has been appointed by this body to examine into all the facts, and to make report upon all the facts which can by possibility control the judgment of any member of the Senate; therefore, although some of us may think that particular facts would not control our judgments, that if we were to determine the cause finally we should not require the evidence which it is proposed to adduce, we cannot say that those facts would not control the judgment of other gentlemen when we know there is very great diversity of opinion on this floor in relation to several of the constitutional questions involved in this election.

We all know, it was developed in the debate that occurred in relation to the right of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] who sits behind me, that there are two distinct classes of opinions in this body on the subject of the elections of Senators. Some hold that the right of electing Senators, under the Constitution, is vested in the State Legislatures, as organized bodies; and they hold, therefore, that there can be no valid election of a Senator unless he is elected by the Legislature, as organized by the State constitution. Other Senators hold that that clause of the Constitution which devolves on the State Legislatures the right to elect Senators, intends thereby merely to point out a class of electors, or, in other words, that the word "Legislature," in the Constitution, is equivalent to the word "legislators," and that the true meaning of the Constitution is, that the Senators to this body are to be elected by the majority of the legislators who compose the Legislature of any particular State. The result of that difference of opinion on this point of principle is this: some Senators hold that in no case can there be a valid election of a Senator when there has not been a proper joint convention of the two legislative bodies; whilst others hold that if you can reach the vote of the majority of the members who compose the two bodies at any time, it is a matter of no consequence in what form you reach that result: let the result be reached, let the fact be known that there is a majority of the members comprising those legislative bodies who have voted for the Senator, and his seat is well filled by him when he comes here.

In the case before the Senate there was a decided majority of the legislators of the State of Indiana who cast their votes in favor of the sitting members. They received eighty-three votes out of one hundred and fifty members all told. They contend that there were really but one hundred and forty-seven members then elected as members of that Legislature. Their majority was a decisive one. But the allegation is that there was so much irregularity in the getting together of the two bodies and in the formation of the joint convention which made the election, as to render that election invalid. The points in relation to those irregularities and informalities are those which it is proposed to examine into by a commission to be sent to take testimony in that State.

There is one point to which I said my attention had been drawn, which I considered, even in my own judgment, to be important in this matter, and it is this: it is alleged by the sitting members here, that at the time the Senate of Indiana went into the joint convention with the House of Representatives, that Senate was composed of but forty-seven members; it is alleged on the other side that the Senate was composed of fifty sitting members, and the dispute arises in relation to this fact. On the face of the record there were fifty members. It is alleged by the contestees that three of those members were inducted into the office by sheer, naked violence, without pretext of authority of law. It is alleged by them that whilst the Lieutenant Governor of the State of Indiana was occupying his chair as President of the Senate, just as you, sir, are there seated now, as our President, there being a majority of forty-seven on the floor who were in favor of the seats of the three sitting members who had no certificates of election, the majority on the floor, by violence, sheer, naked usurpation, put one of their own members on the stand along side of the Lieutenant Governor, and declared that he was President of the Senate pro tempore, and there in the face of the whole Senate, he, sitting along-side of the regular President of the Senate, swore in three men who then took their seats; and that the majority being thus further augmented and strengthened by this usurpation of power, made up the record, such as it is now placed before us, and which seems to show that there were fifty members present.

I say if that be so, I will look to the evidence establishing it. I care not what the record is, when the charge is that that record is made up by fraud and violence, and that it is not true. I am aware of the general rule of law that no parol testimony is to be taken to control written records; but there is a necessary, a just, and a reasonable exception to that rule, when the allegation is made that the record has been made up through fraud and violence, by naked usurpation exercised over the officers who have made up the record. Surely, surely, Mr. President, it will not be contended here that if these facts were proven before us, they would control no man's vote. That will hardly be pretended. We are the judges of the elections of the Senators of the United States; and we are not to have them turned out of their seats or put into their seats by fraud and violence. I know that gentlemen suggest that I am now making admissions on the Kansas question before us; for you cannot say two words on this floor on any subject whatever, that Kansas is not thrust into your ears. Sir, we are not the judges of the election of the members of the convention of the Territory of Kansas. That is all I have to say on that point. I shall elaborate it when that question comes up.

Mr. STUART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question that seems to arise here? I want to hear his views on this question: can the Senate of the United States determine who constitute the Legislature of the State of Indiana, against a determination that has been made by the Legislature of Indiana itself? Does not, in other words, the whole power under the constitution of Indiana rest there, each House determining who are its members and who are not? and as the House there determines, can we revise it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I admit the whole force of what the gentleman says in relation to the organization of the Legislature of the State of Indiana; but I am not now contending that the Senate of the State of Indiana had not the power to judge of the validity of the election of its own members. What I am contending for is this: that whatever it may have pleased that Senate to do eventually, on the day on which this election took place, there had been no such decision; but on the contrary the statement is, that upon that day the majority of the members then legally inducted into office—the question is not one of qualification; the question is not one of their right to sit; the question is one of induction into office—that on the day on which this joint convention took place, but forty-seven Senators had been legally inducted into office, and that therefore on that day the Senate of Indiana was composed of but forty-seven members. If a majority of the Senate afterwards chose, by any act of its own, to admit those three members whose seats were that day vacant in contemplation of law, and to recognize them as members of the body, their determination is undoubtedly valid and binding from the day on which it was made; but till made it bound no one. The question is not whether, at some subsequent period posterior to the day on which the senatorial election was held, that body was constituted of fifty members; but whether, on the day on which the election was held, there were forty-seven or fifty members of that Senate legally inducted into office. On that point I want light. On that point I believe every Senator present would like to know the facts.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has treated this question as though the majority of this body were desirous to retain in their seats, for political or partisan objects, gentlemen not entitled to sit amongst us; and for that purpose he has characterized the delay heretofore had as extraordinary, as unprecedented, as one that he cannot, by any possible exercise of his ingenuity, account for. Why, sir, the Senator from Maine and myself have served together in this body during the period when the right of the sitting Senator from Iowa was contested, and that Senator from Iowa was a member of the minority of the Senate. We had the question of his right to a seat brought before us on the 3d day of December, 1855, and, with a clear majority of the Senate of opinion that he was not entitled to a seat, as was proven by the vote which was finally had on the subject, that Senator retained his seat here, with a political majority against him, until the 12th day of February, 1857, making four hundred and six days' attendance. The Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLOY,] upon one occasion, had his right to a seat on this floor contested; he came here on the 1st day of December, 1851; but the contest was not finally decided until the 27th day of August, 1852, and there had been two hundred and seventy days of the session of the Senate.

Mr. TOOMBS. The sitting member and contestant in that case were both of the same political party.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The two gentlemen then contesting were of the same political party, both belonging to the majority of the Senate. In the present case, it is to be remembered that the composition of the Committee on the Judiciary has been changed at the two or three different sessions which have occurred since this matter first came under the consideration of the Senate. It has been before us, you may say, three sessions; but how long? Twelve or fifteen days at the end of the short session; five or six days at the extra session; and now we are just at the entrance of the third month of the only session of any length allowing a sufficient time for an examination of the important questions which have been submitted to the committee. It is very strange that gentlemen should consider sixty days so extraordinary a lapse of time, more particularly when we find that this very Committee on the Judiciary made its report on the case at this session on the 21st of January. The report has been before the Senate now nearly a month. Why has it not been decided before?

The Senate will bear me witness that when the gentleman from Delaware, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, called it up day after day, he was begged by the opposition to let it lie, because the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] was unwilling and unable to take part in the discussion. Then when we had under discussion a special order beginning at half past twelve o'clock every morning, on a matter of exceeding public importance, a proposition was thrust in upon us to override that special order, and to take up this resolution—not for passage, but for debate; or, in other words, to arrest the debate on a special order, upon a pending public question vastly important to the public interests, for the purpose of debating whether or not we should send to take testimony. We said then, and we say again, these gentlemen can have this resolution passed at any moment to take the testimony; and the testimony will be back here long before they get through a debate whether it ought to be taken.

Of two things, one is evident: this testimony is either important to the adjudication of the case, or it is not. These gentlemen will not concede that it is not important, because then they would be placed in the attitude of endeavoring to stifle information necessary for the proper adjudication of the question by the Senate. They must, therefore, consider the information we desire to take as unimportant. How will it injure or affect them to take unimportant evidence? What difficulty do they see in allowing the time which would otherwise be occupied in a debate on the question whether the evidence shall or shall not be taken, to be occupied in taking it? If it is unimportant, it has no effect; and if important, it controls the judgment of the Senate on the question.

It cannot be denied, that if there were not some motive here—which I do not pretend to divine or to fathom—for keeping something out of view, it would be impossible that so strenuous and steadfast a contest should have been raised on a mere question of taking testimony. The entire year was before us last February. There was to be no Senate in session for many months. Nobody could be injured by taking unimportant testimony during the nine months of vacation; and yet, by the strenuous and persistent efforts of those who oppose the right to seats of these gentlemen, we were debarred from the opportunity of taking testimony on the facts desired for the elucidation of the question. And here again, when we proposed nearly a month ago already, (and the testimony would probably have been back, and certainly would have been back in two or three weeks from now,) to let us get at the facts, to let the Senate know the facts of this case, we are met constantly, not by a vote on that proposition to get at the facts, but by an argument on the merits of the case, tending to show that the facts are immaterial. Now, twelve months have been passed in arguing whether the facts would or would not control the judgment of the Senate, if ascertained, when the ascertainment of the facts would have occupied sixty or ninety days. Gentlemen propose now again an elaborate minority report and elaborate speeches to the Senate, for the purpose of proving—what? That, after we have proved the facts, they will not be important. The general rule is, that if a fact of any nature is calculated to produce an effect on any intelligent mind in determining the question at issue, it is not for those whose judgment may not be controlled by that fact to exclude the light from others whose judgment may be so controlled.

I repeat, the strenuous efforts which have been made up to this time to prevent these contestees from bringing the facts before the country, show badly for those who are making the opposition. They seem to indicate that there is something which they do not desire the country to know; and whenever in a contest of this kind there seems to be an effort to throw a veil over every fact which is sought to be brought forward by those whose interests are most directly affected by the determination of the question, I, for one, want to see the light; I, for one, want the veil withdrawn, and the facts well known; and when those facts are exhibited before the Senate, I shall be prepared to give my vote according to the best dictates of my judgment, without fear, without favor, without partiality, and without partisan feeling, and so help me God! as a judge in a case in which I am bound to judge impartially.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, it is a relief to my mind, and it may be a relief to the minds of some other gentlemen, if we can occasionally, once in a great while, have before us a topic of a judicial character, one in which the feelings and the arguments of partisans should not and probably will not enter. I think we have a question of that kind now before us; and it becomes me to say, that, so far as I have observed, I believe the Senate, in deciding questions in relation to the right to seats in this body, have been governed in a very great degree, if not entirely, by an impartial administration of the law.

Another relief is afforded by the fact that, when speaking on a topic of this kind, the subjects of it, the persons whose seats are involved, have nothing on earth to do with the question. We have no right to inquire to what party they belong; nor have we the right to inquire whether they are personal friends, and whether they are gentlemen entitled to our high estimation or otherwise.

The question now presents itself to us as a legal question. I can most resemble it to, what very frequently arises in courts, a motion for a continuance of the cause for the purpose of preparing and presenting certain testimony. Generally, ordinarily, the first point to be settled when such an application is made is, is that testimony material? If it is not, the cause should not be continued for that reason. It is an utter and total disregard of judicial authority to continue a case for the purpose of taking testimony that is not admissible in the case, and if any judge permits himself to do that he must do it from some sinister and improper motive or purpose. If an application is made to a judge to continue a case for the taking of certain testimony, and he says it is immaterial, it is not enough to say to him, "It may govern the minds of some of your brother judges, or it may govern the mind of some jurymen when he gets here." The very question before the court is, should it govern anybody's mind; is it entitled legally to have any such effect? I know that we frequently, and especially in our minor courts, hear such arguments as it appears to me the honorable Senator from Louisiana has presented; that is, "Oh, you want to shut out light." What man has ever been frequently in court that has not heard that every day? What quarters do such objections usually come from? We all know what they are. We all know the purpose for which they are used. "You want to shut out light," is the cry when it is sought to create a prejudice against a party. It is constantly used, and the smaller the court the more such an appeal is used. The truth is, that if that is not the light which should guide us in the path of duty, it should be shut out; and because you may imagine some man so obfuscated that he would be governed by it, is the very reason why you should not admit it.

The whole question then comes back upon us, and it should be settled, and will be settled, as I think, if men regard their duty, simply by the consideration whether that is material testimony. Here, perhaps, it may be proper for me to say a word on what was said by the Senator from Louisiana, it seems to me, with the same sort of color, and for somewhat the same object as the declaration on which I have just commented, namely, that another case was delayed, and that this ought to be delayed as long as that was. That was the case of the Senator from Iowa. There was a protest put in against his seat, and it lay here and was not taken up for many months. The majority of the Senate had direction of the business of the body; and they laid it here for a year, and never moved it against him, and, as I think, had better never have moved it against him; but they had an object, and when the time came, in their own way, they moved. They took their own course about it. Who was to blame for that delay? Did anybody claim it? Did anybody appreciate it as a very great advantage? Nobody in the world. Did anybody want it? Did anybody ask for it? Never. Why, then, make a precedent of it?

Besides, there may be a very different state of things now. The honorable Senator from Louisiana says that gentleman [Mr. HARLAN] was in a small minority. Yes, so small that there was no danger of his vote, and therefore they could well let him sit with impunity; but that may not be the condition of things now. There may be very important questions here now in regard to which the minority is not so small as gentlemen would perhaps desire. A different state of things exists now; but I should not make remarks on subjects of this kind, altogether foreign to the question before us, were I not induced to enter into it merely for the purpose of reply.

The question comes back upon us, is this testimony material? Is it admissible? Ought it to govern any man's mind? That is the whole question. I ought, perhaps, before leaving the collateral subjects which have been introduced, to ask the Senator from Louisiana, who speaks of the delays in the Senate just as if gentlemen here were arguing merely for the purpose of delay, what possible object can it be for those of us who are moving in it and who have thought it our duty to urge it, to create any delay? Delay continues these men in their seats, to which we think they are not legally entitled. Why should we make delay?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not know.

Mr. COLLAMER. Nor have we ever made any. It is true the point which has always been presented to us has been whether the testimony proposed to be taken was material to the decision of their right to seats here. I was not, at the last session of Congress, on the Committee on the Judiciary; but then the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] pressed this subject all the time, and pressed the decision of the question, and never desired to delay it for a day; and while he was trying and endeavoring at every step to get action on this very point, the session ended.

I come once more, Mr. President, to what is the question. It is proposed to prove in this case, as stated by the Senator from Louisiana—I shall not go into the details—that three certain Senators in the Senate of Indiana were not regularly inducted into office; or, more properly speaking, were irregularly inducted into office. The gentleman has indulged in his own version of that transaction, and made his own statement of what he expects will appear. Permit me to state what I suppose will appear. In point of fact, they got into a dispute about three members whose seats were contested at the beginning of the session. The majority in point of numbers thought the presiding officer, the Lieutenant Governor, was unreasonable in his objections in not administering the oath to these men, or ordering it to be done, and they undertook to do it by a man by them appointed; but that controversy only continued through the forenoon session of that day. At the afternoon session the Lieutenant Governor said he never had made any such objections; he thought two of the men had sufficient credentials, and ought to be admitted, but the third he thought had not; and thereupon these men, without any objection, were, in the afternoon, by his direction, sworn in, and a vote was taken in relation to the third one, and, by order of the Senate, he was sworn in. There that matter ended, and that disturbance which occurred in the fore part of the day never was entered on the journals, and had nothing to do with the true character of the Senate. It does not appear; but this does appear: that these three men were improperly inducted into office. That is the allegation.

The constitution of Indiana makes each House the judge of the election and the qualification of its own members. Those are the words. Each House is to keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same. Is it not perfectly certain that the provision that they are to be the judges of the election and qualification of their members, means that they are to pass as conclusively on the one point as on the other—on the qualification as well as in the election? What is meant by "qualification?" That does not mean that the Senate are to judge of the eligibility of a Senator to an election. That they determine when they decide whether he is duly elected; but the word "qualification" there is used in its ordinary and popular signification. It means "duly sworn in." People frequently ask, "Have you been qualified?" that is, "have you been sworn into office?" That is what is meant by "qualification," not merely in common parlance, but often in our books. In reading over the constitution which has lately been presented to us from Kansas, I perceive that it is provided that certain officers shall hold over until their successors are qualified—that is, sworn in. If you say that the power to judge of "qualification" means to judge of their eligibility, then the man is to be qualified first and elected afterwards. That is idle. He is to be elected and qualified, and the Senate or the House of Representatives is the judge of both these points in relation to its members. What they do in relation to the one point is just as conclusive as what they do in relation to the other. If we may inquire whether their members were duly qualified when their record shows that they were, we may inquire whether they were duly elected when their record shows they were. Most clearly, we can no more do the one than the other.

Now, is it true, will any gentleman seriously insist, that in judging of the elections of the Senators holding seats in this body, chosen by the acting Legislatures of the respective States, we can go back to the action of the Legislature to inquire into the legality of the election of its members? No gentleman will insist on that. I do not believe any one can be found in this body who would hazard his reputation and discernment as a Senator so much as to say that he believes we can inquire into the legality of the election of the men who actually hold their seats in the Legislature, in order to judge of the election by them of a Senator to this body.

How was it in this case? The record of the Senate of Indiana shows that the members who are spoken of were on the first day of the session duly qualified, duly sworn—all three of them. A question arose whether they were duly elected. That question was attended to in due time by the Senate of Indiana. And here I differ with the Senator from Louisiana; for I take it that when that body decided ultimately that these men were duly elected, as they did decide, they thereby decided that they were properly in their places from the beginning—not from the time of the decision, but from the time when they took their seats. I insist, therefore, that the record of the Senate of Indiana distinctly shows that these men were duly elected, and duly qualified or inducted, as the gentleman calls it, and the one fact appears just as distinctly, as positively, and as conclusively, as the other. If it be true that we can inquire into the one, we can inquire into the other; and if we cannot inquire into both, we cannot inquire into either.

So much in relation to the admissibility of this testimony. I say it is utterly incapable of being admitted as proof in contravention of the existing record. I am not troubled now with the subject of Kansas any more than the Senator from Louisiana. That is a point to which I can attend by itself in due time, and on the proper occasion; and I apprehend the distinction is quite too broad between that case and this, for this matter to trouble me at all when I get to that.

Then, sir, if you continue this cause, and send out to take this testimony, you send out to take testimony which, as I have attempted to show, and as I believe I have shown to the gentlemen who listened to me, is utterly incapable of being admitted. It is not for me, any more than the Senator from Louisiana, to say what motive may exist in the minds of gentlemen for sending out for this testimony. It may be for the purpose of delay, to keep these men in their seats to use them for important questions. I do not know; but this I do know, so far as I can know anything of which I am convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, that the testimony proposed to be taken is utterly incapable of being admitted here.

There is another point in this case, Mr. President, which is altogether paramount to all this; and that is what appears by the report, which is not contradicted, and will not be contradicted, as to the manner in which the election of these Senators was conducted. For the present point, I do not care whether the three Senators of Indiana who have been spoken of, were ever chosen, or ever inducted, or ever there. Whether they were there or not, cannot alter the main question in this case; and what is that? The Constitution provides that the two Senators in this body from each State shall be chosen by the Legislature of the State; and it further provides that the time, place, and manner of that election shall be prescribed by the Legislature. I take it that one of these clauses is just as decisive as the other. In the first place, the election must be by the Legislature, and in the next place, it must be an election which is prescribed by the Legislature. I do not say how long beforehand provision must be made for it; whether one hour, one day, or ten years; but there must be a time, place, and manner of doing the thing prescribed, before the thing can be done. That is the Constitution. There is no equivocating about the Constitution on this point. There is no doubt about it; the words do not admit of doubt.

Then, I say, in the first place the election must be by the Legislature. That brings up the question, what is the Legislature of Indiana? The constitution of that State provides that its House of Representatives shall be composed of one hundred members, its Senate of fifty members, and that it shall require two thirds of each House to make a quorum. I take it nothing can be done by the Legislature of Indiana which is not done by a quorum of the two Houses. No act can be an act of that Legislature unless it is done by a quorum of the two Houses—two thirds of the two bodies. It is true that our different States have prescribed various modes of making an election of United States Senators. The simplest form, perhaps, would be, that each House of the Legislature, acting by itself in its legislative capacity, should pass the vote. Suppose that were done in Indiana: it would require each House assembled, with two thirds of its members present, to do the voting. I agree, however, that if the Legislature had prescribed by law a manner of assembling the two Houses separately or conjointly, an election might be made in that manner; because the law prescribing the manner would have been the act of the Legislature by its proper quorum in each branch; and if that were pursued according to the terms prescribed for it, there would be a legitimate election based on the legislative act of the two bodies. But, sir, I insist that at any rate there must appear in the case to be something showing that the quorum of the two Houses did the thing, or the quorum of each House authorized the doing of the thing: one or the other must exist, or it cannot be an election by the Legislature. I deny that the members of either House of the Legislature, or a majority of one House, or of both Houses, could get together in their own way when they pleased, without any law prescribed for that purpose, and elect a Senator of the United States, even if they had given notice to all the members of both Houses to attend. That would not be an election made by the Legislature, or prescribed by the Legislature.

Now let us inquire how the alleged election in this case was made. The constitution of Indiana provides that the votes of the people for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be counted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the presence of the two bodies composing the Legislature. After the Legislature had assembled, and both Houses were in session, the Speaker of the House of Representatives gave notice that he would count the votes in the Hall of the House on a certain day, and at a certain hour of the day; and he desired the presence of the two Houses, so that he might perform this duty according to the constitution. You will observe, sir, that there was no act of those bodies to get together even for that purpose. It did not require it. The constitution did not require it. I take it as many members went as pleased to go. If only one third had attended, I presume the count would have been good. There was nothing authoritative in the notice. There was no way by which the Speaker could compel the members to be present. On this occasion a majority of the House of Representatives, I believe, was present. The Senate did not adjourn to go there; but the presiding officer said he was going there, for the purpose of attending the count; and some of the Senators, a minority of them, went to the Hall of the House of Representatives, where the votes were counted in the presence of such members of the two Houses as thought proper to attend; and the result of the gubernatorial election was declared. When this was done, the business of the meeting was ended. On that occasion, however, after the votes had all been counted, a Senator rose, I do not know by whose request, and proceeded to adjourn to another day what he called "this convention."

No convention had ever been assembled there either by law or the act of the two Houses; and even if you could call it a convention, the purpose for which it was assembled was distinctly fixed in the constitution, and that purpose having been attained, its functions were ended. An adjournment however was had in that manner. That man said "this convention is adjourned to a certain day." News got out that there was some purpose at the adjourned meeting to undertake to make an election of United States Senators, and thereupon the Senate of Indiana entered on the record their distinct protestation against the meeting of the so-called convention, or any election of any United States Senators or other officers which any such pretended convention might assume to make. Some of the members, including a minority of the Senate, met on the day and at the place to which it was before announced that the so-called convention was adjourned; and somebody or other adjourned them again. When they came together a second time, lo and behold the then existing Lieutenant Governor announced "this convention will now proceed to the election of United States Senators!" In fact I believe he announced at the previous adjourned meeting that they would meet at such a time for that purpose. They did meet. It is said they met for the purpose of electing. Grant it; but had they a legal right to meet for that purpose in that way? They did meet, and an election was made by which these gentlemen now hold seats here, and that election was made by a majority in number of the members of the House of Representatives and twenty-two or twenty-three of the Senators, who were a minority of the Senate.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There were twenty-four Senators present; twenty-three voting, and one not voting.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think there were twenty-three; twenty-two voted for these men, and one for another man, I believe. Now, the question is, was that a legal election? Testimony cannot by any possibility alter the character of that meeting. Whether you prove that those three Senators who have been spoken of were improperly inducted into office, or irregularly inducted, does not make that a legal convention. It does not prove any prescriptive law for the meeting of the convention, for there was no law in the State of Indiana for the meeting of any convention to elect Senators of the United States. There was no law providing any time, place, and manner of electing Senators. Now, the point comes back, can it be possible that that can be called an election by the Legislature of Indiana? There was not a quorum of either House present. There was present a minority in number of the members of the Senate, and a majority in number of the members of the House of Representatives, and counted together they would make a majority of the whole number of members of both branches. Can an election be made in that way? The case of the Senator from Iowa was very much stronger. In that instance, there was a regular law prescribing the manner of meeting, and directing the manner of adjournment; and although that law had been pursued in all its requirements, this body deprived him of his seat, because the majority of the Senate of Iowa did not think proper to go into the convention on the last day of its meeting, but adjourned over. Now we are asked to say, that when there is no law for a convention; no action of either House of the Legislature providing for a convention; no action of what constituted a quorum of either House in any way, on the subject; a number of members convened together in the manner I have stated, could elect Senators of the United States. Is it possible that that was an election made by the Legislature of Indiana? And especially, I ask, is it an election made by the Legislature of Indiana in the manner and at the time prescribed for it? Obviously, it is neither. The fact of one member or two members or three members having been improperly inducted into the Senate, if established by proof, could not by possibility alter the character of this meeting. If such testimony were admissible, to contradict the records and proceedings of the Senate of Indiana on the subject of the election and induction of their own members, it would not give any character to this election which would constitute a case entitling these gentlemen to seats in this body.

The whole question resolves itself simply into this: is it true that, in the absence of all law for that purpose, a majority in number of the two Houses of a Legislature, consisting of a majority of one House, and a minority of the other, can get together of their own accord, without any resolution, without any law, and make an election, which is an election by the Legislature of the State? If they can, this is a good election. If a majority of one House and a minority of the other, constituting together a majority of the whole number of the two bodies, can make an election in this way, you have no need to send out for proof, but you can decide the case to-day. If that makes a legal election, we may as well say so, and decide it to-day as at any time. There is no necessity for sending out to obtain testimony in regard to this matter. The case is before us ripe, ready for a decision. If an election can be made in the way I have described, this is an election. If it cannot be made in that way, testimony cannot change it. I think, therefore, we should proceed at once to the decision of the case.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I first designed to have made some observations in reply to the Senator from Maine, and his accusations against the committee and the majority of the Senate; but they were so effectually disposed of by my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Louisiana, that I shall now only make one or two observations in reply to the Senator from Vermont.

It is true, as he has stated, that the Legislature of the State of Indiana consists of one hundred Representatives and fifty Senators. The two gentlemen now in their seats as Senators from Indiana, received a majority of all the members of the Legislature, a majority of one hundred and fifty, and they are now in their seats in virtue of credentials bearing the great seal of the State. The protest presented at the last Congress alleges that there never was any joint resolution of the two Houses agreeing upon the time and place of election. What is the answer of the sitting members? and I do not, like the Senator from Vermont, go out to what may be stated by parol; it is stated in their paper. If you overrule a motion to continue a case, where the party by his affidavit sets out what he expects to prove, you must proceed upon the hypothesis that what he has said is true—that he can prove it; it is like what the lawyers call a demurrer to the evidence. They allege that although the Senate of Indiana could have consisted of fifty members, although there were that many memberships, yet in point of fact there were but forty-seven members in the Senate; when the Lieutenant-Governor, who is the President of the Senate, took the chair, appointed by law to recognize the members elect, he did not recognize the three gentlemen who have been referred to. They had not any certificates of election. I do not care whether they had been elected or not; if they had no evidence of their election, and were not recognized by the officer appointed by law, they had no right to take upon themselves the duties of the office. That is a plain proposition, and it seems to me that he who runs may read.

Then the contestees allege further, that by the law of Indiana, and by the settled usage and practice of the Legislature of Indiana, and particularly in the Senate of the State, no person could be sworn as a Senator without the order of the Lieutenant-Governor; for he, by the constitution of the State, was made the President of the Senate. These three men presented themselves; the Lieutenant-Governor did not recognize them; they had no credentials. What then followed? Some Senator is thrust upon a seat by the side of the Lieutenant-Governor, and he directs them to be sworn. Now, the question is not of their election—no body claims the right to investigate the election of a member of the State Senate of Indiana; but we have a right to investigate the question whether he had color of office; whether he was legally inducted into office. The fact that the State Senate, long after the alleged election of the two sitting Senators, proceeded to investigate the fact, and ascertained that these three gentlemen had been elected, has no sort of pertinency to this issue; that had not transpired at the time of the election of United States Senators.

What is a man's commission? He is an officer—I do not care whether in the civil or military service; what is the object of his commission? It is to authorize him to execute the duties of the office. If he has no credentials of his election, and is not qualified in the proper manner, it makes no difference whether he has ever been elected or not; he cannot proceed, he cannot act. The minority of the committee do not admit the truth of this assertion made by the sitting Senators, and I do not assert that it is true; I do not know; but the majority of the committee say this fact ought to be ascertained; and I will show the Senate in a moment why it ought to be ascertained.

The Senator from Vermont says it is settled by the record; and he asks, can you contradict the record? In some cases you can. The allegation of the sitting members in that regard is that these three men helped to make the record. Fraud, we are told in the law books, vitiates everything. Fraud vitiates a judgment; fraud vitiates a record. I do not mean fraud that lies at the bottom of the transaction, but fraud in making up the record. If an instrument is brought here forged, are we to be told that we cannot go into the question of forgery? If some man goes into the Department of State and steals the great seal of the United States and puts it to a document, cannot we inquire how the seal came there? If these very three men whose right is contested, themselves, with others, made this record, it cannot stand against the truth of the transaction. That question of fraud we can examine into. It is a question of forgery rather than fraud.

Suppose the record says nothing about it, as in this case; what then? Cannot we inquire into it on an allegation of fraud? I have another question to suggest to the Senator from Vermont. Suppose we were satisfied, or rather the fact was so established to us indubitably, that one third of the Senators elect of the State of Indiana had died before the commencement of the session, and the majority had proceeded to vote others into their seats, not to decide on any question of election, but absolutely to award seats to a number of men for the express purpose of defeating the election of a Senator of the United States: what then? What is to be done in such a case as that? Is the record made up by these very men, to preclude us from ever examining the truth of the transaction?

Now, I will show the Senate, as I said awhile ago, how the question of the rightful induction of these three men into office, becomes material. I repeat, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that no member of the committee, so far as I know, claims the right to examine into the election of those three gentlemen; but they do claim the right to examine whether they were ever legally inducted into office. Therefore it is not a question between a Senator de facto and a Senator de jure. It is a question whether they were ever Senators de facto. The Senate of Indiana and the House of Representatives of Indiana were assembled. The constitution of that State appoints a day on which the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor elect shall be sworn into office, on which the votes shall be counted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both branches of the Legislature. This proceeding, this disturbance in the Senate of the State went on. The House of Representatives sent up a message to the Senate appointing an hour on the last day of grace when they would proceed to count the votes. The Senate paid no attention to it, and did not respond. Then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the officer appointed by the constitution to perform this duty, finding that this was the very last day of grace, sent a notice to the Senate that he required their presence under the constitution of the State to enable him to perform that duty. The then President of the Senate left his seat. He was the Governor elect. He was followed by a majority of forty-seven Senators, if there were but forty-seven. Two other Senators, so that it would have been a majority of the Senate, were present, but they say they only went as spectators, and I leave them out. He was followed by a majority of forty-seven Senators if those were the only Senators; a joint convention was assembled; the Speaker of the House proceeded to count the votes; he announced the result; the Governor elect was sworn in and delivered his inaugural address; the Lieutenant-Governor was sworn in.

That convention, by the order of its presiding officer, was adjourned over to a future day. I admit there arises a question, and it is a fair question, as to the authority of the joint convention itself to adjourn over, or as to the authority of its presiding officer to adjourn it over. What is the answer of the sitting Senators to that? That that was the fixed, settled usage of the State of Indiana. I agree that a usage, to be of any validity, must be certain, notorious, and reasonable. It remains to be ascertained whether the usage is of that character. That is one of the very points which will influence my mind, in a great degree, in deciding on this election. I wish to know what the usage was, there being no law on the subject. Is that a new proposition in the Senate? The contested case from Florida, a few years ago, was decided on the question of usage by the unanimous vote of this body, as appears from the record. There being no written law, no provision of the constitution, no statute on the subject, we are to inquire what was the usage of the Legislature of Indiana as to these joint conventions; and if it had been the settled practice from the earliest times, with no dissent, for the convention, or for the presiding officer, of his own motion, sub silentio, to adjourn the joint convention to a future day, I do not see that there is anything more that can be alleged on the subject. It becomes a valid convention, provided a majority of the members of both Houses are present, and do not dissent.

Then this convention met at a subsequent time, according to its adjournment. At that convention, also, a majority of forty-seven Senators were present. It adjourned again in the same manner, without dissent; and on the third day of the session of the joint convention, the two gentlemen now in their seats were chosen, at which time a majority of forty-seven Senators were present.

That is the materiality of these three men. That is the reason why, as I understand it, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGGS] has stated several times in this body that if the minority of the Judiciary Committee will admit the fact that these three men were never legally inducted into office, he is ready to have his case decided to-day. I understood him to say that before. I so understand him now.

But it is said on the other side, by the Senator from Vermont, that there must be a quorum of the two Houses present to make an election of a United States Senator.

Mr. COLLAMER. Or an act previously passed by a quorum, prescribing the manner of election.

Mr. PUGH. There is no law on the subject in that State, and there is none in my State, and never has been in the State I represent. When they are ready to make an election, one House sends a message to the other, notifying them.

Mr. COLLAMER. I insist there could never be a convention by a majority of the members of the two Houses, unless there was a resolution for it.

Mr. PUGH. I am coming to that point. The Senator claims that this was not a valid convention, there being no previous law, because there ought to have been present two thirds of each House. What is the answer of the sitting members to that? That that provision of their constitution has been construed by the Legislature repeatedly in each House, and by the judges of their supreme court, to apply only to the transaction of legislative business; that in the numerous joint elections which have transpired in that Legislature—or joint conventions for the purpose of electing State officers, being precisely similar to that of the election of Senator—the presence of two thirds of each House has never been considered material. I consider that each State has a right to construe its own constitution. If that be true, there is an answer, and especially does that proposition commend itself, not only to the Senator from Vermont, but to me; for when we had the case of the Senator from Iowa under consideration, he and I agreed that the word "Legislature" in the Constitution of the United States did not mean the law-making power as organized for the purpose of making laws, but that it was the electoral college by which Senators of the United States were to be chosen. I believe the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] went so far as to declare—and if I am wrong he will correct me—that where one House appointed a time and place for the election, and notified the other House to attend, and the other House did not attend, then if the party had still a majority of all the members of the Legislature, he was duly elected Senator.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I understood the Senator from Vermont to make a stronger proposition than that; and if I am mistaken, he may correct me. I understood him to state that we might pass an act of Congress requiring the judge of the district court of the United States to go to the seat of government on any day, and take the votes of members of the Legislature.

Mr. COLLAMER. It will be remembered that the time, place, and manner of election are to be prescribed by the Legislature; and the Constitution further provides that Congress may make provision in all those respects, except as to the place. Under that exercise of the power of Congress, I insist that Congress has plenary power on that subject.

Mr. PUGH. Then they have the power to require the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Indiana to go to Indianapolis, the seat of government, on any day, either within the session of the Legislature or without it, and call upon the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of Indiana to vote; to issue a precept to them or a public advertisement, and that then the gentlemen who have the majority of the votes are Senators, without reference to the question whether the electors met as Houses of the Legislature or not. If that be so, how little consequence can be attached to the provision that two thirds of each House are a quorum for the passage of a law. How immaterial does it become what is the quorum required by their constitution for ordinary legislative business.

I have endeavored to state the allegations of the parties. When this case was before the Committee on the Judiciary at the third session of the last Congress, when the papers were in manuscript, and when it was a very difficult matter for six gentlemen, as the committee was then constituted, to have access to a great roll like this, and to sift out of the vast mass of transcripts, affidavits, and statements, what were the points at issue, the committee came to a resolution which seemed to them to be fair upon reading the allegations of the sitting Senator, [Mr. FRENCH], whose case was then the only case before us; and we reported to the Senate a resolution authorizing both the parties (not merely the Senators in their seats, but the protestants) to take their testimony on all the matters alleged in the statements on both sides. I think we used very great diligence in that case. It will be recollected by all those who were members of the Senate at that Congress, that the Committee on the Judiciary protested against the reference of the case to them, and protested chiefly on the ground that it was so late in the session that they could not pretend to do justice to it. It was forced on us, and we did the best we could. We reported the resolution. Why did it not pass? Because the opposition did just what they are doing to-day. They offered an amendment to prevent it from passing, to force the committee to decide on evidence which the committee said was not sufficient to enable it to decide. As often as the question came up, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] got the floor and spoke against the resolution, spoke it into the mass of the appropriation bills, and literally spoke it to death. That is the first delay of which the Senator from Maine complains.

Then we came to the executive session and the same thing was repeated, and the Congressional Globe will show it. It was spoken to death again. Now, what is the object of this proceeding? Is it, as the Senator from Louisiana has well inquired, to pass the resolution? Not at all. It is to prevent its passing. I do not complain that Senators oppose it; they have a right to oppose any resolution; but I do complain that a Senator shall stand up and say he has examined the record, and by the record he proposes to convict the committee and the Senate of a delay which was caused by those who act with him. That is what I complain of.

I have stated the allegations of the parties, and stated them without giving my opinion on any one of the points, because many of them are questions of fact which could not be decided, or at least they are difficult to decide, if they can be decided at all, on these papers; and they are not immediately before us for consideration.

Nor do I mean to be understood as saying that I deem all this evidence, or that, upon further consideration, I should deem any of it, essential to a conclusion in my own mind on this case. That is not the question. I am but one of the seven members of the Committee on the Judiciary. I am entitled, in forming my judgment, to the benefit of the opinions of the Senator from Louisiana, and the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from Delaware. Before I form my own opinion definitely and vote, I am entitled to the aid of their judgment in the decision of the case; and each of those Senators has declared that he cannot come to a satisfactory decision of this case without this evidence; and when they say that, it is enough for me. We are not a court, as the Senator from Vermont says. We decide nothing. If we come to a conclusion, what is our conclusion worth? It does not unseat anybody; it does not confirm anybody; it is to come here to the Senate to be considered in the Senate; and it may so turn out that a Senator who was not a member of the committee, on examining the case, would say, "Here is a material point of fact which would govern my vote; and I claim that the Committee on the Judiciary has no right to prevent the party from proving the fact, because, if he can prove it, he is entitled to my vote." It seems to me the committee have acted with candor, with frankness, with fairness, at every stage of the proceeding. I am satisfied that, if a speedy decision of this case is what is required, if that is what the Senator from Maine wants, it is the surest thing in the world, it was the surest thing at the last Congress, it was the surest thing at the executive session, to keep still and let the resolution pass. We should have had the evidence here if it had passed then.

If there be any objection that there is no limitation of time, or anything of that sort, I do not suppose there will be any objection on the part of the committee to any reasonable limitation. What we want is to give the parties a chance to establish the truth of their allegation, and that I think they are entitled to have. They are entitled to it not merely to inform me as one of the committee to which the case is referred, but to inform the other members. I shall therefore vote for this resolution.

Mr. TOOMBS. Having been a member of the Judiciary Committee during the last Congress, at the extra session of the Senate, and at the present session, I deem it proper to make a very brief statement in answer to the insinuations of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] I venture to say no question has been before that committee since I have been a member of it, which has been more assiduously attended to in committee and in this body than that of the election of Senators in the State of Indiana. The Senator from Maine has given the dates, and they are correct. It seems that when the question was first referred to that committee, in a very few days, sixteen days, which embraced but two regular meetings of the committee, a report was made. The question was taken up at the first regular meeting. An adjourned meeting was held, and then at the next regular meeting it was acted upon to the exclusion of all other business. We deemed this information important to the decision of the Senate, and we asked that testimony should be taken for the purpose of furnishing it. It was opposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] as has already been stated, steadily, studiously, and pertinaciously, upon the grounds now urged. At the last Congress we had precisely the argument which we hear now; that it is unnecessary. I answered it then. I insisted that the resolution should pass. It was objected to, and action on the resolution was defeated by that member, and by that member alone. No action could be had on it then.

At the extra session there was a new organization of the committee. That gentleman and the Senator from Vermont became members of the committee. We took the question up immediately at a called meeting of the committee, the reference having been after the regular day of meeting, which was once a week. We acted immediately and promptly. We reported the same resolution. It was then free from any difficulty, because its adoption could not lead to any delay at all. There was ample time allowed for testimony to be taken during the recess, so that we might decide the case at this session. There was no reason in the world for stopping it except the one given by the Senator from Louisiana, that somebody did not want the exposition; because, if it was not important, why object to it when it could create no delay? There were eight or nine months when the commission could have acted and brought all the facts, material or immaterial. But it was spoken out by the Senator from Illinois, as you have just heard, who has stood in the path of action on it from the first day to the last. It was objected to then by him. He desired to be heard—he had a right to be heard. We have no means of bringing a question to an issue in this body. If gentlemen desire to speak on it they can speak on it forever, or as long as their strength will allow. He had the floor, and he spoke as long as he chose. There was other public business which was pressing and which took precedence. The committee urged this matter before the Senate at appropriate times, and even at inappropriate times, as already appears from the statement of my friend from Ohio.

At this session, when I reached here about Christmas, I found the question before the committee. It was delayed for one or two meetings, on account of the indisposition of the attorney of one of the parties; but it was brought up regularly, and the moment it could be fairly and intelligently heard, the same resolution was presented to this body. When we seek to pass that, we are met by the Senator from Illinois with the same story, the same speech, that it is immaterial, and seeking to show that it made no difference. I have no doubt it makes none with him, but it does with me. I deem it important to the right of the case. Here is a great fact. If the Senator from Maine wishes to go to the country, I want to give him something to take to the country. The fact is, that these two Senators hold their seats by the votes of eighty-three of the one hundred and fifty members of the Senate and House of Representatives of Indiana, by the votes of a large majority of the legal electors, the persons appointed by the Constitution of the United States to make the election.

This is beyond cavil, beyond dispute. They were competent to make the election. There was not a disputed seat among them. The constitution made it their duty to elect Senators. The question now which is urged by these gentlemen is, whether one branch of the Legislature of Indiana, by fraud and violence, prevented the exercise of this duty. That is the question which the minority are at. Can you maintain that fraud? I say that the Senate of the United States ought to be astute, ought to be careful to look into the whole facts, to ascertain if there be no means by which this infamous fraud of the minority of the Legislature of Indiana shall be prevented from defeating the exercise of a constitutional duty, and thus prevent the representation of the State on this floor. The State had then, for two years, had only one Senator on this floor; and if those men had carried out their purpose, she would have been for two years more without another Senator, and one seat would have been vacant for four years, as her Legislature meets only biennially.

The Senate of the United States are urged not to inquire whether there is not some way by which this fraud can be defeated—for it is nothing but naked fraud; whether they will allow a portion of a legislative body, by mob violence, to induct men into that body, call it a Senate, make false records, and send them here for us to be bound by them. I will not be bound by them. It is due to the country, it is due to the State of Indiana, it is due to the great question, it is due to those eighty-three men who were constitutional electors of Indiana for the election of United States Senators and who voted for these gentlemen, that the Senate of the United States should obtain all these facts, and, if it be possible, lay their hands on the fraud, crush it, and vindicate the Constitution and laws and the right of Indiana to have two Senators on this floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, when I addressed the Senate briefly this morning, I purposely abstained from expressing any opinion whatever on the merits of this case; I purposely abstained from any attempt to discuss—I did not allude to—the merits of the case. All I asked was that the Senate should settle the question. My point was that it was right, that it was appropriate, that it was just; and that the State of Indiana, the sitting Senators, and the Senate had a right to demand that the question should be settled. To that point, and only to that, did I speak. I traveled over the record of the course which has been pursued in this case for the purpose of showing a dilatoriness which was unjustifiable; and I have heard no man contradict me.

The Senator from Louisiana corroborates the record which I gave to the Senate. It is true that the Senator from Louisiana tells us that the reason why, upon one occasion, the Senate would not proceed to its consideration was that there was a special order pending. Grant it; but this was a special order which had a claim to the consideration of the body, higher and above that then pending before the Senate. It was special; it was privileged by common parliamentary law; the other was only so by the vote of the Senate. That Senator and every Senator knows that it is the daily practice to override special bills or special questions before the Senate, and give the consideration of the body to other questions. We had the same special order to which the Senator alludes before us for our consideration when the President's Kansas message came in; and the ruling of the Chair was that that overrode it. There was a subject which overrode all special assignments. Every session, and almost every day, we postpone the consideration of subjects specially assigned, for the purpose of deciding other questions that may be, in our judgment, more important. It is an insufficient answer, therefore; no good answer that the Senator from Louisiana has given us, when he says we did not proceed to its consideration earlier because we had other special assignments. I repeat again, this subject was a special assignment above those.

Again, sir, he states, what the Senator from Georgia repeats, that this resolution could not come up without a minority on this floor meeting it with their opposition. True; but how meet it? Was there ever a word uttered by any man in the minority on this floor, in opposition to the consideration of this question, and the settlement of it, other than when it was first reported this year, when the Senator from Vermont was absent, not being able to be in his seat for a few days? No Senator, belonging to the minority on this floor, whom I have heard, has objected to the consideration of the question. I was not present, and I did not hear the discussions which took place at the last session of the last Congress; but I have looked at the records, and I find that the only objection which the Senator from Illinois made was simply that, according to the facts of the case, as presented on the record, the evidence proposed to be taken could not be used, and that there was, therefore, no need for taking it. He certainly did not, as I understood the Senator from Georgia by implication to intimate, oppose the resolution for the purpose of not settling the question. We know, sir, he was in favor of settling the question, and so stated; and if I am wrong, the Senator will correct me. He asked that the Senate should settle it then, because the Legislature of that State were in session, and they could act legitimately and according to the constitution, if in the opinion of the Senate they had not before done so.

But the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Georgia ask what harm could be done by postponing the question, and taking evidence? I answer, if the evidence had no bearing on the point in issue; if it was irrelevant; if it was evidence that could not properly be taken, then there was harm done, because you deprived the Legislature of that State of the power of acting when they were together, and they could not act again for two years. There was the harm done—a harm done to the State; a harm done to the parties interested; a harm done to the Senate.

Again, sir, the Senator from Georgia says I have thrown out certain intimations. I have intimated nothing but what I have stated plainly and distinctly, that there has been delay in this matter. There may have been delay in other questions of election; but I have never known the Senate to refuse to proceed to the consideration of such a question, when a large minority were in favor of so doing, and the parties themselves were stating that they asked it; and I believe both the Senators from Indiana have stated that they desired to have the question settled.

Up to this point I have not expressed an opinion on the merits of this case. I want to act fairly. I want to act as my judgment shall tell me is right, and I mean so to act. I stated, indeed, in the morning, that if there were legitimate facts to be proved, I would not vote against the investigation or against a resolution which should draw out those facts. I asked what were the facts on which the evidence was to be adduced? And now what is the evidence? I do not want any long resolutions, with numerous whereases, written and designed to cover up the point. What do gentlemen mean by inducing Senators in? State to me fairly and distinctly what you mean to prove, and, I repeat again, my vote shall be given for the resolution if you propose to prove legitimate facts which do not contradict a record. If you propose to contradict a record, I will not give a vote to obtain such evidence, because I do not believe we have by law, by equity, or by any rule, a right to introduce and use such evidence.

The Senator from Ohio says that there were three Senators of Indiana, or three persons, who were sworn in, inducted—that is the term—in an illegal manner into office on the day of the organization of the Legislature.

Mr. PUGH. I say that is what the sitting Senators claim.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, does not the record show that all the Senators were duly sworn? I so understand it. If I am wrong, I beg to be corrected.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the Journal.

Mr. HAMLIN. Am I right?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, I ask, for I want to know, if you can introduce parol evidence to contradict a record in that way, why may you not, on precisely the same reasoning, investigate the elections of those men as well as their qualifications? "Inducted into office" covers the whole. It no more covers the oath to be administered, than the manner in which they are elected at the polls, in my judgment. "Inducted into office" applies to every prerequisite known in their constitution; and you may, with just as much propriety, contradict the record in the one case as in the other.

But, sir, I want to know what the facts are. Outside of that, I am told—and now I appeal to the Senator from Indiana to tell me if I have the right information—that these are the facts: there were three persons claiming to be Senators; the Lieutenant Governor presided; another person alongside of him presided, who was elected by a majority of those who claimed to be Senators, and the oath of office to some portion of the Senate was administered by one of the justices of your supreme court, including these three persons. I hear that such is the fact. Now, then, is it not equally true—and I put the question to the Senator—that on the same day these identical three persons were sworn in by the Lieutenant Governor?

Mr. WILSON. By his direction.

Mr. HAMLIN. By his direction, as all the others were sworn. I ask if that be not so?

Mr. PUGH. That does not appear by the record.

Mr. HAMLIN. It does appear by the record. The record shows that they were duly sworn; there it is, "duly sworn." If it were necessary that they should be sworn by the direction of the Lieutenant Governor, your record corresponds with the fact. It does not state the detail, but it states the truth. Now, the point I make is this: that the sitting Senators, in their specifications, set forth a part of what took place on that day, but only a part. They affirm, what I believe to be true, that those three persons were there, whose title to seats was confirmed by the Senate afterwards. They were sworn in first by a justice of the supreme court of Indiana, and subsequently by the direction of the presiding officer. I ask the Senator from Indiana if that is so?

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no knowledge of any such fact.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that such is the fact; but still it is not material, in my judgment, whether such be the fact or not. If it be so, I take it that the Senator from Ohio would admit that the record then would be correct, and that he would not introduce parol evidence to contradict it.

Mr. PUGH. But you want parol evidence to prove the fact.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not want any such thing.

Mr. PUGH. That is your statement.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir. I am only making this statement for the purpose of showing, so far as I can understand, the intuity, and the entire want of necessity for taking any evidence on that matter. I say it is just precisely as much within the power of this body to go into the election of those Senators as it is to go into the manner in which they were sworn into office. The induction appears to every prerequisite to make them Senators; and you might, with just as much propriety, go into the election as go into the manner in which they were sworn. Still, if there are facts in the case outside of the records, and Senators will so state them to me, which can be proved to have a material bearing on this issue, I am perfectly willing to vote to have that evidence here, and I am willing to vote for a resolution that shall bring it here with a proper limitation of time; but I have heard nothing except on the point which I have stated.

The Senator from Louisiana was not as clear as he usually is, when he addressed the Senate this morning. He usually states his points with very great clearness and precision. He did not tell us on what point he wanted evidence, but he had a great deal to say about fraud and usurpation. Where does it all come from? Where is the evidence of all this? The Senator from Georgia censures the majority of the Senate, and the minority of the House of Representatives of Indiana, who refused to go into a joint convention on that day. I have no justification of them, but it is an old trick that is played in Indiana; and I believe the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] held his previous seat by precisely such a coup d'état. [Mr. BRIGHT dissented.] If he did not, others did, and my recollection is very clear, that on a previous occasion the Democrats ran away, and the Republicans were not quite so slow that they could not learn to travel the road their illustrious predecessors had traveled.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am against it.

Mr. HAMLIN. So am I. I agree with the Senator from Georgia there. I hold to no such acts of revolution. I justify them no more in friends than in opponents. While taking the record as it is, if I am not wrong, there was no legal constitutional meeting of the Legislature for the election of United States Senators, and that state of things was brought about by the non-attendance of these men. They have no justification from me, nor have those who taught them how to do it any either.

Again, it is said that the minority on this floor oppose action on this subject. We oppose no action. We ask for action. Are you going to pass your resolution to take evidence? Do it; only act. Are you going to decide on the case as it is? Do it; only act. That is the point to which I desired the attention of the Senate. I should not have alluded at all to the merits of the case if those who followed me this morning had not done so while I had not even alluded to the merits. We can just as well settle this matter to-day as at any time. We can settle it before our adjournment as well as at any time, and as a majority of the Senate shall determine the minority must acquiesce. All we ask is, that the matter shall be settled; and I repeat again, in justice to the sitting members here, it ought to be done from every consideration and from every view in which it presents itself to a disinterested and fair mind. They both ask it, and certainly neither of those Senators will accuse me of having said aught in relation to themselves or in any manner on this question, except to urge action on the Senate, and action now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire of the Senators from Ohio and Georgia, if they consider this election to have been a valid one without a previous resolution of the Legislature of some sort, prescribing the mode in which it should be conducted. I have not heard either of them say he thought it would be valid without some such resolution by the Senate and House of Representatives, that they would unite in grand committee for the purpose of making it; or can a convention called together for one purpose in Indiana, the purpose of counting the votes for Governor, proceed to elect a Senator without any notice to either body?

Mr. PUGH. I will state to the Senator that I have refrained from expressing an opinion. I endeavored to state what the parties claimed.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I do not hear any opinion from any member of the Judiciary Committee, that they consider this evidence at all material to determine whether the election was valid or not, I cannot see what they want evidence for. It may be for effect on the country, as has been suggested.

Mr. PUGH. Several members have said they thought it material. The Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Louisiana have said so.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator from Georgia said that if anything was to go to the country, he wanted to show a case of egregious fraud.

Mr. TOOMBS. I look on the facts sought to be elicited as material to a proper determination of the case.

Mr. SIMMONS. I cannot concede it to be so, if I understand the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution requires that the time, place, and manner of choosing Senators shall be prescribed by the Legislature. Congress, however, may prescribe another mode. The only restriction on the power of Congress in this respect is, that they shall not change the place of election fixed by the Legislature. I agree that if Congress made a law on the subject, it would override the legislation of the different States, as to the election of Senators, if we did not interfere with the place of the election; but in the absence of any law of Congress, is not the Legislature itself bound to agree in separate Houses, by some form or other, how they will elect a Senator, so that the people may know, and the members of the Legislature may know, when it is to be done? I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Georgia, if they believed that seventy-six members of the House of Representatives, without inviting the Senate, could elect a Senator? That number would be a majority of one hundred and fifty.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will state to the gentleman what my view is. It is alleged that, without the three members who have been spoken of, twenty-four Senators, being a majority of the Senate and a majority of the House of Representatives, did come willingly, by their own consent, into joint convention, and did elect the sitting members. If those three members were legally inducted into office, twenty-four was not a majority of the Senate of Indiana. If they were illegally inducted, twenty-four was a majority; and if this fact be established, both Houses were in convention by their own consent, competent to elect a Senator. That is the importance of the fact.

Mr. SIMMONS. To my mind, it does not follow, that if a majority of the two Houses got together without a resolution of the two branches, they could make such an election under the Constitution of the United States. That is my difficulty. If a resolution to go into a convention was passed by twenty-six out of fifty, or twenty-four out of forty-seven, if that was the whole number of members of the Senate of Indiana, it was no resolution at all under their constitution, because there was not a quorum present to pass it. That is my difficulty. I think it would require a vote of a quorum of each House, by a majority of those present, to agree to go into grand committee. If two thirds were present, a majority of those present in each House could pass a resolution to join the other House; but if twenty-four men only were present, supposing the Senate to consist of forty-seven, they could not make such a legal act. If that be the case, no evidence as to the right of those three Senators to their seats can have any bearing at all on this question. I think, judging from the practice of the States with which I have been acquainted, that there must be some mode prescribed. I agree that you can prescribe it five minutes before the election. It is not necessary that it should be a standing law; but the two branches of the Legislature cannot join for an election of Senator of the United States without the distinct action of each under the Constitution of the United States, if that Legislature consists of two Houses. That appears to me most conclusively.

Mr. PUGH. Was the Senator here when the Florida case was determined?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not.

Mr. PUGH. It was determined in that case, that where there was no law and no resolution prescribing the mode of election, the usage of similar elections in the State of Florida should govern. That was the unanimous determination of the Senate in that case.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not the case in Indiana. The constitution of Indiana prescribes what shall be a quorum of each branch. There may have been no such thing in Florida. If there was no constitutional provision in Florida prescribing that it should require two thirds of each House to make a quorum, there would be no difficulty.

Mr. HALE. I was present when the Florida case was settled, and I did not understand it as it has now been stated. The question there was whether an actual majority voted. It was no question of organization at all. There were some blank ballots cast, and there was not a majority of the whole number of members of the Legislature cast for the contestant, Mr. YULEE, who claimed the seat. He claimed that he had a majority, and the fact whether he had a majority or not turned upon the question whether blank ballots should be counted or rejected. That was the simple question in that case, and there was no other point decided in it. I have not seen the record since the vote was taken, but my recollection is, that the only question was whether blank votes should be counted or not.

Mr. PUGH. It certainly was a question whether blank ballots should be counted; and now I will show how material it is. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] when first elected to the Senate, received the vote of but half the members of the Legislature; but, according to the usage in Massachusetts, blank ballots were not counted. The Senator from Rhode Island's predecessor [Mr. JAMES] was elected in the same way. Those cases were examined, but according to the usage of the State of Rhode Island, in their Legislature, blank ballots were not counted, and therefore he was elected. In the case of the Senator from Florida, the contestant, Mr. YULEE, on the first ballot received the votes of half the members of the Legislature. All the ballots cast against him were blanks, and he said he was elected, and he cited the case from Massachusetts and the case from Rhode Island to show that he was elected, because nobody else was voted for. But the usage in the Florida Legislature being to regard a blank ballot as a vote against the affirmative, they went on, had another ballot, and another, and finally Mr. MALLORY was chosen. That question came up here; and we decided that the usage of every State Legislature should govern in all these proceedings. That was the decision. That is all I claim now. That is all the sitting members claim.

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator from Ohio does not mean to say that that is a similar case to this.

Mr. PUGH. The principle is the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, you can make a principle out of anything; but you do not mean, where there is a constitutional provision both in the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State, that you can override them by any usage about counting blank ballots or not counting them.

Mr. PUGH. I say the Constitution of the United States does not require the mode to be provided by law. It may be provided by usage. As to the other point, in regard to the quorum of two thirds, the Senator did not certainly hear what I said before, that it had been the established construction of the constitution in the Legislature of Indiana; and, as I am assured, the opinion of the attorney general and of the judges of the supreme court is to that effect, that the provision requiring two thirds to make a quorum does not apply to cases of election, but only to cases of legislation. I do not know whether it is a correct decision; but if it be so decided, it is material.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator from Ohio inform me whether or not it has been the usage of the Legislature of Indiana to elect in convention, which convention is authorized by concurrent vote of the two branches of the Legislature prescribing the time when that convention shall meet, and the purpose for which?

Mr. PUGH. I cannot answer that question. That is what I want to ascertain by testimony.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Cannot the Senator from Indiana tell?

Mr. SIMMONS. The record will show that. I did not intend to enter into this debate at all. I have not yet heard anybody intimate anything by which the real legality of this election can be changed by this evidence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senators from Indiana, if they will answer the question, whether or not heretofore the usage has been in the Legislature of Indiana for the election of Senators to be made in a convention appointed by a concurrent vote of the two branches of the Legislature, fixing the time and place, and other requisites of the convention?

Mr. BRIGHT. Until the formation of the new constitution in Indiana, there was a law prescribing the time and manner of electing United States Senators. That law was repealed. When the Legislature, at which my colleague and myself claim to have been elected, met, there was no law in force regulating the election of Senators. The practice under the old law was to bring the two Houses together by a joint resolution, or a concurrent resolution of the two Houses.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Had there been no election since the new constitution was formed?

Mr. BRIGHT. There had been no election of Senator since the new constitution was formed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then there was no usage.

Mr. BRIGHT. The usage prior to that time was for the President of the convention to adjourn it from time to time, or from day to day, with the assent of the convention, as was the case when my colleague and myself were elected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That usage was during the time the convention had been formed by a concurrent vote of the two Houses?

Mr. BRIGHT. That was the practice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was the preliminary to getting together.

Mr. BRIGHT. That was the preliminary.

Mr. PUGH. I wish simply to state what I presume the Senator from Maine is desirous of ascertaining—to draw the distinction between the law and the usage. Under the old constitution the law was, that the joint convention assembled by joint resolution. The usage was, without any law, that when in that convention the presiding officer had arbitrary control over it of adjourning it from time to time, and hour to hour, and he never would entertain a resolution from anybody.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then there has been neither law nor usage under the new constitution.

Mr. FITCH. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to call the attention of the Senators from Georgia and Ohio, who are members of the Judiciary Committee, to one fact. They say that where there is no law, the usage should govern. Now, do not both the Senators from Indiana say that before their new constitution was adopted, and in every election of Senators under that constitution since it was a State, the usage was to call this convention by a joint resolution of the two Houses?

Mr. FESSENDEN. A law requiring it.

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is not that a usage? And when they were so called together, they adjourned from day to day by order of the chairman or presiding officer, and now they come together without any law.

Mr. PUGH. That is the mistake the Senator makes. There was a joint convention, and the question we shall have ultimately to decide is, whether the joint convention was lawfully constituted for this purpose. It was undoubtedly a joint convention to count the vote for Governor.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator might have waited till I got to that point. What I say is this, that, according to the usage of the State of Indiana, as I learn it now from both her Senators, prior to the adoption of the new constitution, when the convention met, called together by a joint resolution in pursuance of law, it was then competent, it was usual, for the presiding officer to adjourn the convention so called together, from day to day. You claim now the same authority under this usage to adjourn from day to day, that you did when you had a law getting a convention together. If you claim that, are you not bound also to come to the other usage, and is not that as binding, that your convention shall be called together by a joint resolution? You cannot escape one horn of the dilemma without falling upon the other. If you go by the usage, you must have a law or some provision by a joint resolution of each House by a quorum of each House for a convention, or else you must give up your plan of adjournment from day to day under the old usage. You must take both branches of the usage if you take one.

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me the Senator does not understand the point, if he will pardon me for saying so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I cannot understand such distinctions; but I will hear the explanation, because I really want to understand what the point is.

Mr. PUGH. The statement, as I understand it, of the Senator from Indiana is, that the joint convention, before the present constitution of Indiana, was to be constituted by a joint resolution. That is all the law required. The law said nothing about adjournments; but the usage was to adjourn them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that.

Mr. PUGH. That is all the force I give to the usage, that in the absence of any declaration of the law, one way or the other, there was a usage by which the convention could adjourn by direction of the presiding officer. Now, the Senator from Rhode Island asks me how I can make a joint convention without a joint resolution? The constitution of Indiana made it, and the constitution was higher than a joint resolution. It bound both Houses. That is the way I get a joint convention.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Ohio if the constitution of Indiana made this a joint convention for the purpose of electing a Senator, or of counting the votes for Governor?

Mr. PUGH. That is a question to be answered afterwards. I have not stated what my opinion on that question is. I have endeavored to state the question for the purpose of showing how the evidence claimed by the sitting members tends to elucidate it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me, I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana whether or not, in this so-called convention, or in this process which was gone through—I do not know that you can call it a convention, for I understand the language of the constitution of Indiana is somewhat the same as the language of the Constitution of the United States, that the votes for the Governor shall be counted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the presence of the two Houses—it was not the custom of the two Houses to meet in the Representative Hall for the purpose of seeing the votes counted, by a concurrent resolution passed for that purpose, or did they go in just as they pleased when the time came? What has been the habit?

Mr. BRIGHT. I will state what I understood to have been the practice in both cases. Prior to the adoption of the present constitution of Indiana, as I stated when I was up before, we had a law prescribing the time and manner of electing United States Senators.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My present question has no reference to electing Senators.

Mr. BRIGHT. I shall come to that in a moment. That law was repealed. I may say, however, that the practice under that law was to bring the two Houses together by a concurrent vote, and being together the presiding officer had the control of the convention, and adjourned it from day to day. On one occasion he adjourned it, I think, as far distant as the fourth day from the day of its coming together. When the Legislature met, which it is claimed elected my colleague and myself, there was no law on the subject; but the new constitution provided that the Senate and House of Representatives should meet on a day fixed, for the purpose of counting the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor. The convention met on that day. The presiding officer adjourned it to a future day; and in the interval the question was submitted to the district judge of the United States, and a majority of the supreme judges of the State as to the right of the Legislature, under that adjournment, to elect a Senator. They gave it as their opinion in writing that it was not only their right, but their duty, to do so. When the day arrived, the election took place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That does not answer the question which I put to the Senator. The question which I put was this: what has been the practice with reference to meeting in order to count the votes for Governor? Has that been done in pursuance of a concurrent vote of the two branches ordinarily?

Mr. BRIGHT. It has been done as was proposed to be done in the case I have just mentioned, by a notice on the part of the House to the Senate that they would proceed at a certain hour to count the votes for Governor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did the Senate then vote to proceed?

Mr. BRIGHT. No vote was taken; but there was an invitation to the Senate to attend in the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of performing that duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A specific purpose?

Mr. BRIGHT. You may call it a specific purpose if you please.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the practice to be somewhat similar to the one we have had in our State; and I do not believe there ever was a time when a man there would have taken an election from a convention called to count, as we call them, the proxies for general officers. We never believed such a convention, such a grand committee, as we call it, had power to elect a Senator or any other officer. Even when there was a Senator to be chosen, and a grand committee was convened to make election of a State officer, if the resolution asking the Senate to join the House did not specify that a United States Senator was to be elected, we always had to separate in order to get a resolution to go into the election of a Senator. I suppose this is the invariable practice everywhere; I presume it must have been in Indiana.

The Senator from Indiana has repeated that the usage under the government of Indiana had been to get a concurrent vote of the two Houses to join in this convention, if that is what you call it; and without such a concurrent vote, I think no man will pretend that that was a legal convention for electing a Senator under the usage of that State. I do not dispute but that you might get judges of the Supreme Court individually to give an opinion, but I do not think that would be entitled to much weight with the Senator from Ohio, if it happened to be against his individual opinion.

I cannot see the least effect that the right of the three State Senators spoken of to their seats can have on the legality of this election. I have been trying to see it from all that has been said by the members of the Judiciary Committee who have spoken, and I think they can see points as clearly as any other men in this body. I do not hear them present the point in so clear a manner as I know they always do when they see it themselves. Neither the Senator from Ohio nor the Senator from Georgia ever sees a point clearly that he does not make me see it. I am not quite so thick-headed but that they can drive it into me with their sharp sticks. [Laughter.] But they cannot make me see the point which they make in this case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Having presented my views in regard to this question on a former occasion, I should not say a word upon it now, but for the very singular position assumed by the Senators from Ohio, Louisiana, and Georgia.

Mr. BIGGS. Will the Senator from Illinois give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir, I shall occupy but a few minutes. The Senators from Ohio, Louisiana, and Georgia, have assumed the position that, because I was opposed to the adoption of a particular resolution, I was therefore opposed to settling this question. Why, sir, I have urged the settlement of it from the beginning. Do they mean that every person is to be charged with delaying the settlement of a question, or the passage of a law unless he goes for it? That would be a very convenient mode of putting Senators in the wrong. A proposition is brought in which you believe to be wrong, which you think ought not to pass, and because you object to its passage, you are therefore opposed to its consideration. An extraordinary position, indeed!

I have urged the passage of a resolution on this subject. At the last session of Congress I moved, as an amendment to the resolution of the committee, a proposition affirming it to be the duty of the Senate to proceed immediately to the determination of the case. With what face can these Senators now get up and charge me with delaying a decision because I would not agree to their proposition? Why did not they agree to mine? I moved an amendment declaring that the Senate ought to proceed at once to a decision of the question. Who prevented its being proceeded with? The majority of this body. That was the pending motion at the last session, as it is now by the amendment I have offered to the present resolution.

It is said, that if we had not made objection at the last session, the testimony would have been taken by this time. How do you know it would have been taken? It is said that it might have been taken in vacation. The resolution you offered was illimitable then, as it is now. It prescribed no time when the testimony was to be taken. You ask, if we wanted an early decision, why did we not assent to the resolution reported by the committee? Because the Senate of Indiana sent their request here that the Senate of the United States, at the last Congress, would settle the question, so that the Legislature might proceed to another election, if this should be declared invalid; and sending out this commission to take testimony would necessarily postpone the decision beyond the then session of the Legislature. I urged that the matter should be disposed of at an early day; and I urged it simply because the members of the Legislature of Indiana, and the Senate of that State, as a body, thought proper to communicate their papers to me, and requested me to lay them before the Senate. I felt called upon, therefore, to endeavor to carry out their views, and obtain an early decision of the question, if I could.

But it is intimated that perhaps we are afraid of the light. Such intimations and insinuations may be thrown out in any and every case. It has been illustrated very happily by the Senator from Vermont. A party in court who wants a continuance, who has a bad cause and wants time, always asks for a continuance; and he is very ready to throw out the insinuation that his adversary in court is opposed to light. Sir, we are not opposed to any light that can be shed on this case, and we are not opposed to any testimony that can have any possible bearing on the case; but it is because we want action, and because the effect of this resolution is delay, that we oppose it, and for no other reason in the world. I thought the case might have been settled at the last session of Congress; I thought it might have been settled at the executive session convened after the 4th of March; and it was therefore that I opposed the passage of this resolution then.

I think the question as to the three Senators of Indiana, whose case has been alluded to, wholly immaterial. Do you assume that the majority of the members of the Legislature of a State may, without any action of the different branches, assemble, and make an election of United States Senators? I understand the Senator from Georgia to assume that position. If he does, what is the materiality of this testimony? We all admit that a majority of the whole number of members constituting the Indiana Legislature met together and elected the sitting Senators. Nobody disputes that. If that made an election, for what do you want testimony? What matter whether the three members were in or out? Eighty-three is a majority of one hundred and fifty as well as of one hundred and forty-seven. It is wholly immaterial then. For what purpose do you want the testimony on this view of the case?

But, sir, I wish to put the facts in regard to those three Senators properly before the Senate. I hold in my hand the Journal of the Senate of Indiana. One half the Senators of that State held for four years, the other half for two; consequently half the Senators were holding over. This is the entry upon the Journal of the Senate in regard to the new Senators:

"The following Senators, elected since the last session of the General Assembly, appeared, and produced their credentials, and were duly sworn, as required by the constitution."

Then follow the names. That shows the qualification of the newly elected Senators duly according to the constitution. Now you go outside of the record, and say that is not true; and how do you state the fact? It is stated, and that I may be accurate, I will read the statement, which is made by one of the sitting Senators:

"That in the organization of said State Senate, according to the constitution, laws, and usage of the State, the Lieutenant Governor presides, and superintends the admission of the members, and the taking the required oaths of office. That upon this occasion, in violation of such constitution, laws, and usage, the said three members, who were without the expressly required credentials of election, the certificate of the proper and only returning officer, and whose seats were also known to be contested, and on grounds of fraud, also known to be true, were, by a presiding officer, chosen for the purpose by the members of the Senate, designated as Republicans, contrary to all law, and by naked wrong, directed, notwithstanding, to be sworn in, and for the clear purpose, illegal and fraudulent in fact, of defeating an election of Senators of the United States."

That is the allegation of the sitting Senators. Non constat, however, that all of those Senators were not sworn in afterwards on the same day; it is not negated at all. Now, what is the fact about it? I have here the Daily Sentinel, the administration paper at that time and now, at the seat of government of Indiana, giving an account of this proceeding. It is outside of the record, but I state it in order to show what the real fact outside would be, and to meet these assertions. That is my only object in stating it. I do not state it as evidence legitimate for the Senate, although it is in what I believe to be the official paper of that State.

"The Senate met at nine o'clock, a. m. Lieutenant Governor Willard, in accordance with the provision of the constitution and of all well established precedent that has prevailed ever since our organization as a State, took his seat as Presiding Officer of that body."

"When we entered the Senate hall, yesterday morning, the novel spectacle of two Presiding Officers seated at the President's desk, and two Secretaries, both engaged in calling the roll of Senators, presented itself to our view. The Chamber was crowded to suffocation, and it was with difficulty that we could make our way to a position where we could see and hear what was going on."

"The Republican Senators, under this temporary organization, proceeded to the election of Secretary, Assistant Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, the old Secretary in the mean time calling the roll of those counties from which the Republican Senators were elected, who refused to answer to their names, as did the Democratic Senators when called by the Secretary pro tem, appointed by the Republicans. After the turmoil and confusion consequent upon the joint action of two Senators, both doing business upon one floor, had somewhat subsided, members began to get upon their feet and define positions."

"The Black Republicans were exceedingly pot-valiant at first; but as they proceeded to compare notes, and take something like a cool and deliberate view of their position, there was an evident disposition to show the white feather."

I pass over some sentences not material to the facts; they are comments of the editor:

"Messrs. Stevens and Yaryan were frank enough to admit that the Republicans had placed themselves in a peculiar and unprecedented position, and that they had done so to block certain games which it was rumored the Democrats had planned for the election of United States Senators. It appears, from the confessions of these gentlemen, that Madam Rumor, the precious beldam, had announced that it was Governor Willard's intention, as Presiding Officer of the Senate, at its organization, to decide against the admission of the Senators from Marion, Fulton, Fountain, and Rush to their seats, which are contested; which would, during the pendency of the question of their election, produce a tie in the Senate, and thus enable the Democrats, by the casting vote of the President, to bring on an election of United States Senators."

"As if to knock from under them the last prop upon which they relied to justify themselves in their factious proceedings, Governor Willard condescended to give his assurance in advance, that he had made up his mind that the Senators from Marion, Fulton, and Fountain, should be sworn in and admitted to their seats, whenever they presented themselves for that purpose. In regard to Dr. Cooper, of Rush, he had decided differently, believing that the credentials which he presented were not such as the law required—or, in other words, that it was not, properly, a certificate of election."

"Mr. Murray, of Howard, openly acknowledged that when the Republicans decided upon their present course, they acted under a misapprehension of the designs and intentions of the Democrats, and was in favor of some conciliatory measure to remove the difficulty that stood in the way of an organization of the Senate."

The account goes on and shows that the Senate adjourned to half past two o'clock in the afternoon. Here is the account of what they did in the afternoon:

"A good dinner, and a calm consideration of the revolutionary and unjustifiable position they had taken, seemed to have wrought a wonderful change in the minds of the Republican Senators. At the afternoon session they quietly abandoned their extraordinary proceedings by general consent, and when the Senate was called to order by the President, all of those who had not previously done so, presented themselves at the President's desk, and, with the exception of Doctor Cooper, of Rush, were respectively sworn in by Judge Cookins."

"Thus, an affair which, at the time of the morning adjournment, threatened to protract discussion and delay the business of the session, proved to be nothing more than a harmless tempest in a tea-pot, which passed off as quickly as it had been raised."

It will be observed that, according to this account, Governor Willard stated that he would not direct Doctor Cooper to be sworn unless by a vote of the Senate. The Journal of the Senate shows that in the afternoon when they met at half past two o'clock,

"Mr. Murray offered the following resolution:

"That Stanley Cooper be now sworn as Senator from the county of Rush."

He is one of the three. Various motions were made to adjourn; to lay on the table, &c., until finally a vote was obtained on the question directly, and the resolution that he be sworn in was adopted by 28 ayes to 17 noes—a majority of 9.

"So the resolution was agreed to. Mr. Cooper came forward and was sworn as required by the constitution, by Judge Cookins of the supreme bench."

I only state these facts to show that although it may be strictly true, as the sitting member from Indiana has stated, that this took place in the morning, yet, in point of fact, the record shows that the three Senators were duly sworn, and it is unnecessary to go into this proof; it will not establish anything when you get it here. Suppose you show the fact that an improper officer was there: we insist that it would amount to nothing in any point of view. I state these outside facts as the shortest way to get at the real facts, and to show that there is nothing to be gained by delaying this case for the purpose of taking testimony. I observe that the Senate is anxious to vote, and I shall not detain them. The Senator from Georgia, on the present occasion, has spoken of fraud; and he wants to know how the Senate of Indiana was organized? I will read to the Senator from Georgia, in answer to his own remarks of to-day, what he spoke two or three weeks ago. He was not speaking about Indiana then; he was speaking about Kansas. The cases are not exactly alike. One is the case of the Legislature of Kansas; the other is the case of the Legislature of Indiana. The Senate, of course, will bear that distinction in mind. Here is what he said:

"If there has been fraud in the election of members of the Senate or House of Representatives of the Legislature of Kansas, the matter can be passed upon by those bodies respectively when the State shall have been admitted into the Union. That is the tribunal set up by law for the decision of such questions. There, and there alone, they can be decided. This body, I trust, will never undertake to decide whether or not there have been frauds in the elections of Kansas."

"Every legislative body is the proper tribunal to decide questions affecting the election of its members. It is the only tribunal which the experience of twenty centuries has shown can be safely intrusted with any such power. The ablest of English jurists, the ablest parliamentarians, have always held—and we find it deeply imbedded in the privileges of the British Parliament, in the privileges conferred on each House of Congress by our Constitution, in the privileges of every State Legislature, and inherent in every town meeting—that a legislative body is to judge for itself of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members. Without this principle, representative bodies could not live an hour."

Mr. TOOMBS. Go on and read to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here it is:

"If you have a case of fraud in the election of members of the Legislature, take the question there for decision. If you have such a case in regard to the election of a Representative in Congress, take it to the other House. If you have such a case as to the election of a member of this body, bring it here."

Mr. TOOMBS. That is it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well. I will take the Senator there. I understood the Senator to say he wanted to know how Senators of the State of Indiana were inducted into office, not how the sitting members came here. I understand that he places his ground on the organization of the Senate of Indiana, which, as I have read, he declared to be the proper body to settle such questions. In determining the election of a Senator here, I admit you may inquire into his election, but not into the election of the men who sent him here.

Mr. TOOMBS. I presume the Senator from Illinois does not agree with me on the views contained in that speech; nor does he agree with me to-day. If he believes they are the same cases, why did he not agree then? He knows very well, as every Senator who hears me knows, that the principles which he has read from my speech are clear, sound, and indisputable. In the examination of the credentials of a member who sits here, we are authorized to inquire, not (as has been stated frequently by me on this floor in this very case) into the elections, qualifications, and returns, of any man in the Indiana Legislature. I have at no time so held; and that Senator knows it, or ought to know it, and I believe he does know it; but it is not convenient for him to state it. It has been again and again reiterated. My friend from Louisiana, this morning, has argued the same thing. We have again and again cited the principle that a contest for a member of the Legislature in Kansas or Indiana, or anywhere, must be determined by the Legislature. If a question arises as to the proper election of a Senator of the State of Indiana, or in the Legislature of Kansas, it belongs to the Senators of those States, duly elected and inducted into office, to determine it. If the case arises in the election of a member of the House of Representatives of those States, it belongs to that House to decide it. If a question arises in the election of a member of the other House of Congress, that body is to settle it. If a question arises as to the election of a member to the Senate of the United States, it is to be settled here.

Now it becomes a question for this body to determine, and what we seek by this testimony is to ascertain, whether the Senate of Indiana was legally constituted. If the Senator cannot see the difference between that and an inquiry into the elections, qualifications, and returns of the members of the State Legislature, I cannot make him comprehend it. My friend from Louisiana has to-day put the illustration which I put last spring—suppose a mob comes to this House, and places in the chair a President of their own, and he illegally and unconstitutionally swears in pretenders as Senators: have you not a right to inquire whether the acts of such a body are the acts of the United States Senate? Suppose sixty men should be brought here by mob violence to-night, and take possession of these seats: is there a tribunal on earth before whom a question involving the validity of the body was brought who would not declare it void?

Mr. WADE. I am with you there, and I want you to carry to Kansas the same doctrine.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir, I carry it to Kansas, and everywhere else. I stand on a universal principle, one that I argued in the case of the Senator from Iowa, against the decision of the Senate it is true. I maintained his title, Black Republican though he was, because I believed he stood on right. I did not then inquire into the qualifications, elections, or returns of members of the Iowa Legislature; but I held that they were in convention, that the adjournment of the convention was legal, and that even if it had been illegal he was elected by persons legally entitled to elect a member of this body.

Now, I desire to know whether, in Indiana, men have been inducted into office as members of the State Senate illegally, by a mob, in violation of the Constitution and of right. I desire to hear testimony on that point. That accusation is made. I have always understood the opponents of a motion to continue for want of materiality, to admit the facts. It is a demurrer to the evidence; it admits the truth of the evidence. If you admit the truth of the allegations of the sitting members, I am ready for a decision now. If you put this on legal principles, the demurrer admits the facts demurred to. If these facts be demurred to, I am ready for the issue, and I presume the Senate is. If, contrary to the constitution, and contrary to the law, with the fraudulent intention of defeating an election, they brought in three persons who were not entitled to be inducted into office, I am ready to meet the issue. I stand on the same principles in Kansas, Iowa, and Indiana. I put it on the same great principles. The House must determine for itself, but we must determine whether it is a Legislature. Suppose Senators should be sent up here by a body claiming to be a Legislature under the Topeka constitution: they may have as fair a record as the others. All they have to do, according to the Senator from Illinois, is to make the record fair, and that is not to be inquired into—show it in print, and it is sufficient. I am bound by no record if there be an allegation of fraud. It is said these three men were legally sworn in. If that, on inquiry, turn out to be true, there is an end of the point. If the statement he makes be true, that is an end of that point. If it is not true, it controls my judgment, and is an additional reason for giving this seat where it ought to go, according to the laws of the United States, and according to the rights of Indiana.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the Senator from Georgia sits down, I wish to ask him a question in regard to a position he takes—not that I mean to debate the question. Does he hold that an election by a majority of the members of the two branches when they are assembled, makes a good election, no matter how they get together?

Mr. TOOMBS. It does make a difference if they get together fraudulently, with an intent to deceive. Such circumstances would control me. If they get together privately, without notice, it would control me. The right is subject to a great many limitations. I say I will look at the circumstances; and I ask the Senate to criticize closely for some means by which to give to those men, entitled by the Constitution and laws to elect Senators, the free exercise of that right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The substance of my question is, whether the Senator holds that no legislative action is necessary in order to make a convention for that purpose legal?

Mr. TOOMBS. I do, and always have held it.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. BIGGS rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BIGGS. I presume we shall not be able to take a vote now; and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will abstain from saying anything if we can get the question.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 21.

Mr. STUART. I have only a few words to say on this subject. I have sat here all day listening with pleasure to Senators who urged the necessity of prompt action on this subject, and I barely wish to suggest that, perhaps, if we were to take a vote on the questions that are presented, we should satisfy the whole Senate by the promptness of our action. I hope that we shall vote at once, and determine what shall be done on this question. I only suggest that, in my view of it, we should pass this resolution, inasmuch as the committee recommend it—it is the organ of the body—limiting the time within which the testimony should be taken, and specifying the objects for which it should be taken. The committee ought to be able to designate to the Senate what facts are necessary to be ascertained. Direct the inquiry to those particular facts, and limit the time within which they shall be inquired into, and I shall vote for the resolution. I hope that will be done.

Mr. GREEN. It has been intimated that the majority of the Judiciary Committee have not expressed any particular reason why they desire to have this evidence. Being on that committee, I will say that I desire it, and I desire to have it for this reason; if we cannot go behind a record at all, then the two sitting members are here legally and beyond all possibility of expulsion. They bring a record on which they are admitted and on which they take their seats. The protestants say that that record is not true, that there are certain other things which invalidate that record. The sitting members say that the allegations made by the protestants are not correct, and that the reference they make to a so-called record of the Senate of the State of Indiana is not correct. Questions of fact in each case look behind the record. If the one can be inquired into, so can the other; and no respectable lawyer in this body will assert that when fraud is imputed to any record, it may not be inquired into.

I know it has been said here in debate that by the constitution of the State of Indiana nothing was a Senate but two thirds of its members. If so, the three members of whom so much has been said were sworn in illegally; there never was a Senate to admit them; there never was a Senate to do any act, to elect a presiding officer, and the man who dared to take the chair not being the Lieutenant Governor appointed by the constitution was guilty of a usurpation. Who put him there? Each House may choose its own presiding officer in the absence of the officer designated by the constitution. What is the House? The objectors say that nothing constitutes the Senate but a majority of two thirds. You never had it, and consequently you never had a presiding officer, and the swearing in of the three Senators was null and void.

Mr. COLLAMER. All the Senate were there regularly, except those three.

Mr. GREEN. Were they in that organization? To be present at a place does not constitute a man a part of its organization.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Lieutenant Governor was there presiding, and they were all sworn in.

Mr. GREEN. I understand. I have attended mass meetings, and I have attended the meetings of Congress. If one half this body refuse to participate, but stand aloof, and never come forward, and the other half choose to throw themselves into an organic shape, if they do not do it according to the Constitution and the law, without reference to the others, it is null and void.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Missouri will allow me to interrupt him. The Journal shows that on the swearing in of one of these three members, the yeas and nays were taken—the Lieutenant Governor presiding—and the vote was 23 to 19. He does not certainly contend that that was not a Senate.

Mr. GREEN. At what time was that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. On the same day.

Mr. GREEN. After dinner, was it not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. I remember it all distinctly. I am taken by surprise in nothing in regard to this question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was before the election of United States Senators.

Mr. GREEN. Yes; but how? Did twenty of them get in before dinner? That is what fixes the time when the two illegally got in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator takes that view, the Senate was never organized; and how can he maintain that the sitting Senators here were elected? It would require a Senate, I suppose, to elect them.

Mr. GREEN. I am answering an argument that has been made on the other side, that nothing less than two thirds could constitute a Senate to do anything. I say that is not a correct position. A majority of the members present may do certain things, and make themselves an organic body, though the constitution may say, in express words, that two thirds shall constitute a quorum to do certain legislative business.

What is a Senate? The constitution says fifty members, a majority of whom are the body; but when the constitution requires a specific number for certain legislative purposes, that number must be there. When it has no reference to those specific purposes, the majority of the members present is the Senate; and so far as this record is concerned, the Senator from Illinois need not read that, for he knows full well that as he attacks the record on which the sitting members rely, the sitting members attack the record on which the objectors rely. Here is an equal case, both of which demand evidence. The Constitution of the United States leaves it to the States to fix the time, place, and manner of choosing Senators in Congress; reserving, however, the privilege of exercising two of these powers—the manner and the time; saying expressly that, as to the place, Congress shall never interfere; but Congress has never deemed it proper to exercise either one of those powers, still leaving it with the State. It is admitted that the constitution of Indiana is silent on the subject; it is admitted they have no law on the subject. If they have no law and no constitutional provision, it is a matter which rests on parol. How ought you to do it? According to the custom, or the common law, on that subject in the State of Indiana, it is a matter that rests on parol.

Perhaps I shall be answered by saying that the joint convention kept a record, and that the record of that joint convention will prove it. I answer no, it will not prove it, and for this palpable reason: any record kept not according to the constitution or law, is no more than my word or my recorded statement, or any writing by any man; and there is no part of the constitution of Indiana, or of the Constitution of the United States, that requires a record to be kept in joint convention. If they kept a record in joint convention, it is no record in a legal, technical case; it is simply a putting down on paper, as any individual would have a right to do, and as the paper from which the Senator from Illinois read, did, published in the town of Indianapolis. It is no legal record unless kept in pursuance of some provision of law or of the constitution, and hence the custom of Indiana cannot be proven by any record.

We then want parol evidence for two purposes: first, to prove the custom, to prove the habit, to prove the heretofore existing manner; and, second, as the sitting members believe, to attack even the record of the State Senate, and prove that that is a falsehood; in other words, that what purports to be a record of the Senate was not the act of the Senate, and that half a dozen men getting together, sending up what they call a record, does not preclude us from inquiring into the fact, whether that is a record of a branch of the Legislature of Indiana. It is true, that, not being attacked, the presumption would be that it was the record; but when it is attacked, it is competent for us to inquire into it, and see whether it be true, or not true; and that is all this resolution proposes. We do not prejudice this case; we do not pretend to say there ever was a Senate in the State of Indiana; but we do say a case is presented requiring investigation, and that it is legally competent to take evidence to ascertain the facts put in issue. That is all I say; and I therefore have expressed my hearty concurrence in this resolution. I rose simply for the purpose of stating that it met my previous concurrence in the committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I beg leave to suggest to the honorable the Senate of the United States, that we are here about fifty in number, and, with the exception of half a dozen, I think, all of us are, or have been, lawyers, and many of us judges. We have spent four hours upon this question, and I wish to submit whether the Senate does not think that any court in Christendom would have been able to arrive at a conclusion before this or by this time as to the question whether we are ready to give our judgment now on this case, or should postpone it for the purpose of taking some other evidence. I hope we may have the question.

Mr. HUNTER. It is manifest that the Senate is not full; and when a vote is taken on a question of this nature the seats ought to be filled. I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow, at some hour which may be convenient: I suggest one o'clock. [Very well.]

Mr. SEWARD. I will state, before the Senate adjourns, that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois shall not prevail, I intend to submit an amendment, providing that "such evidence shall be returned to the Senate within thirty days from the passage of this resolution."

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until tomorrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SLIDELL, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 15, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. MORSELL.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, inclosing communications addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of an appropriation to refund to the vice consul of Sweden and Norway, at Norfolk, Virginia, the sum of $749 92, paid by him to the United States navy-yard at Gosport, for repairs of the Norwegian bark Ellen, on the occasion of that vessel putting into Norfolk to land passengers saved from the wreck of the steamer Central America; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed; and the communications inclosed severally referred to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DEBATE IN COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN], submitted on Monday last, to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after the passage of this resolution all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall be strictly confined to the bill or resolution directly submitted to the committee, except that Monday night, Wednesday night, and Friday night, of each week, be, and they are hereby, set apart for the discussion of matters arising out of the condition of the Union generally, or such other matters as gentlemen may be disposed to discuss.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The resolution has not yet been received. The question is on suspending the rules.

Mr. WARREN. I believe the motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WARREN. Well, sir, I hope the House understands the resolution. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Arkansas will modify his resolution by adding at the end: "and at such night sessions no vote shall be taken upon any matter of business," I shall be very glad to support it.

Mr. WARREN. I will accept the modification, certainly. I have no objection to any amendment the House may choose to make. My only object is to get the matter before the House.

Mr. MILLSON. If this resolution is adopted we might as well abolish the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union altogether.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask to have the 31st and 134th rules read.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the House will suspend the rules, and receive the resolution. If we are going to have buncombe speeches, let us have them at night.

The 31st rule was read, as follows:

"31. When any member is about to speak in debate, or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise from his seat, and respectfully address himself to 'Mr. Speaker;' and shall confine himself to the question under debate, and avoid personality."

Mr. WARREN. I cannot see what object the gentleman had in view in having that rule read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The Clerk read the 134th rule, as follows:

"In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the bills shall be taken up and disposed of in their order on the Calendar; but when objection is made to the consideration of a bill, a majority of the committee shall decide, without debate, whether it shall be taken up and disposed of, or laid aside; provided that general appropriation bills, and, in time of war, bills for raising men or money, and bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills, at the discretion of the committee; and when demanded by any member, the question shall first be put in regard to them."

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 139, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burnett, Burns, Ezra Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cockerill, James Craig, Davis of Mississippi, Foley, Garrett, Gillis, Greenwood, Thomas L. Harris, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kelly, Landy, Lawrence, Letcher, Peyton, Phelps, Ready, Rangan, Reilly, Sandidge, Seales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Trippe, Ward, Warren, Watkins, Werten-dyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clingman, John Cochran, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Dammell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, Jenkins, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stalworth, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elithu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Willson, Winslow, Woodson, and Zollcoffer—139.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Pending the above call,

Messrs. STEVENSON and CLEMENS asked leave to vote, having been outside the bar when their names were called, but objection was made.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report to the House a joint resolution making an appropriation for the payment of expenses of investigating committees of the House of Representatives. This resolution appropriates the sum of $35,000 to meet the necessary expenses of these special committees. The House have raised these special committees, and, in doing so, have incurred expense. There is no money in the contingent fund of the House to pay these expenses. A chairman of one of these committees submitted a resolution a few days ago, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. As chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I addressed a letter to the several chairmen of these committees, one to the Sergeant-at-Arms, and one to the Clerk of the House. I have ascertained that there is required to pay for expenses already incurred the sum of $35,000, and this expense has been incurred by only two or three of these special committees.

There is no money out of which to meet these expenses. Witnesses have been brought from a great distance, and they are here in town; but there is no money out of which to pay them. It is necessary, therefore, if these committees are to be continued in existence, that money should at once be appropriated for their expenses. The resolution I have reported appropriates money for these expenses as far as they have gone. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the resolution be received and immediately considered and put on its passage. If there be objection, I shall move for a suspension of the rules.

There was no objection; and the resolution was read a first and second time by its title, and then read in extenso.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, what will be the probable expense of these special committees if they continue their work to the end, calculating on the ratio of the expense which has been incurred already.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I believe that there are seven special committees in this House, perhaps a larger number. It is understood that the Judiciary Committee is about to bring before the House the subject of an impeachment of one of the judges of the United States. The committee on the Lecompton constitution has power to send for persons and papers to Kansas. The committee on the accounts and official conduct of the Doorkeeper, the Lawrence, Stone & Co. committee, and the Fort Snelling committee, have made considerable progress. The Clerk has paid out of the contingent fund, for their purposes, some two or three thousand dollars. This contingent fund is intended for the ordinary expenses of the House, and that two or three thousand dollars must be re-funded.

My own opinion is, that $35,000 will cover the expenses already incurred, and which will be incurred, provided the other committees do not act. If the other committees act, and send for persons and papers, $100,000 will not foot the bill. I do not think $150,000 will cover the expense of the work which has been cut out by the House for these special committees. If the work goes no further than it has done already, supposing it shall end here, I think, and the committee also are of the opinion, that $35,000 will cover the expense.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will indulge me with an inquiry. I would be gratified if the gentleman, in stating the amount in gross which he supposes will be incurred by these committees, would set off to each committee something like what each one would require, so that the House may understand the basis of his estimate.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Except what is asked for, I have given merely an opinion, and that opinion is founded upon the work which is cut out for each committee. If the committee on the Lecompton constitution deem it proper to send to Kansas for persons and papers, any gentleman can make up an opinion of what the cost will be. I have given what I believe will be the probable cost of these committees, if their investigations continue; and it is only the expression of my opinion on the subject in answer to the gentleman from Arkansas. So, also, in regard to the Committee on the Judiciary. If that committee go into the subject of impeachment, and send to Texas and other places for witnesses and papers, it is a mere matter of opinion how much it will cost. The gentleman from Arkansas asked for my opinion, and I give it as a matter of opinion merely, that it will require $100,000 to pay the expenses of those committees, if they finish the work for which they were appointed by the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I received a note from the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, asking for an estimate of the expenses which might be incurred in the investigations before the Committee on the Judiciary. Since that time the Judiciary Committee have had no meeting, and if they had they have not reached that point in the case to which the gentleman refers, that they could make anything like an estimate which would be satisfactory to themselves or the House. Therefore I made no reply, and consequently any conjecture which may be indulged in by the gentleman must be simply his own, and I presume he could know no more about it than a member of the Judiciary Committee would know, and that is the merest guess in the world. I do not know how many witnesses that committee may see fit to bring before it, or how far they will have to travel; and in the absence of such information it was utterly impossible to reply to the questions addressed to us by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STANTON. I may be permitted to say that for a similar reason no response was made to the circular addressed to the committee of which I am chairman. We have no means of knowing the extent of the information we may desire or the number of witnesses we may require. But I will say that so far as the expenses of that committee have already gone, it seems to me that they will certainly not exceed one thousand dollars, nor have I any reason to think that they will exceed two thousand or twenty-five hundred dollars. We have had no meeting since the receipt of that circular, and no opportunity to compare notes, to know what will be the probable expenses of that committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Gentlemen seem not to understand the object I have in view in this explanation. If the committees do not continue their investigations and create new expenses, $35,000 will probably cover all their expenses. But I remember very well that, but a very few days ago, when a deficiency bill was reported to this House, the Committee of Ways and Means, a large majority of whom had never voted to incur one dollar of that debt, were found to be in a great minority in this House. All I want the House to understand now is, that I throw no obstacles in the way of any one of these committees; but I wish the House to understand, if they ask my opinion, that if the committees all proceed to the full extent of their power, at least $100,000 will be required; if they stop where they are, only $35,000 will be required.

Mr. WINSLOW. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I wish to propound a question to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] the chairman of the committee on the investigation of the sale of Fort Snelling. The cost of that investigation must reach a very large sum; and I would like to know the expense of summoning witnesses from Minnesota?

Mr. BURNETT. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will answer.

Mr. SEWARD. This questioning is not in order.

Mr. WINSLOW. I am not opposed to the resolution at all; but I would like to know what the expenses in certain matters are, and I think some steps ought to be taken to economize this matter hereafter. I wish now to know what the cost of these witnesses from Minnesota are?

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In asking for this $35,000 appropriation, I have been led to make these remarks because the committee may be called upon to ask for more money hereafter, and I wish the House to understand it. I understand that the expenses of the Fort Snelling investigating committee are estimated at $8,000, and that it forms a part of this $35,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the amount named in this resolution is intended to cover the expenses of the committees so far as they have gone.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. And the estimated expense of work already cut out.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does it cover—

Mr. SEWARD. What has become of my objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama rose for explanation.

Mr. SEWARD. Who is upon the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania; but the gentleman from Alabama rises for explanation.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to understand the resolution. For instance, the Fort Snelling committee, and two or three other committees are at work. Does this bill make an appropriation for the completion of the work of those committees?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is estimated that it will cover their expenses.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Marshal Mathio, by leaving copies of the same on file.

LAND LAWS.

Mr. COBB. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, the necessity and importance of which every member will see, on its being read:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to codify and compile all the land laws now in force, in one volume, in such manner as he may think best, and report to this House, as early as possible, his action, with a copy of said compiled laws.

Mr. LETCHER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman how large a volume it will make?

Mr. COBB. About five hundred pages.

Mr. LETCHER. What will be the cost?

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the resolution.

Mr. COBB. I move to suspend the rules.

The motion was not agreed to—two thirds not voting therefor.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution providing for the acquisition of foreign territory.

The resolution requests the President of the United States to negotiate through the Department of State with the respective Governments possessing or claiming the Canadas, Nova Scotia, and other portions of North America, and Cuba, and other islands adjacent thereto, with a view of annexing the same to the United States on terms compatible with the peace and honor of the nations negotiating; provided, however, that in the event of any annexation, no portion of the Territory should be admitted as a State into the Union until there should be therein a sufficient population to entitle it to one member of the House of Representatives, and until the bona fide residents of the same, being citizens of the United States by treaty stipulation or otherwise, should have had a fair opportunity of voting on their constitution, and of regulating their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KEITT objected.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the rules be suspended; and on that I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] to accept a little amendment—to add to his resolution the words: "And the rest of mankind." [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I must decline to accept the suggestion. I think the resolution is sufficiently extensive for the present. [Laughter.]

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 185; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Burroughs, Campbell, Ezra Clark, Montgomery, Mott, Murray, and Nichols—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bingham, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochran, John Cochran, Cockrell, Colfax, Collins, Corning, Corvode, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Daurell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Feinton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Howard, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Kuapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leach, Leitch, Letcher, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Washburne, Watkins, White, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—185.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. JAMES B. HENRY, his private Secretary.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

The SPEAKER. The House on Friday last, when the witness, John W. Wolcott, was before it, adopted a resolution giving him till Monday at one o'clock, p. m., to file his answer to the interrogatories propounded to him; and that in the mean time he remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, with the privilege of seeing counsel. The Sergeant-at-Arms returns that he has again present, within the bar of the House, the above-named John W. Wolcott, to answer as ordered. And the witness, John W. Wolcott, has presented to me the following answer to the interrogatories.

Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Representatives: I thank you for indulging me until to-day to answer for the contempt with which I am charged, and it will be my effort not to abuse the indulgence by trespassing unnecessarily upon the time or patience of your honorable body. I shall confine myself to what I hope will be considered as condensed a defense as may be consistent with a perspicuous presentation of it. Before proceeding, I repeat what I have before said, that nothing was further from my intention, in any one of my answers to the several questions put to me by your committee, than to contemn its authority, or the authority of the House. If I have done so in the reply which I gave to their last interrogatory, it is to be attributed solely to an error of judgment, as to my rights, in which judgment I had the mature sanction of my counsel, gentlemen who, all must know who know them at all, are as incapable of advising a course derogatory to the legal authority of the House, or of its committee, as any honorable member on this floor. I therefore, in the most solemn manner, disclaim the remotest design to commit, in what I have done, or failed to do, as a witness before your committee, or in what I am about to say now, any offense against the authority of the House or its agents.

To make my defense the more readily comprehended, a preliminary statement is necessary. On the 15th of January last the House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed to investigate the charges preferred against the members and officers of the last Congress, growing out of the disbursement of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, or other persons, and report the facts and evidence to the House, with such recommendations as they may deem proper, with authority to send for persons and papers."

By virtue of this resolve the committee before whom I have been, was appointed, and its authority remains exclusively such, and no other than that resolve conferred. The commission then is to "investigate the charges preferred against the members and officers of the last Congress, growing out of the disbursement of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, or other persons," &c.

What the charges were the resolve does not state, except that they grew out of money disbursed by Lawrence, Stone & Co., or other persons. But, as no conduct of members or officers, save official, is within the power of the House, the charges must have referred to corruption consummated, or attempted upon such official conduct, in the disbursement of money, by the Boston house or by other persons. It would seem then to be clear that the powers of the committee are limited to inquiries touching such imputed disbursement; and that no questions can be asked, and no answer exacted except such as tend to ascertain that fact, namely: was such money disbursed for the purpose stated, or was it attempted to be so disbursed? I am far from admitting the authority of this House to institute the latter inquiry. The Congress, on whose members and officers the alleged attempt is supposed to have been made, no longer exists; and whatever illegal purpose existed against them, and whatever illegality there may have been in their conduct, the offense is to be answered for before the ordinary tribunals of justice, and with all the protection to innocence which the policy and wisdom of our laws afford, and with all the means they furnish to establish guilt, if guilt there be. Congress, as the grand inquest of the nation, has no power to investigate into the conduct of the citizen, or to punish him, or to direct criminal proceedings against him in the courts, except as to the first case, when the official integrity of its members is involved; and in the other two instances, when a witness is before them or a committee, in a matter within their jurisdiction, and refuses to answer a pertinent question. In such cases they can punish by arrest during the then session of the House; and under the third section of the act of the 24th January, 1857, they can also "hand the witness over to the district attorney of this District, whose duty it is to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action."

But this limitation on the power of Congress, or either of its Houses, is further apparent from these considerations. There is by the Constitution, (2d clause, 6th section, 1st article,) an express power granted "each House" to "punish" its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, to expel a member. The insertion of this authority, on principles of construction coeval with the Constitution, it was thought negated all power to punish in other cases, and consequently denied the power to punish a witness, or other party, for what in England or in the States would be adjudged and punished as a contempt. But this view was held to be, and, as I am advised, it clearly was, too limited. The power, though not granted, and not impliedly within the one actually in terms granted was necessarily incident to the just authority of Congress, and important to its purity and consequent usefulness to the country. The Supreme Court of the United States so held, in the case of Anderson vs. Dunn. (6 Wheaton, 204.) But because, as ruled in that case, it exists by implication only, it is not to be esteemed a "substantive and independent" power, "but auxiliary and subordinate." The purity of Congress, the official integrity of its members, are necessary to the faithful and satisfactory discharge of the duty to the country, and all-important to the interests of the people. The authority to examine into all imputations upon such purity and integrity must therefore exist; and, not being in terms conferred, is to be implied. But the implication does not bring into existence "a substantive and independent power," but one altogether "auxiliary and subordinate." The conclusion, I am advised, would seem to be clear that no authority can be implied to examine witnesses in such a case as that, and the one before you is only of that class, except to facts fairly calculated to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the charge under investigation. That is to say, to propound, only, such questions as may be pertinent to the inquiry.

The act, too, before referred to, of January 24, 1857, in words solimits the authority. It provides only in its first section—and consequently the third section is to be so limited—for the case of a witness who, appearing, shall refuse to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry under "consideration before the House or committee by which he shall be examined," &c. Before attempting to apply what I have so far stated to the charge against me, and with all becoming deference to the House, I hope to be excused for adding, as bearing further on what I am about to submit, that by the first clause of the first article, and evidently designed to exclude all other legislative powers, those vested in Congress are declared to be the "legislative powers herein granted." These, and these only, and such as are necessary and proper to their beneficial discharge, are all the legislative powers conferred; and so solicitous was the vigilance and far-seeing the sagacity of the great and patriotic men of the day, that they were not satisfied to have the powers granted, in the manner granted, to stand as the only security that in progress of time they should not be enlarged by construction. By the ninth and tenth articles of the amendments to the instrument, and in plain words admitting of no misapprehension, they provided:

First, That "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

Second, That "the powers not delegated to the people of the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

With these remarks I proceed with my justification. I am advised, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that the effect of the order under which I am in your presence, is to place me in the character of a criminal, according to precedent in like cases, adjudged to be such by the House, without giving me, in advance, an opportunity of being heard. And as such judgments, if enforced without a hearing of the party involved, are not consistent with the justice or the genius of our institutions, I have now the same right to show cause against the legality of the one in my case, that I would have had if I had been heard in advance.

Before some tribunals it is possible that an expressed opinion cannot be changed, but I have no fear of such an obstacle in this instance. Fresh from the people, and sooner or later to return and be of them, it cannot be that a judgment, though formed with perfect sincerity of conviction, but from the circumstances attending it, under the influence of more or less of haste or excitement, if, upon a more mature consideration, it shall appear wrong, will, in the slightest degree, from mere pride of opinion or other motive, constitute the least impediment to your now correcting the error; and I do not therefore fear, if I can satisfy you of the error, or make you entertain a reasonable doubt of it, but that you will, with the liberality, magnanimity, and candor, which ever belong to an enlightened tribunal, make the correction, and, by so doing, do justice to a citizen.

To this task I now more directly proceed.

The power of the House and the committee being limited to the investigation of the charges preferred, according to the terms of the resolution of the 15th of January, and necessarily and constitutionally so limited, it must be admitted that the authority to examine witnesses is confined to such questions as, in the language of the act of 24th January, 1857, are pertinent to the matter of inquiry. A question, therefore, which, in its form, shall seek information foreign to the inquiry, the committee have consequently no right to propound. Nor is a refusal to answer such a question illegal.

A want of jurisdiction in this case, as in the case of other tribunals, is a want of rightful power, and if assumed, in the eye of the law renders everything that may be done simply null and void.

For the same reason, a question which, if answered, may, if followed by pertinent questions, serve to elucidate the authorized investigation, the witness is bound to answer. But if the answer which he does give anticipates all other legal questions which can grow out of it, and shows that he can give no other response to that or such other inquiries, except such as will disclose matters of a private nature, touching his own individual business or rights, or the private business or rights of other parties, and in no way bearing on the only investigation which the committee is empowered to notice, the legal obligation of the witness is fulfilled, and the power of the committee is in that particular exhausted. It is a grave error to suppose that the power of such a committee gives the right to put to a witness any and every question which they may suppose proper. Such a principle would potentially vest in such a body unlimited and inquisitorial authority. The true rule, and the limit of the power is found in the rule, that the question which the witness is bound to answer be pertinent to the subject to be investigated. It is a refusal to answer such a question as that—a pertinent one—that the act of January, 1857, says is a contempt to be punished by indictment. To constitute either a contempt or a misdemeanor, under that law, the pertinency of the question is as vital as the refusal to answer. It is unsound doctrine, that it is immaterial whether the question be proper or improper. If it be improper in a legal sense, because not pertinent to the subject which the committee are only authorized to examine, then it is as unobjectionable upon the witness as a question propounded by the members of the House without any authority at all from the body.

The assumption that any question that may be asked by the committee, under the authority of the House, is to be answered, is true; but then the right to propound a particular question does not exist, if such question is not within their authority; and such is, as I am advised, the nature of the one which was put to me in this instance. A different rule would necessarily make a committee absolute and supreme, and render their judgment, thus given solely by virtue of a delegated authority, infallible and conclusive. Every question they should propound, simply because they did propound it, is to be held a pertinent one, which the witness is bound to answer; and when his refusal is reported to the House, or he is proceeded against by indictment under the act of 1857, the judgment of the committee is to be conclusive alike upon the House, the court, and the jury. I submit, under advice, that such a principle is at war with the well-settled rights of the citizen. If I am correct thus far, then the only matter to be considered is, does the answer which I did give to the last question put to me by the committee, contain all the information which their limited authority gives them the right to ask of me? By their report to the House it will be seen that a number and a variety of antecedent questions were propounded, to all of which I made prompt and apparently satisfactory replies. I had informed them, in response to their questions—

First. That no funds had been placed in my hands by any of the manufacturers of Massachusetts, for the purpose of influencing members of Congress upon the passage of the tariff act.

Second. That I was never authorized by any of them to make any promises of future benefits in the event of the passage of that act.

Third. That I did not receive, after the close of the last session, from the manufacturers of Boston, or elsewhere, any funds, money, negotiable securities, or anything of that sort, to be used in that way—that is to say, in influencing members of Congress, as asked in the first question.

Fourth. That I did not, at any time during the months of March or April, 1857, receive from Mr. Stone any negotiable securities or money, or credits of any kind, for any such purpose, either directly or indirectly.

Fifth. That I did not receive at any time in March, 1857, a considerable sum of securities, for any purpose connected with the tariff, either to be paid to members of Congress for the purpose of influencing their action, or to their agents.

Sixth. Nor for their benefit, either directly or indirectly.

Seventh. Nor in satisfaction of previous arrangements or promises.

Eighth. Nor any securities at any time during March, 1857, to the amount at one time of $30,000, for such purposes.

Ninth. These several replies having been given, and apparently considered sufficient, the committee then put to me the question which brings me before you.

The House cannot but perceive that nearly all the previous questions look to the influencing, by money, or its equivalent, in the passage of the tariff act, or by promises of doing so at a subsequent time, the action of members of that Congress on that act. My private business, having no connection with such a charge, was not inquired into. From whom I may have received funds, and on what consideration, and for what purpose, other than the imputed illegal purpose, does not, so far, seem to have entered into the design of the committee.

Having negatived every previous inquiry bearing on the development of the illegal purpose charged, and, in terms as strong as I could use, disclaimed the receipt of funds from any quarter, to be applied directly or indirectly at once, or by promise of future appliance, or benefits to the alleged improper influencing of the members of that Congress, the committee then submitted to me this question: "Did you ever receive the $30,000 before mentioned 'for any purpose'?" This I at once declined answering until I could consult counsel, and upon the ground that it included a matter of strictly private business; but again added that no such sum was received for the purpose of influencing members of Congress or their agents. The permission for counsel was granted; and, before I left the room, the question in the form reported to the House was placed in my hands. It is in these words:

"Did you receive from the firm of Lawrence, Stone & Co., some time in March last, a sum of securities or money to the amount of $30,000, more or less." The words "for any purpose," which formed a part of the question which I had first declined to answer, as first stated, are not here added. But it is evident the committee designed to get an answer without regard to the purpose, or object, or consideration, for the receipt of the alleged sum. What my answer was to the question in this form is now known to the House; and the inquiry is, is it such an answer as I am only legally bound to make?

I suppose that no one will for a moment maintain that, under our form of government, with the limitations implied and expressed upon its powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, and the express reservation to the States, or the people, of all rights and powers not enumerated in, or delegated in the United States, by the Constitution, it is in the power of Congress, or either of the other departments, to investigate the social relations and private business of a citizen, having no reference at all to, or connection with, the powers conferred upon them respectively. The right to hold these sacred from governmental investigation or power, is, in very terms, expressly secured by the ninth amendment, and vested in the citizen. The power, too, over this, is also, by the succeeding amendment, in like manner reserved.

In regard, then, to my strictly private rights, I am in no measure responsible to Congress. After, then, the answers which I had given to previous interrogatories, and the one I gave to this, denying expressly any purpose to influence Congress, or any of its members, by improper means in the passage of the tariff act of 1857, or any other act of Congress, in money or securities, or any such actual or attempted influence, I am asked whether I received the money from the parties named "for any purpose?"

Having denied all illegal purpose in its receipt, or its subsequent illegal use by Congress or others, the inquiry necessarily is, did you receive it for a legal purpose? And that is to be followed by asking what that purpose was? and how did you, in fact, appropriate the fund? Did you, in the execution of your legal purpose in receiving it, enter into private and business arrangements with the parties having no connection with the charges under investigation, causing you to pay to them a part of, or all of, the fund? If this is not to compel me to disclose my individual and private transactions, to lay before Congress and the country what these were, I am at a loss to conceive what private transaction in such a case is free from congressional investigation. It is said that it may be true that I did not receive the fund in question for the illegal purpose charged, or to use it directly or indirectly, or pay it to other private parties, with a view to such purposes, and yet it may be found that such parties did it with that view. The error, I respectfully submit, of this position is, that it seems to assume as true the fact that that sum, in whole or in part, was thus illegally appropriated. It assumes as clear that the charge the committee are to inquire into was truthfully made, and that the corruption of the members of the last Congress was effected by means of this $30,000. I am advised that these assumptions are not such as the law makes. The charge, if established, is a crime: and the presumption before proof is always of innocence.

The House, I submit, will also see that in the several answers I have given to those prior questions, and in the one to the last interrogatory, I have not testified to matters of opinion or in relation to matters, on which, as opinion, the committee or the House might differ with me, but to matters of fact exclusively. The purpose with which money is received is a fact; its intended appropriation is a fact; its actual appropriation is a fact; the denial of all knowledge of appropriation of it by others is a fact. If as to one or all of these I have testified falsely, I have foresworn myself, and may be indicted and punished for perjury. In no part of such testimony is there anything of opinion at all; the whole refers to matters of fact and nothing else. Those who may differ with me as to these cannot so differ because of opinion, but because they allege the facts to be otherwise. This would amount to a contradiction—a denial of my testimony.

But where is the scope of inquiry to terminate? My answer will exclusively disclose my private transactions, with which, in the abstract, Congress has nothing to do. But it is said we want to be informed as to them, because it may be that we shall discover some other citizen, who, by virtue of private business with me, has become possessed of sufficient means to corrupt members of Congress, and who may have been unscrupulous enough to so appropriate it: and we want his name, that we may summon him, and put to him the inquiry, "What did you do with the money you received from Mr. Wolcott in your private dealings with him, in March last, or at other times? Did you use it to influence, improperly, members in their action upon the tariff act of 1857?" He denies any such use of it, and then he is asked, "How, and to whom, then, did he dispose of it?" Thus, his private transactions are to be ransacked and disclosed, and the same course of proceeding is to be pursued as to all other citizens, into whose hands any part of the fund may be traced, though coming strictly from private business transactions, which, sacred in the eye of every civilized community in the world, are to be laid bare, under the authority of Congress to inquire into the official integrity of its members and officers.

I am advised, and the statement is made with all respect to the House and its legal authority, that such a doctrine as this would establish for it an unrestrained inquisitorial power, not less destructive of its legitimate influence, and its ability to discharge its high and most important legislative functions with usefulness to the country, than ruinous to what has ever, heretofore, been considered the well-established rights of the citizen—the unmolested enjoyment of all his private relations, in the transaction of his private business. Official corruption in members of Congress may have existed; it is not for me to deny it—since the very charge submitted to your committee assumes that it may have been the case in the last Congress. But it is better, far better, that this go unquestioned and unpunished, than that the sacred private rights of the citizen should be violated. The eye of a discerning and honest constituency, and the public opinion of the body, which the member may, by his presence, pollute, with his conscious guilt punishing him day and night with compunctious visitings, will, in a brief period, consign him to the degraded level to which he belongs.

The blot on the fair fame of the body will thus be wiped off, and its mighty powers, granted for the protection of the citizen, and the legitimate increase of the power and glory of the country, left unimpaired; private rights will then also be possessed without danger of illegal inquiry, and the citizen will look to Congress as competent to every of its delegated powers, whilst alike unwilling to attempt, and impotent to obtain, possession of others. With a perfect knowledge of the honesty of my own conduct, and of my freedom from intentional disregard of the constitutional authority of your honorable body, or of your committee, and with a full confidence in the justice of the House, I submit, without further remark, this my defense to its further consideration and more mature judgment.

J. W. WOLCOTT.
Sworn to and subscribed before me, the 15th February, 1858.

JAMES L. ORR, Speaker.

Pending the reading of the foregoing answer, Mr. LETCHER said: I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, to what question this is a response. I want to hear the question read, so that we may know what is proposed to be answered by it.

Mr. MOORE. I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Letcher] will withdraw all objection and let the witness be heard.

Mr. STANTON. I understand it to be an argument to show that the House has no power to require from him an answer to the interrogatory, and that he is not in contempt. I trust the House will hear his argument with patience and candor, and will consider it.

Mr. LETCHER. I want to know what question the House has asked to produce this answer.

The SPEAKER. The questions propounded to the witness were:

"What excuse have you for refusing to answer the question propounded to you by the select committee of this House, before which you were summoned to appear, as to whether you had received any sum of money from Lawrence, Stone & Co., some time in March, 1857?"

Mr. LETCHER. And this is an answer to that, is it?

The SPEAKER. The second question was:

"Are you now ready to answer that, and all other proper questions that may be propounded to you by that committee?"

These were the two questions propounded. The witness is proceeding to assign, as the Chair understands, the reasons why he should not answer.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the answer, and was again interrupted by

Mr. BURROUGHS. I desire to know how long that paper is—what length of time its reading will occupy? I think we have had quite enough of it, and I think it time for the committee to make some move on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has not as yet finished the reading of the paper.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Let us hear it.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I suggest that we have heard enough of that paper; and I think it time that the chairman of the special committee should make some motion.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope the House will hear the remainder of the paper read. The House adjourned over from last Friday till to-day to give the witness an opportunity of purging himself of contempt. The object of this paper is to purge him of that, and I hope the House will permit the paper to be read.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Under the hour rule.

The Clerk again resumed the reading of the paper, and was again interrupted by Mr. CLEMENS. Is that paper signed by Reverdy Johnson, or by John W. Wolcott?

The SPEAKER. It is signed by the witness, and sworn to.

The reading of the paper was again resumed, and completed.

Mr. STANTON. It will, of course, be expected that the committee which has this subject in charge will present to the House such action as they may think the answer of the witness demands. There has been, of course, no opportunity for consultation with the committee since the contents of the answer have been known. Anticipating, however, that the answer might be unsatisfactory, from what has previously passed, I have availed myself of the opportunity of consulting on the floor such members of the committee as were in the Hall at the opening of the session; and I therefore submit the following resolution:

Whereas, John W. Wolcott has failed satisfactorily to answer the questions propounded to him by order of this House, and has not purged himself of the contempt with which he stands charged: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said John W. Wolcott be committed by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the common jail of this District of Columbia, to be kept in close custody until he shall signify his willingness to answer the questions propounded to him by the select committee of this House, and all other legal and proper questions that may be propounded to him by said committee; and for the commitment and detention of the said John W. Wolcott, this resolution shall be a sufficient warrant.

Resolved, That whenever the officer having the said John W. Wolcott in custody, shall be informed by said Wolcott that he is ready and willing to answer the questions heretofore propounded, and all proper and legal questions that may hereafter be propounded to him by said committee, it shall be the duty of such officer to deliver the said John W. Wolcott over to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, whose duty it shall be to take the said Wolcott immediately before the committee before which he was summoned to appear for examination, and to hold him in custody subject to the further order of this House.

It is due, certainly, to the witness, and it is due to the occasion, that the House, exercising the powers of a court, and passing sentence of indefinite imprisonment on a citizen, should act coolly and calmly, and on a full and distinct understanding of the principles on which that power is to be exercised.

As the power which these resolutions propose to exercise is probably to be tested before the judicial tribunals of the country, it seems to me to be proper to submit a very brief and condensed statement of the principles upon which it rests, and which, in my judgment, justify and require its exercise on this occasion.

The Constitution makes "each House the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," and authorizes each to "punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, to expel a member."

The powers thus granted are judicial powers conferred upon the Senate and House of Representatives, as separate and distinct bodies, and have no connection with the general grant of legislative powers to Congress. And the fact that any specific and limited powers are granted to Congress, has nothing to do with the grant of judicial powers to the Senate and House of Representatives, as separate, several, distinct tribunals. The House, in the exercise of the judicial power thus conferred upon it, is sovereign and supreme—just as much so as if the grant of legislative powers to Congress had been general and universal over all rightful subjects of legislation.

I admit that Congress cannot confer upon the House additional powers, not enumerated in the specific powers granted to Congress, or necessary to the exercise of the granted powers.

It is also admitted that there has been no act of Congress authorizing either House to punish a witness or anybody else for contempt. The only acts of Congress which are supposed to have any bearing upon the question, are the acts authorizing the chairman of committees to administer oaths, and requiring the Speaker to issue subpoenas for witnesses, upon the application of a committee authorized to send for persons and papers. And the law passed at the last session, making a party liable to indictment and punishment for refusing to appear and testify before a committee of either House of Congress, "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing," which assumes the existence of the power to punish for contempt.

The power to punish for contempt is a necessary incident to judicial power, without which it cannot be exercised. The judicial power is just as much sovereign and supreme as the legislative or executive. The power to decide controversies between citizens and between the citizen and the State, is one of the most important attributes of sovereignty; and the power to decide carries with it the power to inquire, to investigate, and to consider. And how can any tribunal inquire and investigate without the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to require them to testify? Who would consent to be bound by the decision of a court that was confined to the testimony of such witnesses as might come voluntarily before it, and such evidence as the witness might choose to give? The idea of a judicial tribunal without plenary power over the parties and witnesses is an absurdity. The creation of a court or a grant of judicial power, either in an organic law or an ordinary legislative enactment, carries with it power over the parties, the witnesses, and all the instruments of evidence that are necessary to the exercise of the power granted. At common law, in England and in all the States of the Confederacy, every judicial tribunal, from justices of the peace to the courts of last resort, have the power of issuing attachments and fines and imprisoning parties and witnesses for contempt. It is true that in most of the States statutes have been passed to regulate the exercise of this power. But these are restraining acts, to prevent the abuse of the power and prescribe the manner of exercising it.

But I apprehend that no lawyer will claim that the power is derived from the constitution or statute law of any State, and that it does not exist without such grant.

If the power to "punish members for disorderly behavior, and to expel a member" be in its nature a judicial power, it carries with it, ex necessitate rei, such incidental powers as are indispensable to its exercise.

This committee is required to "investigate" certain matters named in the resolution under which it was appointed. And how can it "investigate" if the House has no power to compel a witness to testify to facts within his knowledge which are indispensable to a proper understanding of the matter to be "investigated"?

The investigation with which your committee is charged is based upon an allegation that $87,000 was paid by Lawrence, Stone & Co. to influence the legislation of the last Congress. The evidence already taken by the committee tends to prove that $58,000 of this sum was paid to this witness. It is true that this witness says that this money was not paid to him, or paid out by him, to influence legislation. But non constat but he may have honestly paid it to some one who did use it corruptly; and how is the committee to trace it unless they can compel him to tell to whom he paid it?

But the committee and the House may differ with the witness as to what is an honest and justifiable use of the money. Are the committee and the House to assume, upon the judgment of the witness, that the consideration for which it was paid to him, or paid out by him, was legitimate and proper? I submit that the House has a right to know what that consideration was that they may judge of its character. If it is said that this is not a case of the "misbehavior of a member," which the House is authorized by the Constitution to inquire into and punish, I answer, first, that that is a question which goes to the power of the House to institute this investigation.

It assumes that the court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

But this is a question which cannot be made by a witness who is under examination. It may be that the question of jurisdiction itself depends upon the facts which the witness refuses to disclose. Suppose a party were on trial in any court of the United States, for an offense which the defendant claimed was not within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, but was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State courts: could a witness refuse to answer a question on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction? Would the court be bound to decide the question of jurisdiction against the defendant before the witness could be compelled to testify? Would not the court say that the question of jurisdiction was one with which the witness had no concern and had no right to inquire into? That to enable the court to try the question of jurisdiction, it had a right to inquire into the facts which were necessary to enable the court to decide the question of jurisdiction, and that the witness must therefore be compelled to testify?

If it be said that the want of jurisdiction is apparent upon the face of the record; I answer that the witness is not a party to the record, and can make no question about it. The record is made up and the issue joined by the parties without making any question of jurisdiction. The trial is in progress and the witness is upon the stand, and he will not be permitted to make a collateral issue not made by the pleadings or urged by either of the parties.

But the question of jurisdiction was decided by the House by the passage of the resolution under which this committee is acting, and in every order since made in relation to this witness as well as the witness Williamson, from New York. This House has, at its present session, raised not less than five other committees with similar powers, which cannot be distinguished in principle from the committee before whom this witness is required to testify. If, therefore, this witness shall be discharged upon the ground that this committee have no power to investigate the matters referred to them, it follows that this and all other committees of investigation that have been raised during the session must be at once disbanded. It would therefore seem rather late in the day to raise a question of this kind.

If gentlemen hold that the House has no power to investigate the matters referred to these committees, why was not the question made upon the passage of the resolutions for their appointment? But, if the House shall now come to the conclusion that these committees were imprudently raised, and that the House has transcended its powers, the sooner we retrace our steps the better. For one, I have no doubt about the power.

It may be matter of controversy whether the constitutional provision authorizing the House to punish its members for "disorderly behavior" contemplated anything beyond the preservation of order and decorum in the debates and proceedings of the House whilst in session; but, whatever may be the true construction of this clause, there are certain powers that are necessarily incident to every judicial tribunal, and to every legislative body. Amongst these, are the power to control its own officers, to defend itself and its members against aggression, and to protect its own dignity and honor. These powers are indispensable to its very existence. Without them, it is helpless, imbecile, and contemptible. A legislative body without the power to purge itself by the expulsion of a member for bribery, would be an object of scorn and contempt. It is a power that has been exercised a thousand times in the English Parliament, by this House, by the Legislatures of the various States of the Union; and has never been denied by any judicial tribunal or legislative body. The power to investigate, and to try a member, is merely the exercise of the power to punish or expel.

But the power of the House over its members is not limited, by the Constitution, to cases of "disorderly behavior;" but in addition to the power to "punish" for this cause, the House may, with the "concurrence of two thirds, expel a member." For what may he be expelled? Not merely for "disorderly behavior," but for whatever may, in the judgment of two thirds of the members, be good cause for expulsion. This is an ample warrant for an inquiry into the conduct of a member, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he has done anything worthy of expulsion.

So far, I have discussed the question upon principle alone, without reference to precedent or authority. My time and opportunities for consulting authorities have not been such as to enable me to make any extended reference to precedents. There is an excellent summary of the principles governing the powers and privileges of Congress, with a reference to sundry authorities, in Jefferson's Manual, pages 52 to 56. From this it will be seen that some very questionable powers were exercised by the House from 1795 to 1800. The questions that seem mainly to have been discussed in those cases, was whether the power of punishing for contempts, whether witnesses or others, could be exercised without an act of Congress regulating the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution. This question has been abundantly settled since, by the repeated exercise of the power, and by the uniform and concurrent decisions of the House in every case where the power has been called in question.

The case of Anderson, which was referred to in the discussions at the last session, was much stronger than the one now before the House. In that case, an attachment was issued against Anderson for a contempt of the privileges of the House, in attempting to bribe a member to make a favorable report from a committee on a private bill. He was arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms and brought to the bar of the House, and reprimanded by the Speaker by order of the House, and then discharged from custody. He brought an action of trespass for false imprisonment against the Sergeant-at-Arms in the circuit court of the United States. The Sergeant-at-Arms was justified under the Speaker's warrant. The justification was sustained and judgment rendered against the plaintiff. He took a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by that court. This decision was made about the year 1818, when the country was peculiarly free from political excitement, and when the judges of the Supreme Court commanded the entire confidence of the whole country, and the court were unanimous. The power exercised in that case was much more questionable than the ordinary power exercised by every court in the country of imprisoning a witness for refusing to testify.

The case of Simonton, at the last session, was precisely like this, and I have followed that case in every particular, except that I propose to commit the witness to the jail of the District of Columbia, instead of requiring him to be kept in close custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I have adopted substantially the resolution offered on that occasion by the gentleman from Illinois over the way, [Mr. HARRIS], whose authority, I fear, will not go so far with gentlemen on that side of the House now as it did at the last session.

The reason for sending the witness to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms was the statement made by you, Mr. Speaker, as a member of that committee, that, in your judgment, the jailor would not be bound to receive him. With all due deference to your better judgment, I have, after some reflection, come to a different conclusion. The jail of this district was built by Congress. It is under the absolute control of Congress, and may be converted into a church or a distillery, or anything else that Congress may direct. The expense of maintaining the prisoners is paid from the national Treasury. The marshal of the United States for the District is ex officio the keeper of the jail. He is bound to receive into his custody all persons committed to the jail of the District by any judicial tribunal in the District having power to imprison. This House, when acting judicially, is such a tribunal; and, I have no doubt, if he would refuse to receive a prisoner committed by the House, that he would be liable to an indictment for an escape.

I see no reason why this party shall not be dealt with precisely as other parties are, who are found guilty of similar offenses. I have no notion of having him feasted at one of the hotels of the city, at public expense. I am a republican of the old school, and believe in practicing that democratic equality which I profess. I have no notion of making distinctions, on account of color or condition. I would treat this Boston banker precisely as I would treat one of these hod-carriers about the Capitol, whether he be black or white. There is no hardship in the case. All he has to do is to submit to the laws of the country, as they are administered by its legally-constituted tribunals, and he is entitled to an immediate discharge. With this he ought to be satisfied.

I desire to say, that, while I have myself no inclination to press the House to a hasty decision, I am not disposed to take the responsibility of protracting its deliberations upon this question, and occupying more time than the occasion calls for.

I take it for granted that this witness intends to test the power of this House before the judicial tribunals of the District. Let him try it. While I do not feel disposed to precipitate the action of the House, on the other hand I do not feel disposed to make myself responsible for an unnecessary consumption of time, and therefore I shall move the previous question upon the resolutions, knowing that if the House desire a discussion they will vote it down.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the phraseology of his resolution, and to suggest a slight amendment.

Mr. RITCHIE. I rise to a point of order. I believe the previous question has been called, and no amendment is in order.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to hear the proposed amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I am willing to hear it read. Mr. BILLINGHURST. I will say, in the mean time, that the House has no power to punish by imprisonment beyond the present session, and the resolution upon its face is perpetual imprisonment.

The amendment was read as follows—insert after the word "committee" near the close of the first resolution these words, "or until the termination of the present Congress."

Mr. STANTON. There is no necessity for that; because, if he is in custody when Congress expires, he will be discharged on habeas corpus immediately.

Mr. MILLSON was recognized by the Chair. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire as to the effect of this resolution.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order. If the previous question has been called, I object to any debate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the main question is ordered—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] has the floor, if debate is in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to all discussion. Mr. MILLSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution, and I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the demand for the previous question, to enable me to do it.

Mr. STANTON. I must decline. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the main question be ordered, will not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] be entitled to make an hour's speech?

Mr. STANTON. Yes; but I do not want to exercise the right. The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not report these resolutions from his committee.

Mr. BOWIE. I want to know whether an amendment is in order now?

The SPEAKER. An amendment is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, I move to lay the whole subject on the table; and on that I would like to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SEWARD called for tellers on the yeas and nays. Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only twenty-four members voting therefor. The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Were there not twenty-four members voting for the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced twenty-four; but that is not enough to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the other side be counted.

The SPEAKER. It is too late now. The gentleman from Georgia demanded tellers, and tellers were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I asked for a count of the other side before the Chair put the question on ordering tellers.

The question recurred on seconding the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, called for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SEARING and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 74.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now move to lay the resolutions on the table; and on that I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 158; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Avery, Bennett, Blair, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Buffinton, Chaffee, Clawson, Burton, Craige, Davis of Massachusetts, Dimmick, Eliott, Gooch, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Hughes, Jewett, George W. Jones, Leiter, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Quitman, Robbins, Royce, Seward, Samuel A. Smith, Tappan, Thompson, Trippe, Underwood, and John V. Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Barksdale, Billingham, Bingham, Bonham, Branch, Bratton, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Corning, Covode, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Daves, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Kilgore, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Knappe, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lench, Letcher, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Puvance, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Steward, William Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Fayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—158.

So the House refused to lay the resolutions on the table.

Pending the vote, Mr. PHILLIPS stated that Mr. ARNOLD had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. HUGHES made a like statement in reference to Mr. GREGG.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, stated that Mr. LAMAR had to leave the House on account of indisposition.

Mr. HOARD said: Is it proper to inquire as to the effect of this vote?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to lay the resolutions on the table, which, in the opinion of the Chair, carries the whole subject.

Mr. HOARD. Then I vote "No."

Mr. BURNETT stated that Mr. MASON had to leave the House on account of indisposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD made a like statement in regard to Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, stated that Mr. WOOD was detained from the House by indisposition.

The main question was then ordered to be put, being upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am too unwell to make any remarks upon this question; and I shall therefore say in justification of the vote I shall give, that I do not believe this House possesses the power of imprisonment—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MILLSON. If the resolution should be rejected, would it be in order to reconsider the vote rejecting the resolution, and then amend it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be in order.

Mr. ADRAIN. Is it too late now to propose an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ADRAIN. If the resolution proposed to commit the prisoner to the close custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, I should be in favor of it; but it is a pretty hard-handed proceeding to commit a citizen to prison.

Several members objected to debate.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 133, nays 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Barksdale, Billingham, Bingham, Bonham, Branch, Brayton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Corning, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dewar, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Glimmer, Goodie, Granger, Greenwood, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Quincy Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Lovejoy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Murray, Niblack, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Ransom, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Sandridge, Savage, Seales, Seating, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walton, Walton, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollicoffer—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Blair, Boccoe, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Campbell, Chaffee, Clawson, Clay, Cowdell, Cowde, Burton, Craige, Curry, Davis of Iowa, Dowdell, English, Goodwin, Goodwin, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Hughes, Jewett, George W. Jones, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Millson, Freeman H. Morse, Nichols, Pendleton, Quitman, Ready, Robbins, Royce, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, William Stewart, Tappan, Thompson, Trippe, Underwood, Walbridge, and John V. Wright—55.

So the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

The question now being on the adoption of the preamble,

Mr. STANTON demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The preamble was adopted.

Mr. STANTON moved that the vote by which the preamble was adopted be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to know what is to be done with the witness?

The SPEAKER. He is in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. LETCHER. I thought he was delivered by the Sergeant-at-Arms into the custody of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the Sergeant-at-Arms will attend to him.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the joint resolution of the House, making an appropriation to pay the expenses of the committees of investigation raised by the House of Representatives.

MICHIGAN RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WALDRON, by unanimous consent, presented the following joint resolutions of the State of Michigan, which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution in favor of the passage of an act of Congress making an appropriation for the improvement of certain harbors;

Joint resolution relative to the extension of slavery;

Joint resolution in relation to granting the public lands of the United States to actual settlers;

Joint resolution relative to a northern Pacific railroad;

Joint resolution relative to an appropriation of a grant of land for the endowment of the Michigan Agricultural College; and a Joint resolution for the protection and permanent security of the St. Mary's Falls ship-canal.

REGISTER AT VINCENNES.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to continue the office of register of the land office, at Vincennes, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMMON L. DAVIS.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the relief of Ammon L. Davis, a mail contractor from Nashville to Memphis, Tennessee, for services performed under the order of the Post Office Department, for 1854 and 1855.

TWO PER CENT. LAND FUND IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BLAIR, by unanimous consent, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill giving the assent of Congress to a law of the Missouri Legislature, for the application of the reserved two per cent. land fund of said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RHODE ISLAND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BRAYTON, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives to vote against the admission of the State of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the reading of the resolutions.

The resolutions were read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENTRY OF LANDS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act granting to certain citizens of the State of Missouri, the right to enter certain lands in the Plattsburg district in said State," approved July 3, 1856; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

OHIO RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. GROESBECK, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the improvement of navigation at the falls of the Ohio river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ABROGATION OF THE RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. MORRILL offered the following resolution; which was read, and by unanimous consent considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abrogating the late so-called reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, and whether the same does not operate disastrously upon the timber and grain-growing regions of the United States, as well as against American interests generally.

IOWA LAND GRANT.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, asked the consent of the House to introduce a bill making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State from McGregor, on the Mississippi river, to the western line of said State.

Mr. HUGHES objected.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS.

Mr. BOWIE asked the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table the bill from the Senate, to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths and affirmations and acknowledgments in certain cases.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. BOWIE. One word, Mr. Speaker. I wish to express my opinion of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated to the House that the gentleman desired to take up the bill for reference only.

Mr. BOWIE. For reference only; but I want to state the object I have in view in that reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that debate is hardly in order.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. BOWIE moved its reference to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I understand this bill, it applies to the administration of oaths by notaries all over the United States. If that be true, the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The memorandum on the bill shows that it was considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia in the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My impression is that it applies to the United States courts, and I insist upon my motion.

Mr. BOWIE. It is a bill, in my judgment, peculiarly for the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The amendment to Mr. Bowie's motion was agreed to; and, as amended, the original motion was agreed to. So the bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

KANSAS LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, asked unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House whether any money has been paid out of the Treasury of the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, for the expenses of any Legislature or alleged Legislative Assembly in the Territory of Kansas; and if so, under what act or provision of law and from what funds said money has been paid.

Mr. BURNETT objected.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to offer the resolution.

And then, on motion of Mr. WARREN, the House (at ten minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 16, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. C. C. MEADOR.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, communicating, in pursuance of law, statements showing the number and designation of passengers arriving in the United States on ship-board during the year 1857; which was, on motion of Mr. STUART, ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STUART presented the memorial of Anthony Caslo, otherwise called Castle, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. IVERSON presented the petition of Samuel H. Taylor, asking for additional compensation as messenger and laborer in the office of the Third Auditor during the years 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of the adoption of more efficient measures for protecting the citizens of that State against Indian depredations, and indemnifying them for property stolen or destroyed; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Columbus, Texas, praying for the establishment of a mail route from that place to George Waldman's, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of a mail route from Marshall, Harrison county, to Dallas, in Dallas county, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the adoption of measures for the preservation and elevation of the American Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of Martin Layman, praying permission to enter a quarter section of land, on which he has settled and made improvements, in Minnesota, before the surveys of the Government lands in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DURKEE presented a petition of certain inhabitants of Madison, Wisconsin, praying for the adoption of measures for extinguishing slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms, or lots, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of the registrar and receiver of the land office at Washington, Mississippi, praying that the compensation of land officers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Lawrent, surviving partner of Benjamin & Thomas Lawrent, praying that certain moneys belonging to that firm, and taken by General Scott as property of the Government of Mexico, during the Mexican war, may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. MALLORY presented a presentment of the grand jury of the United States court for the northern district of Florida, showing the necessity of a building for the accommodation of the Federal courts in that district; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. YULEE presented the memorial of Smallwood, Earle & Co., praying to be allowed the amount of a fine illegally imposed on them and paid to the collector of customs in New York; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON presented additional papers in relation to the case of Dorothy Wurtz, or Wirt; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of William F. Russell, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

On motion of Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of Captain George E. McClelland's company of Florida volunteers, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Edward M. Kent, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Joseph Nork, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of George W. Lippitt, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 140) for the relief of George W. Lippitt. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Hannah Stroop, reported a bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Hannah Stroop, widow of John Stroop, deceased; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 143) to create the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster General; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles G. Ridgely, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 144) for the relief of Captain Charles G. Ridgely, United States Navy. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of Major J. L. Donaldson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 145) for the relief of Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, assistant quartermaster of the United States Army. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Suddards, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 148) for the relief of James Suddards; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George H. Howell, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No.

149) for the relief of George H. Howell. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry S. Crabbe, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Jane Baker, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Richard E. Randolph, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the message of the President of the United States in relation to the Sound dues, communicated to the Senate the 19th of January, reported in favor of the motion; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the printing of Congress, communicated the 2d of February, reported in favor of the motion; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War in relation to appropriations applicable to the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, the amount drawn and balances remaining July 1, 1857, and the amounts carried to the surplus fund, communicated January 26, reported in favor of printing the same; which was agreed to.

MEXICAN PROTECTORATE.

Mr. HOUSTON submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, the events connected with the numerous efforts of the people of Mexico, and of Central America, of this continent, to establish and maintain order and good government, since their separation from the mother country, have so far resulted in failure and consequent anarchy, and demonstrated to the world the inability of said people to effect an object alike so desirable and so indispensible to their welfare and prosperity: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into and report to the Senate upon the expediency of the Government of the United States declaring and maintaining an efficient protectorate over the States of Mexico, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, and San Salvador, in such form and to such an extent as shall be necessary to secure to the people of said States the blessings of good and stable republican government.

Mr. WILSON. Let it lie over.

The preamble and resolution were accordingly laid over under the rule.

EASTERN MAIL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire if the transmission of the mail between Washington city and Boston cannot be so expedited as to prevent its detention in New York twelve hours, or more, each night.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. YULEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 139) amendatory of the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1855; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 141) to establish a port of entry at Tom's River, New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 146) making an appropriation for deepening the channel of the St. Mary's river, in the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 147) making an appropriation for deepening the channel over the St. Clair flats, in the State of Michigan; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 150) regulating the payments to invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the petition of citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying that the bill reported by the select committee to restrain the issue of bank notes in the District of Columbia, may not become a law, have instructed me to report adversely to the printing, and to move that it lie on the table, on the ground that it is only of interest probably to the select committee that have the subject-matter of that bill under their consideration. I move that it lie on the table.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that it be referred to the select committee on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I think that is the proper direction; but I did not deem it proper to take the responsibility of proposing it. I withdraw my motion.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

MINNESOTA LAND GRANT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The same committee have had under consideration a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, submitting an estimate of the quantity of land which will inure to Minnesota for railroad purposes, under the act of March 3, 1857, and report adversely to its printing. The report is of no very great length; it is so short that any member of the Senate can read it in a minute; it will not make two pages; and, indeed, hardly one, of octavo size. We do not believe it will be of any avail at all to print it; but we think it will lead to calls from other States for reports showing what each State is entitled to receive, or has received, and this would lead to a large amount of printing in the end. It is unnecessary, because any individual member can get the information without the cost of printing. I report against its printing, and I ask that the report be adopted.

The report was concurred in.

DEPARTMENTAL PRINTING.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senate, some days ago, on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire, and report to the Senate, what amount has been paid annually during the last five years, to each of the printing establishments in the city of Washington, for printing and advertising of any kind, for the United States, other than that ordered by either House of Congress, whether done by the direction of any Department, or civil or military officer thereof. Also, whether the same has been paid under the provisions of the existing law, and whether any amendment of existing laws is necessary, in order to secure proper economy in the printing expenditures of the Government; and to report by bill or otherwise."

There are facts called for in this resolution that no doubt are desirable. There are other duties imposed on the committee, by virtue of this resolution, which will take some considerable time for them to fulfill. I refer to that part of the resolution which says they shall inquire "whether any amendment of existing laws is necessary." The committee are now engaged on the subject of amendments to existing laws, and will prosecute that inquiry with as much rapidity as they may be able, until they bring forward such measures as they believe should be adopted by Congress.

The resolution goes further, and directs an inquiry to be made as to the cost of public printing done in this city not by order of Congress. The proper mode of procuring that information is, of course, through the heads of the different Departments. The committee, therefore, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, trusting that the Senator from Michigan will bring in a resolution calling on the heads of the Departments to state to us the cost of printing of that character; and it will come more appropriately and satisfactorily before the Senate by that means, we think, than by the process proposed by the honorable Senator. The Committee on Printing have instructed me to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. STUART. I think, if the committee understand this subject as I do, they will not press the motion to be discharged. There are many facts connected with the printing of the Departments here which ought to be known to the Senate and to the public, and it seems to me are indispensable to be known, in order to enable our committee to make necessary suggestions in regard to the amendment of the law. For instance: I am told by one of the assistants in the Post Office Department that there are some thirty-five thousand dollars annually spent there under existing laws, which expenditure is of no earthly benefit to the service at all. It is just so much money thrown away. He told me, within three days, that he could point out expenditures to the amount of $35,000, which were wholly unnecessary for the purposes of the Department. So undoubtedly it is with other Departments. I am of opinion, also, that there are many expenditures for public printing that are not sanctioned by any law at all, and that there are the grossest abuses practiced in regard to the printing emanating from the Departments.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I see that this is to lead to a debate on the subject of printing, which must necessarily consume the residue of the morning hour. We know it is a vexed question, and I wish to suggest to the Senator that it was not with reference to the merits of his resolution at all that the committee asked to be discharged from its consideration.

Mr. STUART. I so understand it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. They simply ask to be discharged for the reason that the committee believe the Senate can, with greater propriety, and with certainly fully as much success, obtain from the Departments the information demanded by the resolution, as can the Committee on Printing, who have already their hands sufficiently full. We have therefore asked to be discharged with a view and expectation that the Senator would offer a resolution calling on the several Departments of the Government to furnish the facts which he seeks to obtain, and to let us know whether those facts have transpired under their direction, or under any of their subordinates. I suggest to the Senator that the Committee on Printing believe the information can be obtained with fully as much ease, and perhaps more promptness, by such a resolution; and we hope the duty of hunting up these facts will not be devolved on us. It seems to us the Senate can pass a resolution, calling for the information from each head of the Department with more ease and less trouble than we could do; but if the Senate is not satisfied to take that course, very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Chair to announce that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, which is the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Does it come up at half past twelve o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the hour.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then this subject must lie over until to-morrow.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to be allowed to make a few reports before the special order is taken up.

Mr. STUART. I much prefer that the Senate should pass on this question. I am very clear that the special order does not come up until one o'clock; and I hope that upon this occasion, when there is, apparently, no very great solicitude on the subject immediately before the Senate, that point will be settled. There is nothing in the rule which continues a special order from day to day, at the hour for which it was first made a special order. A special order is made for one o'clock, and that being the hour of proceeding to the ordinary general business of the Senate, on the expiration of the morning hour the Senate proceeds to the consideration of that special order; but I present this case for consideration: it is competent for the Senate, undoubtedly, to make a special order for half past two o'clock to-morrow. At half past two o'clock to-morrow the Senate proceeds to consider it, and then adjourns without disposing of it. Will that go over until half past two o'clock the next day; and at every subsequent day can it not be called up until half past two o'clock? I think that after the day for which it was first made a special order has passed, it then becomes a special order among the other special orders, at one o'clock. It takes its rank according to the 31st rule, which rank is decided by the day of its date. The first day you take it up at the hour specified, because the assignment fixes the day and the hour, but at all subsequent days it comes up at one o'clock.

It is important to settle this question for this reason: it frequently happens that in the hurry of business, when the attention of Senators is called away from the business before the body, some member has a special order made for half past twelve o'clock. If that is to be continued from day to day at that hour, it cuts us out from all the morning business. Here is the Senator from Georgia now obliged to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, in the morning hour, to introduce a resolution, or present a petition, or make a report. If the Chair has not fully considered the subject in his own mind, I suggest that he reconsider the intimation he has made, and see if I am not correct in saying that the hour for which a special order is first fixed cannot be permanent. The Senate may assign any hour to begin with; but unless they follow up that assignment by saying that it shall be the special order from day to day at that hour, it necessarily goes into the mass of special orders which are taken up at one o'clock, and taken up according to the order of their arrangement under the 31st rule. I think the suggestion I make in regard to a special order at half past two o'clock is unanswerable, and shows that the course which I have suggested is the proper one. I think no Senator will contend that you must wait every day until half-past two o'clock before you can take up that special order.

I make the suggestion, as I said, because, there being no great anxiety to-day about the measure which is the special order, it is an opportune time at which to fix the practice under the 31st rule of the Senate. I think it clear—it is perfectly clear to my own mind—that, after the first day, although it may be fixed for half past twelve o'clock, it remains a special order at one o'clock, and then to take its rank according to the order prescribed in the 31st rule.

Mr. WILSON. I would suggest that we pass over informally the Army bill. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. DAVIS,] I am told, is confined by sickness to his house. We have a special order for one o'clock, the Indiana case, which is of great importance; and we can spend the time from now to one o'clock in doing morning business. We can pass the special order over until the Indiana case is disposed of, and then take it up again. I move, therefore, that it be postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan having raised the question in regard to these special orders, the Chair feels bound to state his opinion and the reason for it.

Mr. STUART. If the Chair prefers to take the course suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, and look into the subject further, that will be entirely agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is prepared to announce his opinion upon the point. He has considered it.

Mr. STUART. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The suggestion now presented was made to me several days ago; and the view of the Chair on the subject of these special orders is this: he finds nothing in the rules of the Senate which makes any particular hour appropriate to special orders. They are fixed for different periods. He does not find any evidence that there is what is called a morning hour in this body, as in the other branch of Congress, and consequently the Senate sets special orders for one hour, and sometimes for another; some for one o'clock; some for half past twelve o'clock, and some for two o'clock. He does not find any evidence that one o'clock is the particular period for considering any special order, unless that hour is assigned for its consideration by direction of the Senate. The object in assigning a special order for half past twelve o'clock, is to dispose of it if possible before the hour of one, at which another and perhaps older special order would come before the Senate. That being the hour fixed for this special order, the Chair deemed it his duty every day to call it up at half past twelve o'clock; but when the hour of one arrived, he would feel it his duty to call up an older special order under the 31st rule, referred to by the Senator from Michigan. He does not find any evidence that one o'clock is the hour for special orders; but that the special orders are to be called up at the hour for which they have been assigned by the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I think there is a usage of the Senate, designated in the Manual by Mr. Jefferson as the old custom, that the business which is laid over the day before comes up first at one o'clock. I speak from memory, but I think it will be found that at one o'clock the business on which the Senate adjourned the day before is the special order, unless some other is made by special designation of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At one o'clock?

Mr. HUNTER. I think so, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can readily perceive that it would be more convenient to consume an hour every morning in ordinary business, petitions, reports, and resolutions; but he felt it his duty to call up the special order at the hour fixed by the Senate. If the Senate prefer to have the understanding suggested by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Virginia, the Chair will be happy to pursue it hereafter.

Mr. STUART. I made the suggestion which I submitted with great respect to the opinion of the Chair, and certainly, I think, with a full appreciation of the delicacy of his position. I do not wish to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair on any question, but I make these suggestions for the consideration of the Senate; and I hope the Senate will now come to the determination that, in regard to these special orders on the subsequent days, the days after the first day of taking them up, they will be considered as coming up according to their order, at one o'clock. That will not lead us into confusion, and it will give us time for our morning business, which is frequently very important, indeed. If that could be the general understanding of the Senate at this time, and the Chair would so regard it, I think it would be found very conducive to the dispatch of business hereafter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, then, the Chair will take the sense of the Senate, not in regard to this question of order, but in regard to the wishes of the body touching the arrangement of the special orders. The Chair will put it in this form: Is it the sense of the Senate that a special order which has been assigned for one day at an earlier hour than one o'clock, shall, if not finished on that day, fall into its proper place and be called not before one o'clock thereafter? If there is no objection, I will put that question to the Senate.

Mr. STUART. I did not hear the Chair distinctly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it the sense of the Senate that orders which have been, or shall be, assigned for an earlier hour than one o'clock, shall, if not finished on that day, be not called thereafter until one o'clock?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir; that is it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those who favor that practice will say "ay;" those of a contrary opinion, "no." The ayes have it, and that will be the order of business hereafter.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to throw out the suggestion that we avoid making any special orders within the morning hour.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Chair will allow me, I will suggest that the arrangement of business, according to the usual course of proceeding which I believe was taken under the discretion resting in the Chair under parliamentary law, is given in the Manual, and is such as I suggested:

"The Speaker is not precisely bound to any rules as to what bills or other matters shall be first taken up, but is left to his own discretion, unless the House decide to take up a particular subject."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has examined that.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to ask the Senate to excuse the Senator from Alabama [Mr. FITZPATRICK] from service on the Committee on Territories, on account of his very severe illness, and to appoint some one in his place until his return. It is important that the committee should be full, so as to discharge the important duties referred to them.

The question was taken, and Mr. FITZPATRICK was excused; and the VICE PRESIDENT being authorized to fill the vacancy, appointed Mr. CLAY.

TURKISH VICE ADMIRAL.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the joint resolution (S. No. 18) for the reception of Vice Admiral Mehmed Pasha, of the Turkish navy, and to facilitate the objects of his mission in superintending the construction of a vessel of war in the United States, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MASON. I will only say that it is well understood in the intercourse between the United States and the nations of the East, that courtesies and hospitalities of this kind are very highly appreciated, and lead to very useful results. It has been recommended by the Secretary of State to the committee, and we cordially concurred with him. The Admiral is expected to arrive every day; and it is desirable, therefore, if anything is done, that it should be done at once.

Mr. CLAY. Perhaps I do not understand the import or the intention of this resolution. If it is not to cost any money, if it is a mere national courtesy, I have no objection whatever to it; but if the proposition is to give a carte-blanche to the Administration to expend whatever amount of money they may think expedient, or which they may think courtesy requires for this distinguished Turkish official, I object to it. I do not think that the Constitution warrants the expenditure of money by any Executive Department of the Government unless there be an appropriation by law. That is my reading of it and my interpretation of it. This mode of expending money is above all others the most objectionable to me. Why, sir, there is no limitation whatever upon the power or the discretion of the Administration. It may expend $5,000, or $10,000, or $100,000.

I think we have had some experience that ought to admonish us of the folly of these national courtesies. We expended, according to my information—I rely upon newspaper reports—a large amount of money upon a Turkish impostor, who some years since came here representing himself as some distinguished official there. We expended upon the wine bills, the cigars, and the viands of Kossuth, at Brown's Hotel, as I understand, some $5,000; and that was but a small part of the money expended. What was the fruit of it? What did we make by it? What benefit was realized by this country from these large expenditures? None whatever.

I am opposed to this resolution. It is a proposition which, on its face, is very inoffensive and unobjectionable; but it is a proposition which conceals its purpose. It does not discover what amount is to be expended, or how it is to be expended; and it is just transferring to the Administration a power which, under the Constitution, belongs only to Congress—that of appropriating money. Hence I shall vote against it, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. MASON. The Senator says there is no limit upon the expenditure of money under the resolution. The limit is the scope and object of the resolution. I can hardly suppose that any President, or anybody else who is authorized to extend ordinary courtesies and civilities to a stranger, can expend $100,000, or $10,000, or $5,000. The limit is in the scope and purpose of the resolution. I do not know that any money will be expended. The resolution merely provides that this officer shall be received in a manner consonant to his rank. I suppose the amount of it will be to direct some proper officer of our Navy to receive him and provide for his personal wants, and see that the objects of his mission are effected. It may cost a few hundred dollars, or a few thousands; but the limit is in the scope of the resolution. I should have no objection to make an appropriation, if we knew what it would be.

The honorable Senator, I suppose, is aware that it has been the practice of the Government to appropriate money for the purpose of conforming to the usages of eastern nations in more instances than one, as a matter of courtesy only. There was appropriated, I think, $10,000, the other day—for what purpose? To make presents, in conformity to eastern custom, on the exchange of treaties with the Shah of Persia. The usage is theirs, not ours; we only conform to it. I should have no objection, in the world, to put an appropriation in the resolution, if I knew what the amount would be. I suppose it will be a few hundreds or a few thousands.

The honorable Senator says he is not aware of any benefit coming from these national courtesies. At the last Congress, when we provided for restoring the ship Resolute to England, Congress required that the ship should be refitted and returned in a perfect manner, and appropriated no money, but the scope of the resolution showed the extent of expenditure. I do not know what was expended; I dare say, though, some thirty or forty thousand dollars. Certainly not less than thirty or forty thousand dollars were expended in putting that ship in perfect order. I do know—not from newspaper report only, but from the official correspondence which ensued on that event—that the restoration of that ship went more to fix the national feeling in Great Britain towards this country than any event that had ever occurred.

As to this small matter, the Sultan has sent one of his principal naval officers here to superintend the construction of a ship-of-the-line. If he came from any European Government he would be received as any European gentleman is, with the private courtesies or the official courtesies of the Government; but he comes from a people who are accustomed to a different sort of reception. I should think that the proprieties of usage would be that we should conform, within proper limits, to their customs. That is the whole object of the resolution.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I shall not go over again the case of Kossuth. I expressed my opinion on that at the time, and have never seen any cause to regret the demonstration which was made by the Government of the United States, showing its sympathy with the cause of freedom in Europe.

In regard to the case of the Turkish officer, Amin Bey, who was received in a manner somewhat similar to this a few years ago, I expected the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations would correct the error into which the Senator from Alabama has fallen on that subject. Amin Bey was no impostor. He was a visitor here, and came with letters and credentials from the Turkish Government. The Grand Sultan took an interest in his coming—indicated a wish that he should come; and he communicated to this Government his desire that he should be received with courtesy and distinction. He was an officer of very considerable position; I do not remember what. After he completed his visit, and returned to Turkey, the Turkish Government expressed the satisfaction with which they regarded the reception that had been given to him. Now, I do not know, sir, how much has been made by that act of courtesy, but I do know that it cost very little; and that, though courtesies may not be returned in money in this world, acts of kindness, politeness, hospitality, and generosity, are always compensated by equivalents of some kind.

A word now with regard to this particular case. Heretofore, as everybody knows, there has been no minister from Turkey in this country. The Turkish Government has remained in a state of seclusion, so far as this Government is concerned, except as we have penetrated it, by keeping a minister resident at Constantinople. The Turkish Government gives its orders for the manufactures of more civilized nations, generally to France and England. It has seen fit, in the present case, to notice the fact that the sciences and arts are developed to a very high degree in the United States; and notwithstanding the competition, in the councils of the Turkish Government, as to the place where a national vessel should be built, it has concluded to send a naval officer here, for the purpose of having one constructed in the United States. He is to come here for that purpose. This resolution barely contemplates that he shall be received according to his rank as a naval officer, not otherwise; and that he shall have all the facilities which this Government can afford, for inspecting the naval establishments of the United States, the places and establishments where ships-of-war are built. The effect of it probably will be, that many of the Oriental nations will be brought into closer communication with the United States.

It seems to me, that if it was wise (as no one can doubt) that we should open Japan to our commerce, that we should have a representative in China, and that we should seek to extend our commerce into that empire, the same policy dictates that we should encourage any demonstration which the Turkish Government may make towards us of a similar character. If it be true, as I suppose it is, that this is according to the Oriental custom, we are but returning to the Turkish Government the same civilities which other nations, whether civilized or barbarian, extend to the Turkish Government, and which they extend to all other Governments.

Mr. HUNTER. I regret very much to oppose this resolution, but really it seems to me to be establishing a bad precedent. I do not agree that Turkey stands in the rank of barbarous nations. We should not treat an agent from any of the civilized Governments of Europe in this way, and I do not see why we should extend these civilities and make this appropriation in order to accommodate a Turkish minister, and refuse them to the agents of the other Governments of Europe. I think it is a precedent which may lead to ill consequences hereafter.

Mr. MASON. Will my colleague allow me to put a question? My colleague, I presume, voted the other day for the appropriation of $10,000 to make presents to the Shah of Persia, on the occasion of exchanging ratifications of the treaty. Did he disapprove that policy?

Mr. HUNTER. The Shah of Persia stands in a very different relation to this country, and to the civilized world. I think he does come within the rank of those to whom we might extend extraordinary courtesy; but I do not put the Sultan of Turkey in the same rank as the Shah of Persia. I think he is rather to be recognized among the civilized Powers of Europe, and I should be unwilling to set this precedent.

Mr. BIGGS. It may be unfashionable to refer to the power of Congress to make an appropriation of this kind, after the numerous precedents that have been cited to the contrary; but I should like to know where is the power under the Constitution of the United States for us to appropriate money to carry a Turkish officer from one portion of this country to another. I should like to know under what clause of the Constitution of the United States we have the right to appropriate money for the purpose of showing a Turkish officer about this country. I do not understand that there is any such power in the Constitution of the United States. It seems to me that in the present state of the Treasury, it is about as much as we can do to pay the expenses we are authorized to incur under the Constitution—to pay our own officers. The idea of appropriating an indefinite sum (for this resolution is totally indefinite, so far as the appropriation is concerned) for this civility, as it is called, towards this Turkish officer, it strikes me ought not to be entertained for one moment in the Senate.

It seems to me that the President of the United States has the power to extend the advantages proposed by this resolution to be given to this Turkish officer to investigate our naval establishments, and gain all the information he possibly can from an inspection of our naval architecture. He has already that power; and I have no doubt this duty would be performed, on his part, in a becoming manner, and in a grateful manner to the Turkish officer who is expected; but that is not the object of the present resolution. The object is to get through Congress an indefinite appropriation to pay the expenses of this Turkish officer. If the resolution is to pass, I insist upon it that we ought to have some limitation as to the amount. Being opposed to it out and out, I shall vote against the resolution entirely; but for the purpose of limiting it, and making it as perfect as possible, I propose a proviso, that the expenditure hereby authorized shall not exceed $5,000.

Mr. HALE. I was in my seat, last year, I think it was, when a report came in from the Committee on Foreign Relations, proposing to buy the ship Resolute and make a present of it to the Queen of Great Britain. I had the same difficulty then that the Senator from North Carolina has now, as to the constitutional power; and I looked to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and all the great lights of strict constructions, expecting that some of them would throw some light upon it; but there was not a word said, and I concluded that it was so well settled that I should only expose my ignorance if I were to ask the same question which has been propounded now by the Senator from North Carolina. He was in his seat then, and I looked to him at the time; but he said nothing. If he wants to find the authority for appropriating this money to receive this Turkish Pasha, he will find it in the same clause of the same section of the Constitution giving power to buy the ship Resolute. [Laughter.] If he will turn to that clause and find the constitutional charter that guided him then, he will find right under it exactly the provision, in so many words, to appropriate this money to entertain the Turkish Pasha.

Mr. MASON. My recollection is not very distinct; but I have a strong impression that the suggestion now made by the Senator from North Carolina, was made in the case of the Resolute, and that we did find the right to appropriate the money, and that the answer was given at the time that it was the unquestioned duty of the Federal Government to regulate our intercourse with foreign nations—the very same power that appropriates a fund for the continued intercourse with foreign nations. I thought it was answered at that time; but certain it is that that resolution to purchase the ship Resolute received the unanimous vote of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is right in one part of his recollection, that it passed without division: there was not a word said against it; but I think he is mistaken about the other part of it, because I recollect what passed in my own mind. Probably the Senator recollects what passed in his mind, and he thinks he let it out before the Senate; but he did not.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to see the resolution pass, because I have not the slightest doubt that it will redound to the advantage of the country. It cannot require a large appropriation. The proposition of the Senator from North Carolina is to limit it to $5,000. My impression is that it cannot exceed, certainly, and, perhaps, cannot reach, $5,000.

The Senate will recollect that we appropriated $10,000 to receive Amin Bey, who came here some few years ago. If I am correctly informed, the entire expense on that account was about $5,000. The limitation on the appropriation here, as has been well observed, is in the language of the resolution itself. It is for the purpose of receiving the gentleman who comes here for a specific purpose, and the operation of which will be to show him through the Federal offices, the different dock-yards, and navy-yards of the country. It will have a happy effect in cementing a friendly intercourse between ourselves and Turkey—a country that we have always regarded with a particularly friendly eye. The idea of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] in classing Turkey among the barbaric or uncivilized Powers, is rather a novel one.

Mr. HUNTER. I said the reverse—that she belonged to the European system, and was so recognized.

Mr. MALLORY. I misunderstood him. If she were a barbarous Power, it would be greater reason for passing the resolution. We have appropriated money for the Imaum of Muscat; we have appropriated money for Japan; we have appropriated money in this way constantly, where ever the interests or honor of the country would be subserved thereby. The ship-building of the country at large, independently of the kind feelings between ourselves and the Turks, will be promoted by this resolution. I should prefer seeing a specific appropriation made; but as the committee have thought proper not to introduce one, and as I see, from past experience and from the nature of the resolution itself, that the expenditure cannot exceed, perhaps, $5,000, I am willing to vote for the resolution as it stands.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection to the amendment further than this: that it may be considered by the Government as incumbent on them to expend the money. Now I am perfectly willing to trust the Executive with the proper, courteous mode of receiving this officer, and it may be done without any expenditure at all; but if it should involve an expenditure, I think it is clearly limited by the general scope of the resolution. I have no objection to trust it to them; but if the Senator perseveres in the amendment, I shall not persist in opposing it.

Mr. PUGH. I shall vote against the resolution with or without the amendment; and I should have said nothing on the subject but for a suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] which quite astonishes me if he is one of the apostles of strict construction; and as one of the disciples of that school, I enter my dissent. He has suggested that there is a universal power to appropriate public money to bribe foreign Powers—to make them presents, to pay the hotel bills of their ministers. I do not understand that doctrine. I dissent from it. What do we want with this gentleman? What does he come here for? The resolution says he comes to look at the ship-yards. That needs no money; that needs no act of Congress; let him go. If he wants to see the navy-yards, he will be shown them. If he wants to see the yards where merchant ships are constructed, as the Senator from Florida suggests, are we to pay the bills for his entertainment? Let the gentlemen who want to sell him ships pay the bills. It is not necessary for any official courtesy. It is not necessary to pay the expense of carrying him over the United States to hire three or four naval officers and a dozen other men to go with him, and to have a show from town to town. He is not even a diplomatic character. He is just sent here on private business of the Sultan of Turkey, to see how ships are built; and we are all to exhibit the solemn spectacle of the Congress of the United States racing after this man as if he were a show to the country! I say that without intending any disrespect; but that is the strong impression the whole thing makes on my mind.

As to the case of the ship Resolute, I do not recollect the matter. I do not know whether I was in my seat when it was passed; but no matter. I can see a vast difference between expending money in this way, and purchasing a derelict ship, which was English property, that came into the hands of some of our citizens as a wreck, which was connected with an enterprise that had enlisted the sympathies of the civilized world, when we were simply asked to buy off the claims of our own citizens, and restore the ship to its true owners. But even that I should not regard as a precedent. Despite my honorable friend from Virginia, I do not think we gained a fig by giving the ship Resolute back; nor do I see how this Government is to gain anything in its intercourse with foreign Powers, barbarous or civilized, by appealing to their cupidity. Let us stand on the exact principles of justice; treat them fairly, and require them to treat us so. They do not make our ministers presents: we do not allow them to take presents. They do not pay the expenses of our ministers: we do not allow it. Let us treat them as we require them to treat our ministers. We sent officers to Europe to examine the condition of the armies of Europe a few years ago; but I never heard that any foreign Government paid their expenses. They went to the realm of the Sultan of Turkey, I believe—at least they went to the Crimea; but I never heard that the Sultan appointed anybody to show them around the country.

It seems to me that this resolution is not only a bad precedent, but it is bad in itself; and, for one, I can never give my consent to it, whether it involves an expenditure of money or not. If it does not require any money, there is no use for the resolution; and if it requires money it is to be expended, in my judgment, for wrong purposes, and it is an illimitable field in which, not the Executive—for I have confidence in him—but in which his subordinate officers will spend just as much money as they please.

Mr. STUART. I did not intend to say a word on this subject, but the course of debate has elicited some ideas here which seem to me to render it proper for me to state why I shall vote for the resolution. In the first place, I disagree with my friend from Ohio entirely in regard to the distinction of power in favor of returning the ship Resolute. I think the honorable Senator from Virginia has taken a conversation that occurred between him and me into his recollection of what occurred in open Senate.

Mr. MASON. That is very possible.

Mr. STUART. I asked the Senator at the time, "where he found the power to make such an appropriation?" and he replied to me as he has now replied to the Senator from New Hampshire. I acknowledge that if it is fairly within the scope of our foreign intercourse, we have the power; but it is not enough to assert that it is for that purpose in order to give us the power. In this case, there being, as stated from the Senator from New York, no resident minister here from Turkey, this officer being about to visit this country on an important national purpose, we may, I think, within the scope of our constitutional authority, extend to him such courtesies, within proper limits, as will manifest to the nation which he represents, a very friendly disposition; and it is within the discretion of Congress to what extent they will go.

I wish to state a suggestion which operates upon my own mind, and which will control my vote in determining what I consider here a question of discretion, and that suggestion is in regard to Kossuth, who has been alluded to. Without any reference to him, or what he did in this country, I take the conduct of the Sultan of Turkey in regard to Kossuth and his associates. They were political refugees in his country, and though Russia and Austria threatened him with entire extermination, he said "these individuals have come within my jurisdiction; they demand my friendly protection, and I will never yield them up." I remarked at the time, that I doubted whether there was another nation on the face of the globe, certainly not another one in Europe, that would have thus stood out in the face and eyes of Russia and Austria. It was one of the noblest spectacles that has ever been exhibited in history. These were men claiming personal and political freedom in the Austrian empire, confessedly one of the most perfect despotisms that exists. They were obliged to flee from that country; they took shelter in Turkey, and the Sultan said, "Thunder your denunciations, and let your guns thunder, and sink me if you can; but my hospitality shall remain untarnished." I admired it; the civilized world admired that stand; and it is a reason that operates on me to-day, when a prominent officer of that Sultan is about to visit this country, to afford to him evidences of hospitality, so that it shall not leave me behind him in the way of advocacy of personal and political freedom. I can see clearly the constitutional authority in this case, because it does mingle itself distinctly with the foreign intercourse of the country. I have no difficulty, therefore, about the power; and the propriety of it addresses itself to my mind for the strongest reasons.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall vote for this resolution, because I look upon it as an act of hospitality. We are informed that this gentleman intends visiting us for the purpose of getting information. This Government ought to act towards him as any individual gentleman here would act towards a stranger who should come to his house or his farm inquiring for information. He would extend to him the hospitality due from one gentleman to another. It is a mere question of hospitality. I agree entirely with all that the Senator from Michigan has said in regard to the Sultan of Turkey in his bold and brave conduct towards the Emperor of Austria. Every American who thinks as an American is proud of his conduct on that occasion, and, if for no other reason, we ought to treat this agent of his with proper courtesy and with liberal hospitality. I shall vote for the appropriation, no matter what the amount is, believing it is only a question of hospitality.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not very often that I have found myself concurring in what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has said, but upon this occasion I endorse every word of it; and I think that for the great Government of the United States, in Congress assembled, to be debating a proposition to pay the traveling expenses and the wine bill of a Turkish officer, who is coming over here to superintend the building of a vessel, is a very small business. I do not wish to discuss it at all; but it seems to me that if any courtesy is due to him it will be extended to him by the executive department of the Government, which has the control of our relations with foreign countries. No doubt the Executive will afford reasonable facilities to this officer to visit our navy-yards and inspect our vessels; and beyond that I do not think anything ought to be done. It seems to me there is no occasion for coming to Congress for that purpose. I trust the resolution will not pass.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BIGGS,] to add to the end of the resolution:

Provided, That the expenditure hereby authorized shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

MR. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not know that I am opposed to the resolution, but I certainly am opposed to the amendment. If it is worth while to do anything, it seems to me it is worth while to do it properly. I do not think it worth while to say to the Sultan of Turkey, "we will receive your officer hospitably, provided it does not cost more than five thousand dollars; we will treat you to the amount of two and threepence worth." If anything is to be done, let it be done by the Government as it ought to be done, and let us put confidence in the officers of the Government that they will do what ought to be done, and not undertake to limit them in this way, and have it go back to the Sultan of Turkey that we would pay five thousand dollars to be civil, and no more. Let your civility be such as it ought to be, without regard to the cost; just as, if a friend came to my house, I would treat him civilly whatever might be the expense, and not say, "I have two shillings or half a pistareen at your service."

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to order the joint resolution to be read a third time to-day.

MR. BIGGS. I object to the third reading of the resolution to-day.

Several Senators. Let us vote.

MR. MASON. I hope we shall take the vote by general consent, and I trust the Senator from North Carolina will withdraw his objection.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution received its second reading to-day, and it requires unanimous consent to read it the third time to-day.

MR. BIGGS. It seems to be the general desire to have the question taken, and I withdraw the objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time. On the question, "Shall the resolution pass?"

MR. BIGGS and MR. CLAY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

MR. COLLAMER. I did not intend to make any remarks in relation to this resolution; but as the yeas and nays have been ordered, I wish to make a brief suggestion. For a great number of years, in many of the Governments of Europe, and it continues with some to this day, their dock-yards, their forts, their arsenals, their national foundries, &c., are all kept locked up from the visitation of strangers. We have ever pursued an entirely different course. Here all is left open to the inspection of the world. Nothing is required from a visitor but ordinary civility. He may examine all our national armories, all our foundries, all our dock-yards, all our ships in the various courses of naval construction, and all the preparations for war. I am unwilling to do anything that implies the contrary. To my mind, to pass a resolution of this kind is to say to the world that we do not pursue this course, and that it actually requires a resolution of Congress to enable a foreign gentleman to make this visitation. Such is the necessary implication of this resolution; and I cannot vote for it because of that implication.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Sidel, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Chandler, Clay, Collamer, Fessenden, Fitch, Green, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Pugh, Sebastian, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Yulee—19.

So the joint resolution was passed.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

MR. HALE calling for the question of privilege, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of the election of Senators from

Indiana, the pending question being on the following amendment offered by MR. TRUMBULL:

That the Senate will now proceed to a final determination of the right to seats in this body of GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, claiming to have been elected Senators by the Legislature of Indiana.

MR. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

MR. CLAY (when MR. DAVIS's name was called) said: I am requested to state that MR. DAVIS, of Mississippi, is confined to his bed by sickness; and he has paired off on this question with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOOT.]

MR. CLAY (when MR. FITZPATRICK's name was called) said: I am requested by my colleague to state that he is confined to his bed by sickness; but he has paired off on this question with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who is absent.

MR. HALE (when his name was called) said: I wish to state that at the earnest request of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is engaged in the Supreme Court, I have consented to pair off with him, and shall not vote unless he comes in while the case is under consideration.

MR. WILSON (when his name was called) announced that he had paired off with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

The result was announced to be—yeas 16, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clay, Evans, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

MR. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the resolution:

Provided, That the proofs to be taken shall be limited to the swearing in of the members of the Legislature of Indiana, the organization of the said Legislature, and the proceedings thereof connected with the election of the sitting Senators for said State in the Senate of the United States, and shall be returned to the Senate of the United States within thirty days from the passage of this resolution.

MR. PUGH. I hope that amendment will not be concurred in. The Senate of Indiana, the protestants in this case, have made specific allegations—they are in print here—just like a pleading. The sitting Senators have put in their answer. The parties have made the issue affirmative and negative; and what is the necessity for us to limit it? Let us leave them to take their evidence according to their pleas. It is as definite an issue as could ever be made up in court. To be sure the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] says they do not exactly meet, as they would according to special pleading, but they substantially meet. I think they have made the issue, and I do not see why we should limit it. I think the Senator had better say at least sixty or ninety days. This evidence cannot be got in thirty days. I think ninety days would be the proper time to fix.

MR. SEWARD. If other Senators think thirty days is too short a time, I have no objection to extend it, so that the returns can be received in time to have the question disposed of during the present session of Congress. I will, therefore, propose sixty days, which is as long a period as it is probable we ought to postpone it; and if there shall be any necessity for any further delay it can then be presented. In regard to the other point, I understand that the amendment contemplates receiving proofs on every point on which an issue has been raised before the committee, as I judge from the report, and from the debates here. I see no objection to it in that respect.

MR. HALE. Let the amendment be divided. I suppose it is subject to division. Let that part which limits the scope of inquiry constitute one division, and that which limits the time the other.

MR. SEWARD. Very well.

MR. PUGH. If the original resolution is read, I think the Senator will see that his limitation is repugnant to the body of the resolution. The body of the resolution is that the parties may take their testimony on the points alleged in their respective statements.

MR. SEWARD. Let the question be divided.

I adopted this form for the purpose of obtaining as much support for the amendment as I could. Let the amendment be divided into the two parts, and have the question taken separately.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment being susceptible of division, the question will be taken first on the first branch of it, which is:

Provided, That the proofs to be taken shall be limited to the swearing in of the members of the Legislature of Indiana, the organization of the said Legislature, and the proceedings thereof connected with the election of the sitting members for said State in the Senate of the United States.

MR. PUGH. Let the original resolution be read.

The Secretary read it.

MR. STUART. I had myself prepared an amendment similar to this, and it seems to me eminently proper that the Senate should adopt some such amendment. It appears to me it will not do to say that individuals may make up an issue upon certain facts, and that the Senate should authorize the testimony to be taken and reported to this body, on that issue. The Senate should authorize the taking the testimony on disputed questions of fact that are within the scope of the Senate's inquiry, but not beyond it. The utmost extent to which I have heard any gentleman contend here, that it is competent for us to inquire, is as to the organization of the Legislature, the swearing in of the members of the Legislature, and the proceedings of that body in the election of the Senators who now hold the seats. This question was discussed all day yesterday. The Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Louisiana both conceded that that was the extent to which any inquiry could be proper.

It is important to limit the inquiry in this respect, but it is also important in another: it is highly important that no testimony be spread upon the records of the Senate upon any question that is of an improper character in respect to its own language or facts. I do not know what these contestants or somebody else might propose to prove; but it seems to me to be very clear that the ground taken by the committee yesterday is the extent of the Senate's inquiry. It is conceded that you cannot go into the fact of whether a man was properly elected to the Legislature or not; that is an inquiry which belongs to the body of which he claims to be a member; and having been decided by that body, it is not the subject of revision here.

But it is contended that there were certain irregularities in regard to the organization of one body of the Indiana Legislature; that certain individuals were improperly sworn in, and other questions of that character, which certain Senators here think are proper subjects of inquiry, in order to the full consideration and proper determination of this case. Whether it shall be found to be so or not when the testimony is in, may perhaps be another question; but it is contended that these facts are material, and it is conceded that they may be material. The Senate, therefore, should limit the inquiry to such questions as it sees can be material to its own decision on this subject.

Again, it is certainly important that the Senate should fix a time. Some time ought to be fixed at which this testimony shall be sent to the Senate, and the Senate be prepared to pass on the question of the right to seats of these gentlemen who now occupy them. I refrain, I purposely refrain (for I think it is no more than proper) from any discussion of the merits of this case, any indication of an opinion on the subject. I have not examined the papers to which the Senator from Ohio refers, nor do I think it essential to examine them. The Senate certainly does know what facts it may properly inquire into for the purposes of determining the right to a seat claimed by any gentleman representing a State of this Confederacy; and, as I said, it was conceded yesterday that the scope of the inquiry was not beyond the scope of this amendment. That being so, for the purpose of preserving the purity of its own records, for the purpose of having no evidence spread upon its records, except such as is legitimate in character and respectful in terms, for the purpose of securing an early settlement of this question, which is always proper, the Senate should prescribe the limits to the inquiry, not only in respect to its character, but its time.

These are my views. I voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] because a majority of the Senate's committee, after a full investigation of this subject, reported that, upon the facts now before them, they are not prepared to make a definite proposition to the Senate, but they require others. Let us, then, have them, but let us limit the inquiry within proper scope and proper time. It seems to me that there is fully as much importance in this matter, in respect to the particular case before us, as there is in respect to its becoming a precedent hereafter. I think it will not do for the Senate of the United States to determine that parties contestants for seats here may have any length of time and any scope of inquiry that they choose, for the purpose of presenting facts to bear upon the right of a Senator to his seat. That it should be determined as soon as can consistently be done, is no less important to the public than to the Senators who are occupying the seats. Every circumstance conspires to induce us to dispose of this question at as early a moment as the legitimate evidence can be spread before the Senate. I hope, therefore, that this amendment, or something substantially the same, will be adopted. I think it should be adopted. I see no reason against it.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES.....No. 46.

Mr. PUGH. I am sorry to detain the Senate with any more remarks, but it seems to me that if the Senator from Michigan had done what he says he has not done—had read the papers—he would have seen the utter want of necessity for any such amendment. I stated before, that the parties had made their issue. He has not read it. He has not read the pleadings. Here is the paper, signed by the protestants, members of the Senate of Indiana. They state their propositions successively, eight in number. The sitting Senator [Mr. FRENCH] has put in his answer, which is to be found at page 3 of the document in my hand, being the report of the Judiciary Committee on this case, at the special session of the Senate last year. The sitting member has stated seven propositions of fact, and not one of them refers to the election of a member of the Legislature; so that when you authorize him to take his testimony on the allegations of the parties, you do not authorize any testimony to be taken as to the election of members of the Indiana Legislature.

The simple question is, why not let the parties who made the issue, and made it in black and white, whose pleadings are before the committee, and which pleadings have shaped the case, take testimony respectively in support of their allegations, instead of adopting an amendment suggested and urged by a Senator who says he has not even read the papers. The Senator from Michigan may be sure that the committee are no more anxious to get a mass of irrelevant testimony before them than he is; but they think they have drawn the resolution properly. It has been three times before the committee. On the first occasion it had their unanimous vote, and it has had a large majority of the committee ever since. It was drawn originally, I think, by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] and revised by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and I think they could draw it so as to reach the truth of the case far better than a Senator who says he has not even read the papers.

It is suggested, however, that if we do not limit it we shall get some testimony on our records that ought not to be here. How is that to be prevented? Who is to prevent a witness from answering a question put to him? The officer who takes the testimony will have no discretion; he will note an objection, if objection be made, but he will have to record the answer. We cannot permit him to decide the relevancy of the testimony. That belongs to us.

Now as to the time. The resolution requires the parties to give ten days' notice in a newspaper published in Indianapolis. You must give that notice, because the members of the Senate of Indiana, the prosecutors, are dispersed; they have returned to private life. They will complain if the sitting members proceed on twenty-four hours' notice, in Indianapolis, to take testimony. You must have a notice sufficient to enable them to come and cross-examine. If the sitting Senators give ten days' notice, they will have only twenty days left, according to the original proposition of the Senator from New York, to take testimony; and when is the testimony to be taken on the other side? If there were a contestor here, claiming a seat in opposition to either of the Senators from Indiana, there would be some justice in saying that his right ought not to be delayed, because, if he is entitled to a seat, he ought to have it; but nobody else claims the seat; if these gentlemen be put out the seats will be vacant; the right of no one else is impugned; and therefore I say we had better allow a sufficient time to enable them to give the notice of ten days to the parties, and to have the testimony here, otherwise we shall have an application, from one side or the other, to extend the period. There is plenty of time at this session to take up the testimony and decide the case; and therefore I suggested to the Senator from New York, before, to fix ninety days, and I insist on that now, as the proper measure. As to the first branch of the amendment, in my humble judgment, it is wholly unnecessary, because the body of the resolution expresses sufficiently the points on which testimony is to be taken.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate at all on this point; but I perceive from what has been said by the Senator from Ohio that he does not understand these allegations as I do. First, the sitting member insists that he was elected a Senator by a majority of all the members composing both Houses of the Legislature. That is not disputed. The second allegation is:

"Second. That he was elected, whilst in such joint convention, by a majority of the legally qualified members of the Senate of the State, and of the legally qualified members of the House of Representatives, respectively."

The next is:

"Third. That in order to ascertain the facts stated in the preceding point, he will be able, by evidence, to show that three of the persons who are contesting his election were not then, and are not now, legally members of the said State Senate, and had no right whatever, under the laws and constitution of the State, to be considered, or in any particular to act, as members of that body; and that this was at the time, and still is, well known to the other contestants."

The next is:

"Fourth. That in the organization of the said State Senate, according to the constitution, laws, and usage of the State, the Lieutenant Governor presides and superintends the admission of the members, and the taking the required oaths of office. That upon this occasion, in violation of such constitution, laws, and usage, the said three members, who were without the expressly required credentials of election, the certificate of the proper and only returning officer, and whose seats were also known to be contested, and on grounds of fraud."

The fraud here alleged must be in the election.

Mr. PUGH. That is the allegation; simply that there was a contest.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the testimony to be taken is to be on the points covered by these allegations, of course it will be on this point: that certain members of the Senate of Indiana were fraudulently elected, because that is the very allegation here.

Mr. PUGH. That is only alleged to show that there was a contest on the ground of fraud.

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot be mistaken in this; and it will certainly be insisted on, that, under the language of this allegation, testimony can be given as to the election of members of the Senate of Indiana. The language of the allegation is, that, "upon this occasion, in violation of such constitution, laws, and usage, the said three members, who were without the expressly required credentials of election, the certificate of the proper and only returning officer, and whose seats were known to be contested, and on grounds of fraud also known to be true, were, by a presiding officer," &c. That contains as direct an allegation as these complicated words will allow, that these three members were fraudulently elected; that their being so was known to the contestants, members of the Senate of Indiana. The allegation is, not only that they were fraudulently elected, but that their seats were contested, and that these protestants knew that they were fraudulently elected. If I can understand the English language, that is the purport of this allegation; that is what was intended to be understood by it, or else it was intended to mislead. Such being the allegation, I say that, unless some restriction be imposed in this resolution, the testimony which may be taken may be as to whether these men were fraudulently elected to the seats in the Legislature of Indiana. This at once shows the necessity for a restriction.

Mr. GREEN. I do not think the practical bearing of the first branch of this amendment of any importance whatever. I believe it will have no effect on those who conduct the taking of the evidence; for there is no tribunal to decide whether the evidence offered is pertinent, or is not pertinent. It will just resolve itself into this in either case: when the evidence is proposed to be taken on one side, it will be insisted that it is pertinent to the issues proposed in this amendment; on the other side it will be denied. No tribunal can decide that but the Senate. An objection will be noted, as the Senator from Ohio has remarked; it will then come up to the Senate, and, even if impertinent to the issue as presented in the first branch of this proposed amendment, if the Senate should see that it has a bearing on the great question, they will receive the evidence anyhow. The Senate will not be trammelled by little technical rules. They will look to the great question, the principle of law as the great guide to attain justice. Mere little technical rules will never hamper the action of this body. If it goes out in its present shape on the issues presented by the two parties, they will confine themselves to the issues as far as they can, but still subject to the same degree of uncertainty which would exist under the amendment.

It therefore, to my mind, amounts to nothing in its practical bearing. It will not cut off the taking of evidence any earlier; it will not limit the volume of the testimony; it will not limit the number of witnesses examined; and therefore all that it will result in when the evidence is brought before the Senate of the United States, will be that one Senator will contend it was not pertinent evidence, and ought not to have been taken; and another will say that, whether pertinent or impertinent, if it is important as bearing on the justice of the case, he will consider it. That would be the course the Senate would clearly take. They will never consent to be trammelled by mere technical objections that do not reach the equity of the case either on the part of the sitting members or of the protestants.

As to the question of time, I think there ought to be a reasonable limitation. Whether sixty days would be sufficient or not, I am not able to determine. The sitting members think it doubtful whether that would be sufficient. I do not wish to cut off the rights of either party by a limitation of time; and if for want of sufficient evidence taken in proper time injustice should be done on either side, we should be to blame for thus imposing that limitation. I would rather give an unnecessary extension of time for the purpose of being sure to get all the evidence that could possibly bear on the case, than run the risk of limiting the amount of evidence necessary to ascertain the truth of the facts put in issue, by saying sixty days. That is the view I take of the question of time. On the proposed first branch of the amendment it amounts to nothing practically; on the second it might do harm; it can do no good.

Mr. TOOMBS. I deem one branch of this inquiry a matter of some importance. I do not think the Senate of the United States has any right to inquire into the qualification, election, or return of any member of the Senate or House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Indiana; and therefore, to avoid even the appearance of the objection made by the Senator from Vermont, I shall be perfectly willing to agree to an amendment to the resolution, providing that no testimony shall be taken on that point. Then, that being guarded against, all the other points in the allegations of the sitting members are pertinent to the question to be decided; or, if not, any departure from the issue is so wholly immaterial, that there can be no objection to it. As to the limitation of time, I have only to say that more witnesses may be required than we suppose, and it may require a longer time to get in all the testimony. We are not presumed to act, and do not act, on the idea that there is any intention to delay; and I should at least suppose that if we fix any limitation of time it should not be less than ninety days.

Mr. STUART. So far as the language by which this limitation is to be fixed is concerned, I shall be entirely content with any language that will effect the purpose. That suggested by the Senator from Georgia will answer the purpose. It is not denied now by my honorable friend from Ohio that the language of this amendment covers as broad a field of inquiry as the Senate of the United States can properly go into. We cannot properly inquire into the character of the election of a member of the Legislature of the State of Indiana. I watched the debate yesterday with a great deal of care to ascertain from the various members of the Judiciary Committee what their views were, and I think the suggestions which I made are entirely within the scope of the doctrines of my friend from Ohio. I disagree with him, however, in regard to these allegations; I think the criticism of the Senator from Vermont is correct—these allegations do involve an inquiry into the election of members of the Legislature of Indiana. I wish to prevent that by some language which will accomplish the purpose. The object to be attained is agreed to by the Senator from Georgia.

I cannot agree with the Senator from Missouri, that when the Senate says in its resolution the inquiry shall be restricted to certain facts, the officer taking the testimony, the contestants, or the gentlemen occupying the seats, will attempt to go into an inquiry entirely foreign to that; but if they should, I do not think such evidence would be treated with much respect when returned here. It would be a plain, palpable violation of the authority of the Senate, and of its own rules of propriety.

Again, sir, mere technicalities, as the Senator from Missouri says, are not considered here, in determining the right of an occupant to his seat; but substantial rules are adhered to, and adhered to with strictness. The Senate of the United States will not invade the rights that belong to State Legislatures any more than they will permit State Legislatures to invade their rights. The line of demarcation is clear and distinct. Therefore it is not an answer to the amendment to say that the Senate will not regard technicalities; to say that the judge who takes the testimony will disregard its limitations; that the honorable gentlemen who occupy the seats will disregard them; or that the Legislature of Indiana will disregard them. That is not to be assumed; but precisely the contrary is to be assumed. It is to be presumed that all who act under the Senate's resolution will act within its clear scope, as defined by itself, and attempt nothing else. Then our object will be attained; and we must proceed on the ground that we are giving a sufficient limit to the scope of inquiry. Is it sufficient? No Senator denies it. It is only argued that it is unnecessary; but from the reading of these allegations by the Senator from Ohio, I cannot agree to that. I do not think it is unnecessary; but if it is unnecessary it certainly does no harm. If the resolution means that now, it is not injured by the amendment. If it does not mean it, it ought to mean it; and the amendment is necessary.

As to the time, I agree with the Senators who have spoken on the other side, that a reasonable time should be given, that it should be as full as may be regarded necessary. I confess I think sixty days is sufficient; but if a majority of the Senate think otherwise, say ninety days; but some time should be fixed when the question shall be before the Senate in a proper condition to be determined. I hope, therefore, that this amendment, substantially, will be adopted. If another form of words is observed, I have no objection to that; but it seems to me the amendment now, in effect, is precisely what the language indicated by the Senator from Georgia would be.

Mr. SEWARD. Several years ago, Mr. President, there was a Senator here from Vermont, who occupied a seat in the Senate, (Mr. Phelps.)

He belonged to the same political association to which I belonged; and finding that the disposition of the Senate was so tolerant as to overlook what seemed to be a very great doubt as to his title, I brought the subject myself to the notice of the Senate, on my own motion, for the purpose of having it brought to trial; and with what diligence I could, without unkindness to him and to the public business, I kept calling the attention of the Senate to it until the matter was brought to a hearing, and the Senate decided that he was not entitled to a seat here, and he left the Senate Chamber; and during all that time, that Senator declined voting on any question.

Now, I pursue the same rule in this case. I have endeavored to keep my mind entirely unbiased on this question; I mean to do so as far as practicable; but I see that there has been a delay of a year. I do not complain of that; I do not allege that there has been any fault about it; but there is to be a further delay produced by this resolution. The Senate has decided that it will not take up this question for decision now, for the reason that it wants proofs. I then see that the matter of the proofs is left entirely without any definition, and that we are to send out a commission under which all kind of testimony, relevant and irrelevant, may be taken. There is no issue set out, while, at the same time, there is a distinct issue before the Committee on the Judiciary, and I think that issue is fairly understood and accepted by the whole Senate. I have endeavored to frame an amendment to this resolution, which will present just exactly that issue in the largest possible form, so as to cover every fact of every nature that on either side can bear on this election. I propose to amend the resolution of delay—the dilatory resolution—simply by stating the issue on which proof shall be taken, because I suppose that will expedite the proceedings in taking the proof.

I see also that the resolution is without any limitation as to time, and that the convenience of parties, or the convenience of the persons who may be employed to take testimony, or the convenience of witnesses, may delay and procrastinate this proceeding indefinitely; and therefore I have suggested a period within which the proof shall be taken.

These constitute the two branches of the amendment. I have submitted them because they seem to me pertinent; and in any case in which I felt any special interest myself that affected my own seat, I think I should be desirous that every conclusion of a desire to delay should be excluded. I have listened to the debate without hearing any satisfactory objection to either of these propositions. If sixty days, the time I have proposed, be too short, the Senate will determine that. It seems to me that with our railroad and postal communications, sixty days is quite long enough to take proofs of facts of this kind, which, after all, must be capable of being established by the testimony of a few witnesses, who must be accessible to all the parties who take an interest in the election. Still I am not tenacious about this. Having brought to the notice of the Senate what seems to me to be a defect in the resolution, and having proposed to amend it, I shall be cheerfully content to abide by the decision of the Senate on both the points I have suggested.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator from Ohio ought to remember that this question came here one year ago; that it has been repeatedly pressed upon the consideration of the Senate; and that now it is proposed to take testimony. The Senator from New York proposes to limit the time of taking it to sixty days. The Senator from Ohio thinks that not long enough. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that we owe it to the Senate to settle this question before the adjournment of Congress. If this investigation lasts ninety days, the report of the evidence will come here in the latter part of the month of May. I have no doubt that the testimony will be very extensive; that there will be a large amount of testimony taken. The testimony will be printed. It will require time to print it, time to examine it; and we shall not reach the consideration of the question before the summer months; and we may adjourn early in the month of June. I think this question should be settled, or put in a train of settlement, before the adjournment of Congress. I think it due to the Senators who represent Indiana here; due to the people of that State; and due to the character of this body. I do not think the friends of the sitting members should ask more than sixty days to take testimony bearing on this case. Many of us here believe that no testimony whatever is needed; but the Senate has decided otherwise. I think the friends of the sitting members ought to be willing to accept a limitation of sixty days for taking testimony.

Mr. PUGH. Let me ask the Senator whether he considers it a question of friendship? I have not put it on any such ground. I have put it on the ground that I am one of the judges, and I want the evidence. If it will take sixty days, very well. If it will take a year, I want it. It is not a question of friendship.

Mr. WILSON. I do not put it on the ground of personal friendship; but it is well understood, by the votes that have been taken, that the matter has assumed somewhat a party character, and I referred to it in that light. I certainly did not make the remark in any way offensive to the Senator.

Now, this testimony is to be taken before the judge of the district court of the United States in Indiana, or before the judges of the State courts. It so happens that all these judges are of one political organization. They may also be engaged in other duties. They may not have time to attend to this matter; and I think that if we are to send out for testimony, we should appoint commissioners, and limit the time in which the testimony shall be returned. I hope that we shall appoint men whose duty it will be to attend to this matter, and that it will be attended to promptly; that all the evidence will at an early day be furnished to the Senate. I would suggest that we strike out of the resolution the words "any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana," and insert, "the Hon. Oliver H. Smith, the Hon. John Pettit, and the Hon. John Defrees, who are hereby appointed commissioners for that purpose." Mr. Smith, many years ago, served with eminent ability in this body; he is a man of talent and of high personal character; a man withdrawn from the political contests of the present time. Mr. Pettit has served recently in this body. He is a warm political friend of the Senators from Indiana; a man of talent, and who would, no doubt, if appointed, see that everything which could bear properly on the case should be reported in the evidence. Then, Mr. Defrees is an active Republican of that State, familiar with its affairs at the present time. I think if the Senate would consent to appoint these three gentlemen commissioners to take this evidence, it would be taken at an early day and spread before the Senate; but if we leave it to be taken before the judges of the State courts, or of the United States district court, they may be engaged in other duties, and after they enter upon this examination they may be called off to attend to official duties, and the matter may be prolonged to an almost indefinite period. I hope we shall adopt the amendment of the Senator from New York, which I consider just, and then I shall move the proposition I have suggested for the appointment of these gentlemen as commissioners to take testimony.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On the question of time to take testimony, I desire to say a single word. There seemed to be two classes of opinions developed here in the discussions of yesterday. One is, that inasmuch as there is no law of Indiana providing that the Legislature shall go into joint convention, and inasmuch as the Legislature of Indiana did not by joint resolution resolve to go into joint convention, there is a vital defect in the whole proceeding; that if all the members of the Senate and all the members elected to the House of Representatives had met together in some place, no matter where, in the State of Indiana, and had elected Senators, the election would be totally void under the Constitution of the United States, because the Legislature of Indiana had never elected them, and never prescribed the time nor the manner of their election. With persons who maintain that opinion, of course this testimony would be unnecessary.

There is another opinion developed by gentlemen in the course of this discussion—and I refer more particularly to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Georgia—and that is that what transpired there, there was such irregularity on the part of certain persons claiming to be members of the Senate of Indiana, as to render their proceedings void, and therefore, that three State Senators who were sworn into office were illegally and irregularly inducted into office, and were the same as if they had never been sworn at all; that there were, therefore, but forty-seven members of the Senate; and that twenty-four, being a majority of forty-seven, having met with a majority of the House of Representatives, that constituted a valid body, a joint convention, for the election of Senators. In reply to this, it is stated that although in the morning of that day, and before dinner, there was some irregular proceeding on the part of members of the Senate, yet after dinner they were regularly sworn in by, or by the direction of, the presiding officer of the body. It is conceded, as I understand, upon all hands, that if these persons were regularly inducted into office, previous to the time when this election for United States Senators took place, they were members of the Senate of Indiana, and this body have no right to go beyond that and make any inquiry as to whether they were properly elected or not.

It seems to me, then, that the only question presented upon the discussion which has taken place here is, whether they were irregularly or regularly sworn into office? The only question of fact that has been raised—the only one that was raised by the honorable Senator from Georgia—was whether these Senators were regularly sworn into office previous to the time of election of United States Senators? If they were, that is an end of the question. If they were not, the question of fact which they deem material arises, and it is proper to take the testimony for them to consider in forming their judgment upon the case.

Pray, sir, how long will it take to procure testimony to prove that fact? How long will it take to send to Indiana to find out whether these three persons were duly sworn in as members of the Senate of Indiana by the order of the Lieutenant Governor of the State of Indiana, and whether that occurred previous to the election of United States Senators or not? Thirty days is an ample time; sixty days is double the time that is necessary. So it seems to me; and, for my own part, I should have been much better satisfied with an amendment limiting the time to thirty days instead of sixty days. I shall, however, vote for the amendment of the Senator from New York, although he has deemed it proper to name sixty days as the time within which to take the testimony. All the testimony can be taken in thirty days just as well as in thirty years—all that is necessary to prove the fact whether they were sworn into office or not before this election of Senators took place. If they were regularly sworn in, that is an end of the whole question. The Legislature never agreed to go into joint convention, nor did they go in, if such is the fact. It reduces itself, it seems to me, to that single fact; and there is nothing else which should be inquired into.

Mr. MALLORY called for the yeas and nays on the first branch of Mr. SEWARD's amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. FOOT. It may be proper for me to say that, on all questions arising on the case before us, I have been paired off with the absent Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. WILSON. On all questions connected with this case, I have paired off with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 25: as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harian, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Evans, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, and Yulee—25.

So it was rejected; and the question occurred on the second branch of Mr. SEWARD's amendment proposing to limit the time for taking testimony to sixty days.

Mr. PUGH. I move to amend the amendment by striking out sixty days and inserting ninety.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown,

Clay, Evans, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harian, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move an additional proviso to the resolution as amended:

And provided, That no testimony shall be taken under this resolution in relation to the qualification, election, or return of any member of the Indiana Legislature.

I wish to set that question on a certain basis.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words, "any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana," and inserting "the Hon. Oliver H. Smith, the Hon. John Pettit, and the Hon. John Defrees, who are hereby appointed commissioners for that purpose."

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The original resolution reported by the committee was drawn in conformity with the general usage of the Government for many years. The taking of such testimony has always been limited to the judges of courts of record. We cannot compel the three gentlemen named by the Senator from Massachusetts, or a majority of them, to attend to this matter. It may interfere with their other duties. The investigation might be delayed and impeded by appointing three commissioners, who are engaged in other employments. I do not know them, except one of the gentlemen who was formerly a Senator in this body. The resolution refers the matter to the proper persons to take testimony, those whom the laws of Indiana recognize. We ought not to allow this testimony to be taken by anybody whom the laws of Indiana do not recognize as proper for that purpose—the judges of her supreme or circuit courts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have some apprehension, as the time is limited within which testimony is to be taken, that there may be a failure on one side or the other to get all the testimony; so that this matter cannot be definitively settled at the end of ninety days. I ask the Senator from Georgia what objection there is to inserting, after the provision which the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to strike out, the words "or any other persons qualified by the laws of Indiana to take testimony?" If we agree to that, and one of these gentlemen cannot attend to it, somebody else can be found who will; and then it will not be confined, as I understand it is now, to persons all of one political denomination.

Mr. TOOMBS. I can only state that I do not know what party these judges belong to. I do not know what are the politics of the judges. I never heard a suggestion on that point. Certainly none was made to me from Indiana, or anywhere else. I pursued the form usually adopted. The reason why I did not desire to extend it lower was because we might get into difficulties on account of the infidelity of inferior officers in taking testimony; but when we confide it to the judges, it is to be presumed that they are proper persons. To what party they may belong I do not know.

Mr. PUGH. I understand that the judges of the circuit court are elected by the people of separate districts, and the judges of the supreme court by the people at large.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be, but it does not disprove the allegation which has been made.

I presume those gentlemen, if they undertake the matter, will attend to it faithfully; but there is no mode of compelling them to take this testimony. It is a matter entirely within their choice to take it or not. It is possible they may find it convenient to take it on one side and not on the other. What will you do in that case?

Mr. TOOMBS. If we allow the testimony to be taken before so large a number of persons as all the judges of the supreme court, and of the circuit courts, I take it for granted that there will be found some person who will do this duty, and I confined it to them because that had been the regular course.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I doubt whether the Senate can have all the testimony taken in ninety days, according to the original resolution.

Mr. TOOMBS. If there should be a difficulty, either party could come to the Senate and have the time enlarged.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But I do not want the time enlarged. I wish to prevent the necessity of any such application.

Mr. TOOMBS. I should hold that either party desiring an extension of time should come early, and if it was shown to be necessary to enlarge the rule, and allow other persons to take testimony, I presume that would be allowed if a proper case was made out for it; as for example, if the persons now authorized would not attend to it.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now move to amend the resolution by striking out the words, "the supreme or circuit courts," and inserting instead of them, "any court of record," so that it will read, "or any judge of any court of record in the State of Indiana." That will include a still larger class. It will include the probate judges, I suppose.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. GREEN. I think there may be objection to the amendment in this respect: there is a court of record in every county of the State, and they may be taking evidence in every county at the same time, while the sitting Senators would not be able to be present at them all.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is an objection which I did not think of.

Mr. GREEN. I should like to have some system designated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The circuit courts extend over the whole State.

Mr. GREEN. That is true; but at the same time their number is limited, and both parties cannot be taking evidence at the same number of places as may be allowed under the amendment which the Senator now proposes. Probate judges keep records, and you can multiply them almost indefinitely. Some probate courts consist of three judges, so that you may multiply the number of probate courts by three; add to that all the circuit courts and all the judges of the supreme court of Indiana, and then you will have the number of persons before whom, under this amendment, testimony may be taken. Sometimes there is a commissioner's court to transact county business in a county, keeping a record, and called a court of record. You may multiply the number of such courts by three, and add that to the former number, and take testimony before so many persons. I really think it would produce confusion, and render it impossible for the parties to attend to the taking of this evidence. I think a fair opportunity ought to be afforded on both sides, or else no opportunity at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My simple object in moving the amendment was to so enlarge the number of persons before whom the testimony might be taken as to prevent the chance of failure to have the testimony taken at the end of the ninety days. If you confine it to the judges of the supreme and circuit courts, their number is very limited, and they may be engaged in the trial of causes, or other reasons may render it possible that the testimony will not be completed in time. For this reason I have offered the amendment allowing the testimony to be taken before the judge of any court of record in the State of Indiana.

Now, I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri in his supposition. I do not take it for granted that gentlemen of the high standing of these gentlemen, Senators of the United States on the one side, and members of the Senate of the State of Indiana on the other, would go to playing little pettifoggery tricks on each other. I think better of them. I do not suppose that either of those gentlemen will give notice of testimony to be taken in half a dozen places on the same day, or that their adversaries will do so. I do not presume such small business will be engaged in by such men. I hope they are men of more consideration than to resort to such means. I think the objection which is made does not lie, and I really think the Senate will be doing nothing unreasonable when they have given the time of ninety days, and when there is so strong a desire to have this question settled, to make sure that there is a chance to take all the testimony that is necessary within that time, and not have the matter extended again at the end of the ninety days, on account of the failure to get all the testimony on one side or the other.

Mr. GREEN. I hope that neither the Senators sitting in this Chamber nor the Senators in Indiana would be guilty of small things; but we know that the issues presented represent some of them as having done very small things. They may do so again; and I want to keep them from having the opportunity to repeat the small things, if they ever did commit them heretofore. We know that serious charges are made against them. They may or may not be correct. If you confine the taking of evidence to one point or one locality, I care not about the person before whom it may be taken, so that he be an honest man; but if you permit them to scatter all over the State and multiply different points at which it is to be taken, it would be an exceeding hardship on the parties.

Mr. PUGH. I was inclined at first to agree to the amendment; but I rather think my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Missouri, is right. I understand that there are four judges of the supreme court of Indiana, thirteen judges of the circuit courts, and there is a judge of the United States district court—eighteen persons, any one of whom is competent to take this testimony. I would rather have it taken before the judge of a superior court. I do not want to get down before county courts or justices of the peace. I would rather have it taken before a man of some judicial experience and ability; and therefore I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment.

The amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 16, noes 22.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGGS, Senators returned and admitted to their seats, from the State of Indiana, the sitting members, and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves, or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting members, touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceedings in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis: Provided, That the proofs to be taken shall be returned to the Senate of the United States within ninety days from the passage of this resolution: And provided, That no testimony shall be taken under this resolution in relation to the qualification, election, or return, of any member of the Indiana Legislature.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. BARCLAY, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had signed a joint resolution making an appropriation for the payment of expenses of the investigating committees of the House of Representatives; which was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STUART. There was a report made by the Committee on Printing this morning, that I think might be disposed of, asking to be discharged from the consideration of a resolution in regard to the public printing. If the Senate will take it up, I will propose to substitute the Register of the Treasury, for the purpose of making the inquiry and reporting the facts to the Senate, and strike out that part of the resolution proposing to report by bill. Of course he cannot report by bill; but we can get the facts ascertained and reported to the Senate by the Register of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair considers it his duty to call the attention of the Senate to a special order first; but it is subject to the control of the body.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the gentleman be kind enough to withdraw that motion so that I may move to take up the Army bill and have it made the special order for one o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. SEWARD and Mr. STUART. It is now the special order.

Mr. IVERSON. Is it the special order for to-morrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a special order for to-morrow at one o'clock; but it is superseded by half a dozen other special orders.

Mr. IVERSON. I did not understand the remark of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The remark of the Chair is that the Army bill is the special order, and can be called up at one o'clock to-morrow; but at that hour there are other and older special orders which will be called up by the Chair and have precedence of it unless they be postponed.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to take up the Army bill at present, with a view to leave it as unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. That will not give it any precedence. If it has any effect it will be an injury, because it will make it a younger order.

Mr. IVERSON. We can take it up and let it go over as the unfinished business.

Mr. STUART. In that view, I suppose the motion I submitted would have precedence. I submitted a motion and the Chair interposed, and announced that he would call up the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. With the leave of the Senate, the Chair will state that the business regularly to be called up now, is the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] to refer so much of the President's annual message as relates to Kansas to the Committee on Territories, and now the Senate can determine whether it will consider it or postpone it. The Chair calls that up in the regular order of business.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone it until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL PRINTING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next special order on the Calendar is—

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone all the special orders until to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. Now I move to take up the report of the Committee on Printing on the resolution to which I referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Printing asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution. I have no objection to that.

The motion to discharge the Committee on Printing was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "the Committee on Printing," and inserting "the Register of the Treasury," and also by striking out the words "and that they report by bill or otherwise."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a small matter, but it is against form. I never heard of a resolution of inquiry directed to the Register of the Treasury. It should be directed to the Secretary of the Treasury and let him get the information. I move, by general consent, that the alteration be made.

Mr. STUART. I have no objection to that.

It was so modified.

The resolution, as modified and adopted, is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate what amount has been paid, annually, during the last five years, to each of the printing establishments in the city of Washington for printing and advertising of any kind for the United States, other than that ordered by either House of Congress, whether done by direction of any Department, or civil or military officer thereof. Also, whether the same has been paid under the provisions of the existing law, and whether any amendment of existing laws is necessary in order to secure proper economy in the printing expenditures of the Government.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States be taken up, not with a view of considering it now; but the Senator from Virginia has an amendment, and he desires to offer it. Let us take it up, and then let it pass over until to-morrow as the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator to move to reconsider the vote by which that special order was postponed to to-morrow.

Mr. IVERSON. I make that motion.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and,

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment; the pending question being on Mr. STUART's motion to strike out the fourth section.

Mr. IVERSON. I was told that the Senator from Michigan, who moved the pending amendment to strike out the fourth section, would withdraw that motion for the present, and let the Senator from Virginia offer his substitute, which contains the same provisions, and he can afterwards renew it, if he thinks proper.

Mr. STUART. I have no objection to withdrawing the amendment, with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe I shall then have to get the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not know whether he will waive his substitute. I wish to offer an amendment as a substitute for the bill. I give notice that I shall offer a substitute for the bill, and I ask that it be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That in addition to the military establishment of the United States, there shall be raised and organized under the direction of the President, one regiment of dragoons and two regiments of infantry, each to be composed of the same number and rank of commissioned and non-commissioned officers, buglers, musicians, privates, &c., as are provided for a regiment of dragoons and infantry respectively, under existing laws; and who shall receive the same pay, rations and allowances, according to their respective grades, and be subject to the same regulations, and to the rules and articles of war: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States alone to appoint such of the commissioned officers authorized by this act, below the grade of field officers, as may not be appointed during the present session.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by this act, shall immediately be discharged from the service of the United States at the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That regular promotions to vacancies occurring in the grades of commissioned officers in the regiments hereby authorized and required to be raised, shall be by regiments instead of by arms of service, as now regulated and provided in certain cases.

Mr. WILSON. I gave notice of an amendment to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert a substitute providing for the raising of volunteers, which will supersede this amendment, I suppose. I should like to have a vote on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no pending amendment, the Senator from Michigan having withdrawn his motion.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Massachusetts offered an amendment, or gave notice of one, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to state that the Senator from Massachusetts gave notice of an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HUNTER. I move this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. WILSON. I move, if it be in order now, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert this substitute.

Mr. HUNTER. Can I not move mine as an amendment to his?

Mr. WILSON. My motion is to strike out and insert.

Mr. HUNTER. I give notice that I shall move this substitute, if the Senate should not agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I move that my amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now offer my amendment to strike out the whole of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the President, for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States, of maintaining peace with the Indian tribes, and of protecting the citizens on the routes of emigration in the Territory of Utah, and to be employed only in said Territory, be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding in all five thousand officers and men, who may offer their services, as infantry, to serve for twelve months, unless they be sooner discharged, or been mustered into the service of the United States; and that the sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers, when mustered into the service, shall be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, and until discharged therefrom be subject to the rules and articles of war; and shall be organized in the same manner, and shall receive the same pay and allowances as the infantry arm of the Army of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers so offering their services shall be accepted by the President in companies, battalions, or regiments, and that each company shall consist of the same number of officers and men as now prescribed by law for the infantry arm of the Army. The captain and lieutenants of the said companies shall be elected by the company and commissioned by the President of the United States; and the President shall apportion the staff and field officers among the States and Territories from which the volunteers shall tender their services, as he may deem proper.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, and who shall be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred upon persons wounded or disabled in the service of the United States.

Mr. PUGH. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, by striking out, in the fifth line, the words, "the citizens on," and also by striking out the word "in" at the end of that line, the whole of the sixth line and part of the seventh line, and also to insert "to the Pacific coast," so as to make it read:

"That the President, for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States, of maintaining peace with the Indian tribes, and of protecting the routes of emigration to the Pacific coast, be, and he is hereby, authorized," &c.

I understand that, if we increase the military force of the United States, the President is, by the Constitution, Commander-in-Chief, and we have no right to require him to employ one particular branch of force in one part of the country to the exclusion of the other.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, February 16, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. H. M. Sires.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT ON EMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the letter of the Secretary of State, transmitting the annual report on emigration; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting an annual statement required by act of 26th August, 1842, respecting the employes in said Department during the year ending the 31st December, 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

COLONEL CRABB'S EXPEDITION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in reply to the resolution of the House of the 18th ultimo, requesting "to be furnished with official information and correspondence in relation to the execution of Colonel Crabb and his associates within, or near, the limits of the Republic of Mexico;" which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOYCE. I now call up the report from the Committee of Elections, in the contested election case of Brooks against Davis.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will yield for a moment, until I can make a report from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BOYCE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LETCHER. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report to the House a bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year, ending 30th of June, 1858.

I take occasion to remark that after this bill has been printed, and gentlemen have had an opportunity to look into it and into the accompanying papers, I will, some time next week, move to take the bill up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There are many items embraced which are of great importance to the country, and it is necessary that they should have speedy action.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS OF TEXAS LEGISLATURE.

Mr. REAGAN. With the permission of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BOYCE,] I wish to introduce the joint resolutions of the State of Texas, in regard to Indian spoliation.

No objection being made, the joint resolutions were received, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. By the consent of the House, and the permission of the gentleman from South Carolina, who has the floor, I wish to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the following papers, and move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee of Claims:

The memorial of Riggs & Co., praying for the reimbursement of money advanced to the public receiver of lands, at Benicia, California, under advice of the Commissioner of the General Land Office;

The petition of John M. Newcomb, for additional compensation for services in taking the last census of the United States; and

The memorial of Charles Knap, relative to contracts with the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish iron castings, &c., for custom-house at New Orleans.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled a joint resolution, making an appropriation for the payment of expenses of investigating committees of the House of Representatives, when the Speaker signed the same.

MARYLAND CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DEAN. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is upon the floor upon the contested-election case from the fourth congressional district of Maryland.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Was that not the regular order of business for yesterday?

The SPEAKER. It was; but it is a question of privilege, and can be called up at any time.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Speaker, the facts are so fully set forth in the reports from the committee, that a very brief reference to them is deemed sufficient at this time.

At the election which took place in the city of Baltimore, on the 4th of November, 1857, the sitting member, Mr. Henry Winter Davis, and the contestant, Mr. Henry P. Brooks, were opposing candidates for Congress. The majority of votes appeared to have been given for Mr. Davis, who received the certificate of election; but Mr. Brooks, shortly after the election, gave notice of contest, as pointed out in the act of 1851. Before any evidence had been taken in the case, Mr. Brooks memorialized this House to investigate the case by one of its committees. The ground of contest was, in general terms, that the election had been carried by fraud and violence. The memorial of Mr. Brooks was referred to the Committee of Elections. The Committee of Elections were divided in opinion as to the recommendation they should make to the House. Five of the committee thought the House should not grant the prayer of the memorial; four of the committee thought the House should. The question is now before the House for its decision.

I suppose there is no difference of opinion as to the law of the case. By the Constitution, the House is made the "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This power being granted by the Constitution is above all law, and cannot be taken away or impaired by any law. But as a means of preparing cases of contested elections for the decision of the House by enabling the parties concerned to take their testimony in advance, it is entirely competent for Congress to pass a general law upon the subject. Accordingly, this is what Congress has done by the act of 1851, which is what its title indicates, "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections." By this act, effectual provision is made for the taking of testimony. There is no doubt, then, as to the power of the House to proceed, independently of the act of 1851, in this case. If the House thinks proper, it can, through a committee, or by a commission, take the testimony in this case. The only question is as to the expediency of so doing. The question for the House is not as to its power; that is conceded; the question is to the propriety of the exercise of that power in this particular case. I am decidedly of opinion that the House should not interfere in the matter, but let the parties concerned prosecute the case under the act of 1851.

The first time that my attention was closely called to this subject, was at the beginning of the last Congress, in the contest between Whitfield and Reeder. At that, we on this side of the House objected very strenuously to going outside of the act of 1851, insisting that that law should be followed, and the evidence taken under that law, and in no other way. We were overruled, and a committee was sent to Kansas to take testimony. The experience I had at that time rendered me extremely unwilling to depart from that law, and under no circumstances but those of an imperative necessity. I shall not quote from my own speech upon that occasion, but I will cite some passages from the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, made at that time, as illustrative of the light in which the question of going outside of the law of 1851 was then regarded on this side of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS said:

"These [the questions involved in the proposition to send for persons and papers in the Kansas contested election] are grave questions. They are questions of a judicial as well as a political character, of the highest order. In deciding them, we sit not as legislators, but as judges. Our decision upon this resolution, whatever it may be, will be an important precedent in the future history of the country. We should, therefore, not act without due deliberation, careful reflection, and a full understanding of the principles involved; and we should also be stripped, as far as possible, of all party bias, and all political prejudice. I do not deny the power [to send for persons and papers] in a proper case, though no instance of its exercise has occurred since the act of Congress of 1851, regulating the mode of taking testimony in cases of contests for seats here; and no case need ever occur, as far as I can see, so long as that law remains on the statute-book. Its provisions are full and ample."

This being an application to go beyond the law of 1851—the general law upon the subject—the onus is upon those who favor the extraordinary action on the part of the House to show the necessity for this course. They have felt the force of this, and have attempted to do so. It is urged accordingly, by the minority of the Committee of Elections, that Mr. Brooks is not embraced in the act of 1851. Why is he not embraced? Because it is said that he does not claim the seat himself. But the act of 1851 is not confined merely to those who claim the seats; its language is very comprehensive; it says, "when-ever any person shall intend to contest an election." Now, Mr. Brooks is certainly embraced in this comprehensive term, "any person," and he does "intend to contest an election." To "contest an election" it is not necessary that one should also claim the seat. To "contest," Johnson says, means "to dispute, to controvert, to litigate, to call in question." That is exactly what Mr. Brooks is doing; he is "disputing, controverting, litigating, calling in question," Mr. Davis's right to a seat. It is true we generally associate the idea of claiming a seat with the fact of one's being a contestant; but it is only an accidental, not a necessary connexion. The moment we analyze the idea of "contesting an election," we see that it does not at all necessarily imply any claim for a seat. The fact, therefore, that Mr. Brooks does not claim the seat, does not put his case outside of the act of 1851. To insist that no one is embraced within the act of 1851 but one who claims a seat, is to narrow the scope of that act very much indeed. The object of the act of 1851 is to facilitate the procedure in contested elections. To limit the benefits of the act merely to those persons claiming seats, would be to narrow its sphere of usefulness.

Previous to the act of 1851, there was no mode of taking testimony until after the new Congress had met, and, upon memorial, authorized the same to be done. The result was, that the sitting member, if illegally elected, could seldom be ousted before the end of the long session. The evil from this source was so great that, when the act of 1851 was before the House for consideration, the then existing system of contesting elections was pronounced in the debate an unmitigated "humbug;" and the necessity for a general law upon the subject was felt to be so great that the bill was passed without being referred to the Committee of the Whole. The purview of that act was to give those who might contest elections a more effectual and speedy mode of taking testimony, and preparing the case for the consideration of the House. To hold that persons contesting in the position of Mr. Brooks could not avail themselves of its provisions, would be, in my opinion, an act of great injustice to such persons. It is the privilege of Mr. Brooks, and such contestants as occupy the position he does, to have the benefit of the act of 1851. To hold that they are not included in the act of 1851, is to deprive them of great advantages, which I cannot consent to do.

It is further urged that if Mr. Brooks is embraced in the act of 1851, yet the special circumstances of this case should exempt him from its provisions.

Let us see what those circumstances are:

1. The extent of the illegality of the election; the great extent of the fraud, violence, and intimidation used to prevent a fair election. And in this connection the message and acts of the late Governor of Maryland are cited, and the correspondence between him and the Mayor of Baltimore. Admit these allegations in their full extent, and what follows? Why, that the case is so plain that it can easily be made out by evidence. Instead of furnishing any reason for the special interposition of the House, there is more reason to leave Mr. Brooks to make out the case, as it can be done so readily. So much upon this point.

2. It is said the expense of examining so many witnesses as may have to be examined to develop the illegality of the election should not be thrown upon Mr. Brooks. This is an argument against the entire policy of the act of 1851. Congress, by the act of 1851, expressed their opinion emphatically that the persons litigating seats, like litigants generally, should pay their own expenses. That system seems to have worked well, and I see no reason to depart from it. If we relieve Mr. Brooks from this expense, all other contestants hereafter will feel authorized to apply for the same exemption. We will thus be setting a precedent, which may be very much abused hereafter. It will always be a matter to be determined by the majority of this House; and I would submit, is there not danger that, in the fierce strife of parties, the voice of justice may not always be heard upon this floor? But it is said this is not merely the contest of Mr. Brooks; it should rather be considered as the remonstrance of many citizens of Baltimore; as twenty-eight citizens sustain Mr. Brooks's memorial with an affidavit. If this be so, then there is less necessity for the House to incur the expense; for these twenty-eight citizens can share the expense with Mr. Brooks. I think, myself, the great body of citizens, whose banner Mr. Brooks bore in the election, should see, in a matter so closely affecting their interests, that the expense did not fall alone on Mr. Brooks.

3. It is said the testimony cannot be taken in Baltimore, owing to the lawless condition of affairs there. Mr. Whyte, who contests the seat of Mr. Harris, from Baltimore, on the same ground that Mr. Brooks contests the seat of Mr. Davis, likewise memorialized this House to take testimony for him on the same ground of apprehended lawlessness in Baltimore. But upon the Committee of Elections deciding against his application, he went on, and is taking his testimony without any difficulty. This fact is conclusive upon this point. If Mr. Whyte can take his testimony in Baltimore, why cannot Mr. Brooks do the same?

In conclusion, I see no reason why Mr. Brooks should be exempted from pursuing the directions of the act of 1851. Let him make the effort to do so; if he fails, then the House will go to his relief.

There is an old fable, which has a great deal of wisdom in it, like most of the old fables. A waggon found his wagon in a tight place; whereupon he began to pray to Jupiter to help him out of his difficulty. Jupiter calmly replied: "Put your own shoulders to the wheel; and, if you fail, then will be time enough to call upon me." I think this House may very well imitate the prudence of the great Jove. Let Mr. Brooks put his shoulder to the wheel; and, if he fails, then let him call upon us, and we will then go to the rescue.

MR. PHILLIPS. I would gladly, Mr. Speaker, have acquiesced in the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections if I could have done so. But it has been my duty to present to the House a question, which, if sustained by the House, will impose on that committee no ordinary labor. The importance of the question is derived mainly from its value as a precedent, for it cannot be said that in this case it will affect in any manner the final result. The minority of the committee have come to the conclusion that they have presented with some regret. They have done so under a conviction of duty, and in recognition of the great doctrine enunciated by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BORCE], that principles were dearer than party claims; and it is a question of importance to this House as a precedent, because, as has been well said by the gentleman from South Carolina, though it may be brought to-day to affect one side, it may just as well to-morrow affect the other side.

It is requisite to consider how this case is presented, and then to see what is the question raised, with a view to the action of the House. It is among the remarkable things in this case, that there is no imputation of motives, nor any insinuations of being governed by partisan prejudices or partialities. To the sitting member it does not make a particle of difference. His comfort would be better promoted by an investigation made in the mode proposed by the minority of the committee; but it is of the highest importance that this House should retain in its own hands the power given to it by the Constitution; it is of the highest importance for this House, now that the question is presented for the first time under the act of 1851, to establish a precedent that may be safe in all future cases.

The case is thus presented: a memorial was presented to this House in the early part of the session, setting forth that the honorable gentleman from the fourth congressional district of Maryland was not entitled to his seat. The memorialist did not assert any claim upon his part to the seat. He alleged that the election was invalid; that, in pursuance of combinations formed before the election, there was tumult, there was violence, there was fraud; or that there was that use of force which is recognized as equivalent to fraud; and that they were such as to prevent an election. The memorialist asks this House to order an investigation, in such manner as the House may see fit, to ascertain whether there has been a proper election or not.

The minority of this committee, Mr. Speaker, consider that there has been no law passed which provides for this case. This subject of contested elections has been frequently before the Congress of the nation, and on every occasion in which the question has been presented the constitutionality of the law on the subject has been denied. I have taken occasion to look into the matter, and I find, as early as the Fifth Congress, there was an attempt to introduce a law similar to that passed in 1851, but it failed when the attempt was first made. Subsequently a law was passed in 1801, but it was limited in its existence, and was suffered to expire in 1805. Attempts were made to enact similar laws in 1806, in 1810, and in 1820; and on all those occasions the power of Congress to regulate the mode of taking proof in inquiries into the validity of elections was denied by a majority of the body. In 1851 this law was passed. The minority of the committee have presented their views upon this law, as a salutary law. They consider that the existence of this law does not at all conflict with the Constitution; that it is a wise law; that it establishes wholesome regulations by which testimony may be taken, in case of contested elections; but they most emphatically deny that there is any power in this law, or that there is power in any law the Congress of this nation can pass, to restrict either the House of Representatives or the Senate from inquiring into the election, qualifications and returns of its own members. The Constitution prevents it. It says that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Each House, the minority claim, has the right to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, just as each House may, by a grant of power in similar language, determine the rules of its own proceedings; and that an attempt upon the part of a prior Congress, or an attempt upon the part of a coordinate branch to restrain and restrict this House from looking into the returns and election of its own members, would be as futile and vain as similar attempts would be to regulate the rules of proceedings of this House. The minority, then, of the committee, entertain the opinion that there is no power to give to this law such an application as is attempted to be given to it by the majority. They have considered two questions: first, whether, supposing the law to be as stated, this is a case at all embraced within its provisions? and second, if it may be embraced within its provisions, whether, under the view taken of it, as to its constitutionality, this is not exactly the case in which another mode of procedure may be adopted?

As to the first, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that the framers of this law, if any of them were now here, would have no hesitation in proclaiming to this body that the law was framed to regulate a personal contest between two claimants for a seat. No man can read that law without seeing that it applies exclusively to such a case. It cannot be pretended—and the gentleman from South Carolina will hardly urge here—that in the case of a popular remonstrance against an election, the provisions of this law can be closely applied. It only needs a reference to it to see that it was intended to apply only to the cases that ordinarily occur, and not to the case of a popular remonstrance against the validity of an election, or to a case where frauds were discovered subsequently to the thirty days allowed for a notice of contest. If the doctrine contended for by the majority of the Committee of Elections be sound, then this House would exhibit to the nation the lamentable spectacle of being unable to examine into the returns of a member where unmistakable evidence of fraud and error is discovered after the thirty days allowed by the law. The language of the law is peculiar. It says that when any person intends to contest an election, he shall give notice; that when any person intends to examine witnesses, he shall give notice of his intention to do so; that when witnesses are being examined, the two parties, with their agents, may attend. And will any gentleman contend here that this right, thus given by law to an individual, should be denied to the body, to the people, to the constituents? And yet the argument used by the gentleman from South Carolina would deny to the people of a district the right to contest elections in any manner whatever. The minority of the Committee of Elections have felt themselves called upon to present this view. They think that that law is within the Constitution, if applied within the limits of the Constitution; but that, if no examination is to be allowed to take place outside of the law, then it is a violation of the Constitution.

The objection of the gentleman from South Carolina astonished me. Had it come from any other quarter I should not have been so much surprised. But, taught as we are, that the Constitution is the text-book in South Carolina—the book first read in the morning, and placed under the pillow at night, I was a little astonished to hear the gentleman proclaim here—for the doctrine must go to that extent—that the law of 1851 restrains the power given by the Constitution to both Houses of Congress. I had always been taught to believe that Congress could pass no law, its power for the enactment of which is not found in the Constitution. So far as the law confers jurisdiction on magistrates to take testimony, it is within the scope of the Constitution; but I deny that it takes from our hands the power to examine into elections in any manner the House may think proper.

Assuming, then, Mr. Speaker, that this law is only what I have said, and that, by the language of the act of 1851, the contestant and the returned member are on an equal footing—the law speaking of his intentions, his notice, his conduct, and his witnesses, I put it to the judgment of the House whether this law was not made to regulate a contest between two members—a personal contest for a seat? But, Mr. Speaker, I go further. I say that, if even this case may be proceeded with under the law, that does not preclude the House from proceeding with it in any other way. And I ask this House whether this is not a case for proceeding in another way?

It is not at all intended to encroach on any of the comforts of the sitting member. His comfort would be much more promoted by the examination here of the witnesses. He would then be enabled to attend to his duties here, and would not be forced to leave his seat, and—what is perhaps of some consequence—forefeit his daily pay, as he would have to do if he went to Baltimore to have testimony taken there. The committee is willing to take on itself that labor, because it thinks it is its duty to do so. We think this is a case to be exempted from the operations of the law. It comes before us in the memorial of Mr. Brooks, supported by the affidavit of twenty-eight citizens of Baltimore. If the facts which the contestant alleges be substantially true, that there was no fair election, that there was fraud in the acceptance of illegal votes, and in the prevention of legal votes being cast, it ought not to be considered an election at all. That opinion has been officially indorsed by the Executive of the State; and to his office there certainly must be some respect paid. The Governor, in his annual message to the Legislature, declared his deliberate opinion that the election was fraudulently conducted; that by the exclusion of thousands of voters from the polls, there was no expression of the popular will; and that the whole returns were vicious and without a claim to official recognition. The sitting member [Mr. Davis] asserts himself, in his answer, that the city was under martial law. He asserts that the order for the troops had been withdrawn, although the election was conducted while the city was under martial law. If the allegation of the contestant is not sufficient to invalidate the election, it seems to us that it is sufficient to justify the House in sending a commission to Baltimore with power to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses and ascertain the truth.

It has been said by the sitting member that one of the reasons alleged by the memorialist, namely, that most of the magistrates had been elected at the same election, and that difficulty would be met in examining witnesses, as they might be overawed, was monstrous. Well, sir, the minority of the committee did not place it upon any such ground. They put it upon higher grounds. Here is the official declaration of the chief Executive of Maryland, that in his opinion lawlessness has prevailed to such an extent as to prevent a fair election. Here is the allegation of the sitting member that the election was held under martial law. Under such circumstances, with the election recently held, ought we not to investigate it to the fullest extent of the power we can command? Ought not this committee to be willing to take the trouble, and ought not they to be clothed with power to examine witnesses, and take evidence, to see whether these startling allegations are true; whether the facts that are thus alleged on one hand and emphatically denied on the other, are founded in truth?

It is from a sense of duty—of imperative duty—that the minority have instructed me to present these views to the House. It is because these allegations have been made by this high authority that the minority of the committee have deemed that the facts should be subjected to a thorough and searching investigation. They have, therefore, instructed me to offer, as I now offer, the following amendment to the resolution submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] in behalf of the majority of the committee. Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That the Committee of Elections have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses and evidence in the case of the contested election of the Hon. H. Winter Davis, from the fourth congressional district of Maryland.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, whether this is an important question as between the parties directly in interest, I am not advised; but as a question of precedent, I conceive that it is a very important one, and so ought to be regarded.

The seat of a sitting member of this House may be contested upon two grounds. It may be contested upon individual considerations merely, by a man who wishes to assume for himself the honor and emoluments of the place; and it may be contested upon higher grounds—upon principles affecting the rights, the feelings, and the interests of a large body of the constituency. So far as the character of this contest appears from the papers which we have before us, it is of the former class; for though, as has been stated, Mr. Brooks, the contestant, does not, in the present aspect of the case, ask us to oust the sitting member, and put him in his place, he does seek indirectly to accomplish that end by having the matter referred again to the people of the fourth congressional district of Maryland, by whom, I infer from his memorial, he hopes, upon a new appeal to them, to be returned here in place of the sitting member.

The fifth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides, as has already been said, that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." That is the constitutional provision. It is clear, plain, explicit. There can be no doubt, there can be no mistake, as to its meaning, or to the extent of our power under it. But it is said, if I understand the arguments on the other side, that this overrides the act of 1851, which, it is said, is but the action of both Houses of Congress, approved by the President. That law provides the mode in which the contestants shall take their testimony, and bring it before the House for decision. But, sir, it seems to me this view of the effect of the Constitution upon that law is entirely erroneous. The Constitution is one thing; the act of 1851 is another, and entirely different thing.

The Constitution prescribes and defines the judicial powers we possess under it. The act of 1851 determines the mode by which the case shall be presented to us so that we shall have it before us for the exercise of that power. The Constitution makes us the tribunal; the act of 1851 prescribes the mode by which the parties shall come into court; the mode in which they shall present their case to us, in pleading and proof, for our consideration. I see no inconsistency; I see no curtailment of the powers given us by the Constitution, by the act of 1851. And then, if it were so, as the minority allege, what follows? Why, sir, is this power given us in the Constitution a mere wild, random authority that we may exercise when and how we may happen to fancy? No, sir; constitutional power, like every other power, when controlled in its exercise by law, is liberty; but when exercised arbitrarily and without law it becomes tyranny. What are the provisions of the act of 1851? What is the scope and intention of that act? It seems to me the language is too clear, too explicit, to be misunderstood for a moment.

It provides, in the first section, that from and after its passage "whenever any person shall contest the election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall" proceed under the regulations therein prescribed; applicable, as I conceive, to all cases of contestation that can ever arise.

The history of the contested elections in this House furnishes us with many cases where the seat of a member is contested, not by a single individual, but, as the reports show, by "sundry persons" of a community, the rights of which have been so outraged that they, feeling themselves aggrieved, have come as citizens, contesting the right of the sitting member to hold his seat; so that it seems to me we have no room left for doubt as to the intention of Congress in the passage of the law. Besides, here is the memorial of the contestant, showing that his original purpose was to deprive the sitting member of his seat, pursuant to the provisions of this statute. He says:

"To this end, your memorialist gave the notice required by the act of Congress of 1851, in reference to contested elections. The said notice was given on the 26th day of November, 1857, and has not yet been replied to."

With my reading of the act, and my understanding of the Constitution, I cannot conceive any other mode by which a seat can legally be contested, than by the provision of the act of 1851. That provision is general. It provides for all and every case. It makes no exception. It intends to make none, and this contestant manifestly so understood it when proceeding under it.

Having filed his pleadings, as it were, under the act of 1851, then he comes forward and asks to be exempted from its action in taking the proof. Has he any right, any legal right, to such a privilege? I cannot agree with the course of the argument of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. Boyce,] that under the act of 1851 this House has the power to disregard its provisions and appoint a board of commissioners to go wandering over the country hunting up proof of any amount or kind, whenever the contestant may suggest that such a course should be pursued. I insist that the act of 1851 is imperative. I insist that its provisions are conclusive, and apply to this case as well as to every other.

But, sir, without stopping further to argue or to dwell upon this view of the act of 1851, let us look to see the reasons given here by this contestant for departing from the mode of proceeding prescribed by that act. Even supposing my view of it to be wrong, and that taken by other gentlemen to be right, let us see the reason why he should be exempted from the operation of the law. We are told, in the first place, that he does not want the seat himself. We are told here, that he stands in the attitude of the dog in the manger, that, unable to eat the hay himself, he does not wish the ox in the stall to have it; that for that reason he does not come within the provisions of the act of 1851. I have already answered that position. Although he cannot, with the election returns before him, with the sweeping and overwhelming majority of between six and seven thousand votes, expect to purge the polls to the extent of securing a seat here, yet he wishes that the people of the fourth congressional district of Maryland shall hold the election over again, and give him another chance. If the course that is sought to be pursued in this case be adopted, what have we to do with every case where a candidate happens, unfortunately for himself, to be defeated in an election before the people? This candidate has only to suggest, not that he wants the seat himself, but that he wants the election declared void for informality or fraud, and that Congress should relieve him from the expense and trouble of taking testimony to make out his case. What are the grounds of the contestant for such an application? He says, in the first place, "that the disgraceful proceedings charged by your memorialist implicate the authorities of Baltimore as being either unwilling or unable to preserve the public peace." If that were so—if the authorities of Baltimore were so corrupt or so pusillanimous that they would not, or could not, afford protection to citizens in taking testimony under the act of 1851—would not the same thing occur in taking testimony under a commission of this House? Would you be in any better condition by appointing such a commission? Are you not as much protected under the laws of the country in taking testimony under a commission pursuant to the act of 1851, as under a commission appointed by the House? It seems so to me.

But, sir, what are the facts? Do the facts sustain this grave charge against the authorities of Baltimore? You have been told already that another sitting member and a contestant for his seat have been taking testimony for more than a month in the same city of Baltimore, with as much quietness and as peaceably as it could be taken here or anywhere else. But we are told that some twenty-seven or eight men from that city have come up here and made affidavit confirmatory of the allegation of the contestant. Do these affidavits corroborate him? They say that they are citizens of Baltimore, and we are told that they are most respectable citizens of that city. I do not know whether they are the most respectable or the least respectable; and it is a matter of no consequence, in my view of the facts of the case. They say that the matters and things set forth in the memorial "are substantially true, to the best of their knowledge and belief." What does this affidavit state? Absolutely nothing. It states nothing that the affiants know of themselves. They do not pretend that they have any knowledge of the circumstances; but, "to the best of their knowledge and belief," the allegations of the contestant are true. I may with the same propriety say that, "to the best of my knowledge and belief," they are untrue, knowing nothing about them, and predicating my "belief" upon the statements of men upon whom I see fit to rely. The statements in these affidavits amount to nothing, and less than nothing.

On the other hand, we have in this record affidavits of seven or eight judges of elections, presiding at so many of the different election precincts in the city of Baltimore, denying, contradicting, and controverting, in every essential particular, all the statements of this memorial and of the confirmatory affidavits that make up the contestant's case. But if we look at the facts as set forth in the notice appended to the memorial, we then get an idea, some little conception, of the perils which will environ Mr. Brooks in his effort to obtain testimony. We are told by high authority that "the slothful man saith there is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets." Mr. Brooks seems to have the same apprehension of lions, and some things more terrible than lions. Listen to him. He says that a "conspiracy was carried into effect by fraud, force, and intimidation. That in pursuance thereof, certain associations, bearing disgraceful and terrific appellations, have been admitted members of your party." I think there is a figure of speech called aposiopesis, where language is so used that more is meant than meets the ear. These "terrific appellations" were doubtless alluded to by the memorialist to give his words a peculiar significance. We find the same thing has been practiced before by men of poetic and imaginative minds. I think it was about 1812 that there appeared in the London Times a poetic effusion directed against the first Napoleon. After giving a fearful list of his foes, the son of the muses adds to the truculent catalogue of Platoiffs, Kutusoffs, and Rodonoffs:

"And last of all an admiral came,
A terrible man, with a terrible name;
A name that by sight we all know very well,
Which nobody can speak, and nobody can spell."

And the poet of Scotland understood the same thing, when recounting the supernatural horrors that beset poor Tam O'Shanter upon a well-remembered occasion. He concludes with a startling suppression of the most fearful terrors of that fearful night:

"Wi' mair o' horrible and awful,
Which e'en to name would be unlawfu."

"Terrific appellations!" Mr. Speaker, stat nominum umbra! Was ever a more ridiculous, ever a more unworthy, ever a more baseless argument submitted to the consideration of two hundred and thirty-odd men, who claim some sort of character for general intelligence? Terrific names! "Know Nothing," "Plug Ugly," "Shoulder-hitter," "Bloody-bones" and "Knock-under" desperadoes! Terrific names, which have so upset and bewildered the intellect of this valorous contestant that, forsooth, he wants the agis of this House of Representatives to be thrown around him, in the shape of, I suppose, half a dozen Democratic members of Congress, as a body-guard to protect him in the city of Baltimore, when he shall take his testimony; and to gather up his witnesses for him, so that they too shall be protected. I cannot understand it in any other way.

Sir, why did not this very prudent man learn wisdom from a very sage piece of advice, which, we are told, was given by one of the old demigods to the wagoner when he got his wheel into the rut? Why did he not put his own shoulder to the wheel, and then, if he could not lift it out, call upon us Herculeses to give him a helping hand? Why, sir, did he not go on? Why did he not give our friend over the way [Mr. Davis] the usual notice, and try his hand awhile, to see whether or not he could take his testimony? If then, terrible men, with terrific appellations, had beleaguered him, and he had been overpowered by them, he could then have come up with some reason for the alarm upon his countenance. He could have pointed at the blood, and the bullet-holes in his doublet—have uncovered his bleeding wounds, and our sympathies would have been touched. But, sir, I have never seen such an address as this to the discretion of a court—for, as has been very well remarked, we are sitting here in our judicial character—a character, by-the-by, which we have assumed during a good portion of this session, as it occurs to me; and what with adjudging cases of contempt, for the protection of our self-respect and personal dignity, and in preventing our seats from being unduly and improperly occupied by the representatives of these "terrific" outlaws, we are still occupying a judicial position—I have never seen in all my experience in judicial proceedings—which I admit may not have been as extensive and as long continued as that of many gentlemen in the House—I have never seen anything so frivolous as the excuse set up by this contestant why he should be relieved from pursuing the plain, straightforward, and obvious directions of a law which is so plain "that he may run that readeth it." ["Wrong!"] "That he that runs may read." No, sir; I have it right, and you have it wrong. That is one of the contestant's reasons why he should not be required to make out his own case, and I suppose it is his principal reason. The others, I imagine, were put in for compliment—as an ornament—a sort of "caudal appendage" to the first.

What is the second reason? He says that "but sixty days are allowed" for taking testimony, and that the time is quite too short. Pray, what have you been doing during these sixty days? They will have expired, if I mistake not, by next Monday, and you have not turned your hand towards taking testimony so far as is shown in the case. You have made no attempt; you have not tried. There has been no sort of a beginning to make out a case. If this contestant had employed the sixty days diligently, faithfully, and properly, and then had come forward and asked to have the time extended on the ground that, by reason of the shortness of the time his evidence was not complete, that his case was not made out; or if he had come here and shown some good and sufficient reason why he had not done so during the time allowed, I would cheerfully have voted to extend more indulgence, as I did to another gentleman who made application to the House some time since. But he asks no such thing. He is not asking to extend the sixty days; he is not asking us to enlarge it, as we have the express power to do under the ninth section of the act of 1851; he is asking to be excused from taking it at all, and modestly soliciting us to do it for him.

The next reason he gives why we should excuse him from taking testimony, and why we should do his work for him, and at our own expense, to let him sue in forma pauperis—for that is what it amounts to—is, that "ten days' notice is required to be given to the contestee." Why, then, did not you give it? What reason is that why the House should take testimony? The House would not do it, I imagine, without giving notice to the other side.

The third reason merges itself into the previous one, and refers to the length of time allowed by law for the taking of the testimony, which, in this case, he alleges, is not sufficient. If it were not sufficient, upon that fact appearing, we could easily extend it.

There is another reason. I do not know whether the contestant is a lawyer or not—I have no personal acquaintance with him, nor am I informed on that point—but if he is, he gives a most un-lawyer-like reason for the excuse. He says that "the disposition and character of the witnesses, so readily ascertained from their manner by those present at an examination, will be totally lost in its effect if the evidence be in the nature of depositions." Can we have testimony in any other form? Is not the evidence upon which we are bound to act, and upon which we shall finally act, obliged to be in the form of depositions, and embraced in a document like this I have in my hand? Are we going to bring witnesses at the bar of the House, and look them in the face while they give their testimony, so that we can form our own opinions as to whether they testify the truth or not? No, sir; not at all.

Now, sir, take all these reasons from beginning to end, and in my judgment they amount to nothing at all. In looking over this document I can come to no other conclusion than that this contestant felt some sort of a moral necessity, some sort of a political constraint, in order to gratify friends who were urging him up, that impelled him to put on the appearance of contesting this election, and at the same time do it in such a manner as to take away from it the labor and expense of a reality. I certainly cannot believe that the man who presented this memorial is in earnest, or is serious in addressing himself to our consideration, or that he looks for our heeding the prayer of it. It looks to me as though he was doing it as a matter of form, to affect certain ulterior purposes and objects, without any expectation that it was to assume the reality of an actual controversy.

I do not desire to prolong my remarks on this question. The question now before us is simply, whether we should take the case out of the plain provisions of the act of 1851; and whether we should go on and take testimony at the expense of the country? I do not know what the expense would be; but we had before us, yesterday, a resolution showing the cost already incurred of some of these investigations, and what they are likely to cost. And now we are to decide whether we will go on and investigate, not frauds in Congress, not frauds under the general administration of the Federal Government, but frauds in an election in the city of Baltimore. We are to investigate them at our own trouble, and at the public charge. I, for one, am entirely opposed to such a proposition. Let this man act like every other man. Let him do as Mr. Whyte does, who is contesting the seat of another member from the same city. Let him go on in good faith, attempt to get his testimony, make every effort in his power; and when he has done that, and has still failed to bring out the facts, or to establish what he is satisfied is the truth of the case, then let him make application to us for further indulgence; and if he shows a case for it, I am very certain that no one will more cheerfully grant him that indulgence than will I. But I will not consent to this House assuming the responsibility of conducting this investigation at the expense of the country.

I might here rest the case. But I will ask: is it just to the sitting member that on him shall be devolved the labor and expense and trouble of taking his testimony, while the party contesting his seat shall be exempt therefrom, and have his testimony taken for him at the public expense? You would impoverish a member of Congress, unless he were a man of extraordinary wealth, by compelling him to go on and take proof to rebut all the testimony that the contestant might suggest. It would swell the expense to such an enormous amount that members would not be able to undergo them, and would rather give up their seats at once than attempt to retain them.

For these reasons I shall vote against the proposition of the minority of the committee, and in favor of the resolution presented by the majority.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, in order to understand the precise question before the House I ask that the two resolutions of the majority and minority of the committee shall be read.

The resolutions were read; that reported from the majority of the committee is as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the memorialist for the appointment of a committee to take testimony.

That of the minority is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses and evidence in the case of the contested election of the Hon. H. Winter Davis, from the fourth congressional district of Maryland.

Mr. HATCH. In this connection I desire to have the record completed by adding the following sentence from the report of the majority of the committee:

"Your committee therefore recommend that the prayer of the memorialist be not granted, and that he be left to make out his case."

I desire to have that added in order to make the record complete, and to show precisely what condition this question is in. The question between the majority and the minority is "Shall the investigation be prosecuted, or shall it be abandoned?" and to these points I propose to speak.

I am not disposed, Mr. Speaker, to be a volunteer in parliamentary combats. I have no experience in such combats, and no ambition to enter the lists. But, sir, when subjects are before the House which concern my constituents, I shall ask its attention; and such a subject is that now before the House. It bears on the civil and religious rights of my constituents. The question is whether they are to be deprived of their civil and religious rights by secret organizations, and driven into a bondage worse than African slavery? My constituents do not care how the gentleman from Georgia or the gentleman from Ohio may settle their slavery discussion. They do not care whether the one supposes slavery to be an institution of God, or the other supposes it an institution of the Devil. They have no interest in the slavery question. They have nothing to do with negroes, and I do not know that they want to own one.

But I have said that my constituents are interested in the question now before the House. I desire to explain that statement. There is not a constituency in this country so largely filled with adopted citizens as the constituency which I am proud to represent on this floor. Probably all the civilized nationalities of the world are represented there; and some nine tenths of these adopted citizens voted for me. There was one nationality, however, which did not vote for me.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to a question of order. I want to know what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon striking out the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections, and inserting the resolution reported by the minority.

Mr. POTTER. Well, sir, I should like to know what the remarks of the gentleman from New York have to do with the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to confine the gentleman within the rules of order.

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman will find out before I get through, that my remarks are relevant. I am coming to his side of the House before I close. I was going to say that there was one nationality which did not vote for me. The negroes in my district do not think enough of the Democrats to vote with them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is not in order in discussing this question.

Mr. HATCH. Well, sir, then I desire to have read at the Clerk's desk, the grounds upon which Brooks contests this case. The charges which he makes here, as the ground for this proceeding, are as follows—and I think they are broad enough to embrace all the subjects I wish to bring to the attention of this House:

"That the alleged election held on the 4th of November, 1857, under which you claim, was in fact no election at all.

"That intimidation, force and fraud were used by the party whose nominee you were, to such an extent as to deprive the proceedings of that day of all the true characteristics of an election.

"That large numbers of qualified voters were excluded from the polls on that day by threat and by violence.

"That both before and on the day of election, threats and actual violence towards naturalized citizens, became so notorious, that that class of voters were almost entirely disfranchised.

"That persons desiring to vote one ticket were compelled to vote the other.

"That your party by its organization, by the doctrines it promulgates, by the oaths it imposes, having aroused animosities between different classes of our citizens, a conspiracy was formed by and between certain clubs, or orders, or councils, or persons in the party whose nominee you were, to intimidate and exclude large numbers of legally-qualified voters, and thus carry the election—and that this conspiracy was carried into effect by fraud, force, and intimidation.

"That in pursuance thereof, certain associations bearing disgraceful and terrific appellations, have been admitted members of your party, and supplied with money by its prominent members, and that they armed themselves for the purpose of overawing and controlling the qualified voters of this city.

"That further conspiring, the managers of your party provided a ticket for the election on the 4th day of November, 1857, bearing uniform red stripes, visible, howsoever folded; thus enabling your partisans to detect the sentiments of the voter and destroying the secrecy of the vote by ballot.

"That many of the polls were held at places on the extreme confines of wards, so as to bring them near to the polls of wards noted for violence, and for being strongholds of your party; and that such locations were unusual, illegal, inconvenient, and for the purpose of producing fear in the minds of our citizens.

"That violence was used by clubs and members of your party at the elections held in this city in the fall of 1856, and of this year, to such an extent as to render this conspiracy more easy of being carried into effect.

"That persons were not permitted to hold tickets adverse to your party at most of the polls in your district.

"That the police refused to keep open the access to the places of voting, and, with few exceptions, to arrest persons assaulting voters at the polls—they being members of your party, and members of, or recommended as policeman by, the various clubs, councils, or orders, charged herein with conspiracy to prevent a fair election.

"That the 'Superior Council,' an organization of prominent members of your party, who have taken certain sordid degrees, directed the stripping of the tickets, the holding of polling places, and other matters in furtherance of the conspiracy herein charged."

Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House, in the view I take of it, is not a contest between the sitting member and the contestant. It is not a question between Davis and Brooks, and I hold that in the line of remarks that I am going to make, I have the right to refer to any of the grounds upon which Mr. Brooks claims here to set aside the return of the sitting member. This is not a case of Brooks. Brooks being overwhelmed by the municipal authorities, and stricken down by mob force in the city of Baltimore, says there has been no expression of the popular will there, and he asks this House to pursue the investigation to the proof of that fact. I hold that he has the right to ask this of the House. This case, in my opinion, involves the history of those secret organizations of the country. Their oaths, and the whole subject-matter connected with them, are before the House, and I want to inquire into them.

Every man knows—it is notorious, it is undeniable—that in every city in this Union where this proscription, bigoted Know-Nothing party has had power, they have secured that power by blood and violence, and have held it by blood and violence. This is not a mere question of the election in the city of Baltimore. All the adopted citizens of the country are interested in it; ay, sir, and the perpetuity of this Government and the progress of self-government are concerned in it; for if you cannot protect the ballot-box, your liberties are gone. You must be ruled by the ballot or the bayonet. All governments which have preceded us have been so ruled. We are trying a most fearful experiment in government, and our only hope rests upon the purity and integrity of the ballot-box.

The sitting member here is charged with being a member of the Know Nothing party, and the representative of that party. The fact is not denied. Now, sir, I want to know whether the gentleman has taken the treasonable and unconstitutional oaths of that organization?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. HATCH. I do not choose to be interrupted. I do not mean any discourtesy to the gentleman; but I have a certain line of argument which I wish to pursue, and need the whole of my hour to conclude it in. I was saying that I wanted to know, and the country wants to know, whether there are members of this House who have taken these treasonable and unconstitutional oaths? That is a part of the allegation here. And now, sir, I propose to send to the Clerk's desk the oaths of that organization, which I ask to have read.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to have read what the gentleman has sent up to the Clerk's desk, in a debate upon the appointment of a commission to take testimony? I object to it as irrelevant to the subject-matter before the House for discussion. It is not, in my opinion, at all pertinent.

Mr. HATCH. It is read as a part of my speech. It is a matter of convenience. If the Clerk does not read it, I will read it myself.

Mr. BOWIE. I hold that the reading of the paper sent to the Clerk's desk by the gentleman from New York is pertinent; for if there was violence in Baltimore, as there no doubt was, it was caused by this secret organization.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I trust that the point of order will be withdrawn, and that the gentleman from New York will be permitted to make his speech in his own way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it is competent for the gentleman from New York, either by argument or by any paper which he may read, to discuss the points which have been made by the contestant in his application. This report is predicated upon the application or memorial of Henry P. Brooks. The Chair thinks that it is competent for the gentleman from New York to comment on whatever of allegations of fraud and secrecy and oaths, there may be in that memorial.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I suppose under the decision of the Chair that it would be competent for the gentleman to discuss which is the worst party: the Know Nothings or the Democratic party.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has hurriedly glanced at the memorial, but he does not perceive that that question is referred to in it.

Mr. CLAY. What is the paper which it is asked be read by the Clerk?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to inform the gentleman.

Mr. HATCH. It is from the Morning Express of the city of Buffalo, a Republican paper, that must be regarded as entirely sound by the other side; for it had, during the last canvass, a flag with sixteen stars flying at its mast-head, and preached a social negro equality which, as usual with the political priests upon the other side, it did not carry into practice.

The following are the oaths, and I ask every man who holds any respect for the free action of citizens in their political, social, and religious relations, if they are not eminently treasonable in their character and pernicious in their effects upon the political relations and character of the citizen? Read them carefully and ponder them well in all their requirements:

"You, and each of you, of your own free will and accord, in the presence of Almighty God and these witnesses, your right hand resting on the Holy Bible and Cross, and your left hand toward Heaven in token of your sincerity, do solemnly promise and swear, that you will not make known to any person or persons, any of the signs, secrets, mysteries, or objects of this organization, unless it be to those whom, after due examination or lawful information, you shall find to be members of this organization in good standing; that you will not cut, carve, print, paint, stamp, stain, or in any way, directly, or indirectly, expose any of the secrets or objects of this order, nor suffer it to be done by others, if in your power to prevent it, unless it be for official instruction; that so long as you are connected with this organization, if not regularly dismissed from it, you will, in all things, political or social, so far as this order is concerned, comply with the will of the majority, when expressed in a lawful manner, though it may conflict with your personal preference, so long as it does not conflict with the grand State or subordinate constitutions, the Constitution of the United States of America, or that of the State in which you reside; and that you will not, under any circumstances whatever, knowingly recommend an unworthy person for initiation, nor suffer it to be done if in your power to prevent it. You furthermore promise and declare, that you will not vote, nor give your influence, for any man for any office in the gift of the people, unless he be an American-born citizen, in favor of American born citizens ruling America—nor if he be a Roman Catholic; and that you will not, under any circumstances, expose the name of any member of this order, nor reveal the existence of such an organization.

"To all the foregoing you bind yourself, under the no less penalty of that of being expelled from this order, and of having your name posted and circulated throughout the different councils of the United States as a perjurer and as a traitor to God and your country, as being unfit to be employed, intrusted, countenanced, or supported in any business transactions; as a person totally unworthy the confidence of good men, and as one at whom the finger of scorn should ever point—so help you God."

The second oath is as follows:

"You and each of you, of your own free will and accord, in the presence of Almighty God and these witnesses, your left hand resting on your right breast, and your right hand extended to the flag of your country, do solemnly and sincerely swear, that you will not, under any circumstances, disclose in any manner, nor suffer it to be done by others if in your power to prevent it, the name, sign, passwords, or any secrets of this degree; that you will in all things conform to all the rules and regulations of this order, and to the constitution and by-laws of this or any other council to which you may be attached, so long as they do not conflict with the Constitution of the United States, nor that of the State in which you reside; that you will, under all circumstances, if in your power so to do, attend to all regular signs and summonses that may be shown or sent to you by a brother of this or any other degree of this order; that you will support in all political matters for all political offices the second degree members of this order, provided it be necessary for the American interests that it may be done legally; you will, when elected to any office, remove all foreigners, aliens, or Roman Catholics from office, and that you will not appoint such to office—all this you promise and declare on your honor as Americans to sustain and abide by, without any hesitation or mental reservation whatever, so help you God and keep you steadfast."

The man who takes upon himself these oaths, and submits himself and his action to their direction and requirements, yields up entirely and totally his freedom as a citizen. He is not permitted for a moment to consult his own judgment, conscience, principles, or sense of duty.

Mr. EDIE. Before the gentleman resumes, I would like to propound an interrogatory to him.

Mr. HATCH. I want all my time, and I therefore decline to yield the floor.

Mr. EDIE. This is an important matter in reference to this case.

Mr. HATCH. I hope it is, in the gentleman's estimation; I decline to yield.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask leave to have read the report of the Committee of Elections, which will throw more light on this subject than what the gentleman has had read.

Mr. BOWIE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HATCH. I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. FENTON. Does the gentleman say that what the Clerk read is from the Buffalo Morning Express?

Mr. HATCH. It is from that paper, the soundest Republican paper in New York State. In this connection I desire to say, that this secret political organization, extending throughout this Union, is founded upon a hatred of race against race, and religion against religion. This is an important inquiry, and therefore it is one which should be prosecuted before the country. I will not dwell on that point now.

What is the power of this House? Congress has authority over elections. Article first, section four, of the Constitution, provides "that the time, place, and manner, of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but that Congress may, at any time by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators." I refer to this, to show that Congress has the entire power over the subject of elections; that the framers of the Constitution reserved that power; and it was conceded by the States. It was done as a matter of safety, and for the preservation of the Union. In this connection I read section eight hundred and fourteen of Story on the Constitution.

"In answer to all such reasoning, it was urged that there was not a single article in the whole system more completely defensible. Its propriety rested upon this plain proposition, that every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation. If, in the Constitution, there were some departures from this principle, (as it might be admitted there were,) they were matters of regret, and dictated by a controlling moral or political necessity; and they ought not to be extended. It was obviously impracticable to frame, and insert in the Constitution, an election law which would be applicable to all possible changes in the situation of the country, and convenient for all the States. A discretionary power over elections must be vested somewhere. There seemed but three ways in which it could be reasonably organized. It might be lodged either wholly in the national Legislature; or wholly in the State Legislatures; or primarily in the latter, and ultimately in the former. The last was the mode adopted by the convention. The regulation of elections is submitted, in the first instance, to the local government, which, in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may both conveniently and satisfactorily be by them exercised. But, in extraordinary circumstances, the power is reserved to the national Government; so that it may not be abused, and thus hazard the safety and permanence of the Union. Nor let it be thought that such an occurrence is wholly imaginary. It is a known fact, that, under the Confederation, Rhode Island, at a very critical period, withdrew her Delegates from Congress; and thus prevented some important measures from being carried."

These views are fully sustained by the debates in the convention, and all the political writers of that day. I refer to them to show that Congress has the power, where elections cannot be properly conducted and the rights of the people preserved, to go into the States, fixing the time and manner of holding elections, as they may, perhaps, have to do in this very case in Baltimore, before we get through with it. The Federal power extends over elections, and it is all vested in Congress. This would be, doubtless, a novel proceeding, and should only be resorted to in great emergencies. Yet the constitutional right of the citizens should be acknowledged and proclaimed. Congressional constituencies should understand that when State or municipal governments, either through neglect or fraud, fail to protect the citizen in the free exercise of the elective franchise, that he has an appeal to a reserved constitutional prerogative placed here for his protection. Here it exists. It is undeniable. The power of the House is defined in article first, section five, of the Constitution, which is in these words: "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Now, sir, in my opinion, where violence has been used at an election, I care not how the election may go, or what the result, it is the duty of this House to declare the election void. What is an election? It is the choice, the free will, the liberty to act, or not to act. They hold no election where violence or intimidation is used; and this House, if there is no precedent, ought to set a precedent, and set aside an election in such a case. It is important that it should be done for the preservation of the rights of three or four millions of our citizens who are scattered throughout the cities of the Union, more especially through the Northwest. The atrocious wrongs perpetrated by these secret organizations upon equal and human rights throughout this Union call for action—call for a precedent. This Government was not founded in the wisdom of the past, but in the wisdom of the present—faith in man's capacity for freedom. The gentleman from South Carolina seemed to be afraid that we had no precedent. Why, sir, precedents are very well; but that never should deter statesmen upon questions of national progress or safety. New phases must arise constantly in the development of our political history. There is no analogy for this Government in the history of the world. You have no precedent even for the Government itself. Indeed, the Government has no means for self preservation against disunion, North or South, except by the recognition of this constitutional doctrine.

Now, sir, this House should inquire first whether the sitting member has taken this unconstitutional and treasonable oath; and second, was there violence and intimidation used? I am not going to take newspaper accounts for that; for I am going to refer to the testimony, and particularly to the document which the sitting member has furnished, and which will be found in miscellaneous document No. 42, of this Congress. I read from the response of the sitting member to the memorial of the contestant:

"I deny that intimidation, force, and fraud, or either of them, were used by any persons on my behalf to such an extent as to deprive the proceedings of that day of all or any of the true characters of an election."

It seems to be conceded here that violence and intimidation were used, but that they did not come up to the point that would destroy an election. It is a tacit concession on the part of the member that violence and intimidation were used. You will observe, further, that he here says:

"On the contrary, in my judgment, it was the most quiet and peaceful election held in Baltimore for many years."

I want the House to remember that. I have been through many elections, and I leave it to the House to determine what this sitting member regards as a quiet and peaceable election in Baltimore before I get through.

"Indeed, it is not easily to be seen how any election can be held in the fourth congressional district of Maryland hereafter, if threats and violence before the election are to invalidate it when held. Still less can the present condition of my competitor be improved by another election, if, as he suggests, the authorities of Baltimore are 'implicated'—especially since there is no longer a Governor who will give him the advantage again of martial law to secure the freedom of the election."

This statement in the response of the sitting member illy conceals the sneer at his competitor, that if this election were set aside it would be of no use. He says, in effect: "We beat you last time when we had the municipal and judicial authorities with us. Now we have got the executive power of the State, and we do not care how many elections you go into with us." The sitting member says:

"I deny that intimidation, force, and fraud, or either of them, were used by any persons in my behalf to such an extent as to deprive the proceedings of that day of all or any of the true characters of an election."

It will be seen that he always qualifies his statements. Again, he says:

"I am not aware that the House of Representatives takes any cognizance of party organizations, doctrines, or oaths, or of the animosities they may have occasioned; but if they suffice to vacate an election, it may be well for a majority of the majority of that House to look to their seats."

Again, he says:

"There were tickets with stripes on them, and some were cast for me; but I suppose it quite immaterial whether the tickets were white, or red, or striped, in the absence of any law on the subject; and it would seem difficult to avoid the objection, since any color is equally liable to the same objection."

This shows that the sitting member has no effeminate weakness about color. He has not been very particular about the color of the company which he has lately kept in this House, nor has he been particular about the color of the votes he has given here; in short, he has been as ready to vote a black ticket as a white one.

Again, he says:

"The suggestions of terror and intimidation have been held to be no legal ground for disregarding an actual majority, because a possible majority might have appeared on the other side but for the terror and intimidation. Congress refused to inquire why people did not vote. (Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, Election Cases, 1789-1834, pages 504, 505, and 507.)"

The case referred to was an election which took place in the Territory of Michigan, thirty years ago, where the whole number of votes polled was some six or seven hundred, about equal to the number that would be cast in a ward election in the city of Buffalo. The case really did not merit any consideration at all. The intimidation and influence used on that occasion did not amount to more than a pugilistic encounter, a common occurrence even in an election in the great city of Buffalo.

I will now proceed to refer to the proclamation of the Mayor of Baltimore, which document the sitting member recognizes in his defense. But first I will allude to some figures relied on by the sitting member.

In the congressional election of 1855 and 1857, the vote stood: For Mr. Davis, 7,983; for Mr. May, 7,493. In that vote Mr. Davis had a majority of 495. In the congressional election, Davis received 10,515 votes, and Brooks 3,979. In the mayoralty election of 1856, the Democratic candidate received 12,337 votes, and the Know Nothing candidate 13,905; leaving the Know Nothing majority 1,568. The presidential election took place two weeks afterwards, and on that occasion blood flowed freely in the streets of Baltimore. In that election the Know Nothings had a majority of 7,029.

I will not comment on these figures. The country will understand them. It was at these elections of 1856 that the terrible names, to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] alluded, appeared for the first time.

I now proceed to the proclamation of the Know Nothing Mayor of Baltimore, Maryland, dated September 19, 1857. I regard it as good authority, because it is brought here by the sitting member. It would appear by the proclamation that this Know Nothing Mayor was a good law-and-order man, and that he was going to have a peaceful and quiet election—at least in the view that these people have of a peaceful and quiet election. He says:

"It is due to the city of Baltimore, in this connection, to state that there is perhaps no city in the Union where the public press draws more largely for the entertainment of its readers upon the police returns. This has placed the city of Baltimore in a relation of disparagement—apparent rather than actual—and her true position has been still further distorted by the grossest and most shameful perversion of truth on the part of certain reporters of the daily press. In their effort to break down the city government and the police, under the influence of excited party rancor, the city of Baltimore has been given up, without remorse, to the abuse of the whole country."

"It cannot have escaped notice that for months past there has been a systematic effort to break down the municipal government of the city of Baltimore. There is hardly a week that murderous assaults are not made upon her officers in all parts of the city. The executive has found himself without support from a large class who claim to be lovers of law and order, and he has been left to maintain the peace of the city as best he might, with the force placed at his disposal, amidst the jeers and reproaches of those with whom it has been his misfortune to differ in political sentiment."

I read this to show the temper of this paper, and of these men who had in their control the armed police of Baltimore:

"The recent municipal election, I regret to say, has not been without its incidents of lawlessness and bloodshed. These, although limited in extent, have been of a character certainly without a precedent in our past history, because they have exhibited the spectacle of an armed force throughout the city, directed solely and exclusively to bring the government into disrepute by a war upon its police."

It seems there was no war upon the part of these police, headed by the Know Nothing Mayor. We would suppose he intended to be facetious here, when he speaks of an armed force against his police, or that his imagination was disturbed by the scenes of blood and violence about him. I wish to remark here, that these men, in 1856, settled that they should hereafter have a peaceful election in the city of Baltimore. In other words, they settled the question that they would hold the elections of the city of Baltimore in their own way, without being embarrassed by a Democratic opposition, as they have done ever since. Sir, here this Mayor, after citing all his arrangements for this armed police of his, in reference to the morning of the election, says:

"At half past ten o'clock I made the circuit of the western section of the city in company with the chief marshal, communicating with the judges at the various precincts, and satisfying myself that everything was progressing in an orderly manner."

Sir, it seems that the first thing this Mayor did after starting out at half past ten o'clock, with his marshals and armed police, on election day, was to visit a place called Jackson Hall, where a Democratic banner was hanging out. He went there with his armed police, and, according to his own account, fired upon the persons assembled there. He says:

"Under a heavy fire, they charged upon and took a cannon which had been stationed to command the street, making arrests of those who were in the act of firing, and making prisoners of all who were in the house, besides capturing their arms and ammunition."

This was Jackson Hall. I have no doubt that if all the facts were known, this Know Nothing Mayor draws largely upon his imagination when he talks about a cannon. But, however that might be, he brought down the flag at Jackson Hall, charged upon them there, took them all prisoners, put them in jail, and turned the key of the bastle upon these poor Irish and German Democrats.

I will now make the remark, that the contestant, Brooks, alleged before the committee, and has not been contradicted, that on twelve o'clock of that day he went to every precinct in the city—(recollect, it was about eleven o'clock that Jackson Hall capitulated to the gallant Mayor)—and there was not a Democrat at any of the polls. They had retired. That was a very peaceful, quiet election—one of the peaceable, quiet elections of Baltimore.

"About seven o'clock, a dispatch reported that the Irish had risen upon the guard left in charge of the eighth ward, had overpowered them by their numbers, and had shot officer Kidd."

So it seemed that the Democrats now and then picked off a man; now and then fired back. Recollect, now, that this is the account of a Know Nothing Mayor. I am not reading from irresponsible newspaper accounts. I read from the official account of the Mayor of Baltimore, and his statement will certainly be received by gentlemen on the other side of the House as good authority. But he goes on to say:

"Four of the policemen were fired upon, and wounded, by a Democratic crowd, on the morning preceding election, in the vicinity of the Seventeenth Ward House, from which a fire had been directed against a party of citizens, who had been passing in that vicinity."

It seems that there were no Democrats to be found at the polls. You will perceive that, by all these accounts, Democrats were not to be found at the polls. They had been driven to their houses by the martial movements of the Know Nothing Mayor around the city, or shut up in prison by his minions; and these Know Nothing judges of election were, no doubt, holding a very peaceable, quiet election. But the Mayor says:

"Party rancor may be pressed too far. It has already made the whole city an ambuscade, from which the officers of the law, in the discharge of their duty, are fired upon day and night. It has excited to frenzy a large class of the foreign population, and has brought about a state of things which no man can contemplate without regret."

I imagine this will show the admitted temper of our adopted citizens there, and what was the condition of things existing amongst them. The Mayor again says:

"The absence of a large number of Democratic voters from the polls in some of the wards, can best be accounted for by themselves. I saw no evidence of any combination to exclude them from voting. It seemed to have been a foregone conclusion, before the election, that they were to take no interest in the contest."

And again:

"Of the twenty Democratic judges appointed by me, all resigned within a few days of the election, with the exception of six. Up to the latest hour their resignations were handed in at the Mayor's office, leaving it difficult to supply their places in time for the opening of the polls. In some of the wards the resident magistrates were called upon to officiate in the absence of the Democratic judges."

Sir, every man knows that Democrats are generally at the polls. They are never absent without good cause. The laboring masses who compose that party know that it is only through the ballot-box that their sovereign will can be expressed, and their equal rights vindicated.

I understand that this same Mayor Swann received some public testimonial from these "Plug Uglies" and "Rip Raps," "Blood Thubs" &c., for the patriotism he showed in conducting the election in so peaceable and quiet a manner, in the city of Baltimore. "Blessed are the peace makers."

But to follow up the history of this matter a little further; prior to the election there seems to have gone on quite a little controversy between the Executive of the State and Mayor Swann. I want you to bear in mind that the Governor of the State was a Democrat. He thought there was something wrong about the election in the city of Baltimore, and that he would come down there and see about it; and he called out some troops. Well, sir, Mayor Swann did not like to have this Democratic Governor there with his troops, because if he had remained there, perhaps he could not have taken Jackson Hall. They went to work and obtained a number of certificates of gentlemen of Baltimore, that the arrangements were complete, and that there would be a quiet and peaceful election. The Governor yielded. He withdrew his troops. Yet, it seems, he had some doubt about the withdrawal of these troops; while these people looked as though they were sincere, still he had some doubts on this subject. He stayed in Baltimore. I will read from his account of the election. He is no longer the Governor, the sitting member says; and says it, too, with a sneer, and that they have now a Know Nothing Governor. The Governor stated in his message that—

"At the municipal election in Baltimore, held in October, 1856, an organized force was made apparent at the polls, which, in its direct influence, was immediately felt by naturalized citizens. This class of voters was to a considerable extent excluded from the exercise of suffrage; many of them beaten, and others overawed and deterred by violence from visiting the polls. Such were the representations made to me, asserted by a portion of the press of that city, and measurably conceded by all."

"In the course of the day bloody and destructive riots took place, and the subsequent record comprehended a list of killed and wounded truly appalling. The city was temporarily outlawed by its own fury; and it is beyond all question with me that, could the Executive authority have commanded military power at the moment of the emergency, it would have been my duty then to have interposed, and overwhelmed a lawless demonstration clearly defiant of the municipal police. As the time approached for the presidential election in November, 1856, apprehension generally prevailed that a recurrence of similar scenes was inevitable. Political sentiment and party animosity were alike demonstrative and violent, and peaceable and orderly citizens, especially naturalized citizens, were utterly hopeless of those decency and proprieties essential to the freedom of suffrage. In short, the large body of citizens composing the Democratic party within the city of Baltimore saw the day of election approach under the assurance that they would not be suffered to record their votes, and on the other hand, would be exposed to the consequences of the most reckless frauds. I repeat these assertions as they were made to me; and in view of the returns of most of the wards of the city, I have no hesitation in thus officially laying them before you."

"On the eve of the presidential election I proceeded to Baltimore, and sought an interview with the Mayor of the city, in the vain hope of such a co-operation of influence, and moral and material power, as would insure the peace of the city, prevent bloodshed, and secure to every citizen, without respect to party, the exercise of his political rights. My overtures were repulsed with cold civility."

"Again party animosity ran riot throughout the city; the most desperate encounters took place, in which hundreds of infuriated partisans were engaged; arms of all kinds were employed; and bloodshed, wounds, and death, stained the record of the day, and added another page of dishonor to the annals of the distracted city. I retired from the scene, convinced that all this might have been prevented, and not without painful sense of duty unfulfilled."

"Since the election of the preceding year, a new and enlarged organization of the city police had been made, and I was not without hope that it would exert a conservative force in some rational proportion to the emergency of the occasion. I was assured by numerous gentlemen of the city that they expected nothing of the sort, and they referred to the daily record of violence as abundant proof of its inefficiency to subdue even preliminary disorder. The day of election came and passed, and although the bloody scenes of the preceding year were not reenacted, violence was everywhere in the ascendant; outrages were perpetrated with entire impunity, and many thousands of the citizens were, by causes beyond their individual control, deprived of the exercise of their suffrage. In a word, the Democrats of the city, both native born and naturalized, were, to an extent that a few years since would have been absolutely incredible, virtually disfranchised. Facts exist, and are available in abundance for the verification of what I thus assert, and publicity has been given to current outrages of the day in one ward of the city, (and that ordinarily one of the most reputable,) attested by the vouchers of many highly respectable citizens."

"I positively refused, under any circumstances, to comply with any proposition which included such a stipulation: first, because it had the appearance, at least, of a surrender of my constitutional authority at a time when violent opposition to the laws was openly threatened; and secondly, because I knew not what exigency might arise on the day of election. But in deference to the opinions of gentlemen in whom I then had, and still have, great confidence, who were citizens of Baltimore, and who knew more of the local condition of affairs than myself, I consented to an announcement that, in view of the sufficiency of the arrangements just made, I did not contemplate the use of the military force which I had ordered to be enrolled and organized on the day of election."

"In this state of public affairs, the day of election approached. A form of suffrage was observed under circumstances defiant of the execution of the laws. Riot, in its voracious and most formidable aspect, did not occur, but I was made the recipient of almost ceaseless complaints of outrage, violence, and organized ruffianism at the polls, whereby multitudes of citizens, native and naturalized, were deterred from voting. I was powerless for their protection. The opportunity was past in which, as a lawful and enrolled force, they could have exhibited a moral as well as material power against their assailants. They were at the mercy of a mob, and without protection from the civil power."

"Abundant evidence from respectable citizens in all parts of the city could be obtained to prove a state of society verging upon the fiercest anarchy; outrages almost incredible in a civilized community; and the ubiquity of an organization which prevailed by violence, to the exclusion of voters at will, and controlled means and resources for the most pernicious and daring frauds. It is beyond all question that such wrongs were perpetrated on that election day as have no parallel in the election annals of our country but in Baltimore itself, and this, too, under the official assurance of municipal power, and of a police organization, and a plan of operations adequate to the emergency. Such a result has abundantly justified the movement I deemed it proper to make, and proves that the execution of the laws has been violently resisted and stayed, while the Executive authority has been powerless to enforce it."

"This is anarchy; and the issue of such a condition of things under our system of government is political confusion. The formal power it creates is an essential tyranny. It sways a spurious scepter over people despoiled of their rights, and its career must be in profligate antagonism with law, order, and good government."

"Such is the outline of a political era, and its disgraceful character, in the history of Maryland."

"At the same time I record my deliberate opinion that the election was fraudulently conducted; that in the exclusion of thousands of people from the polls, there has been no expression of the popular will; and that the whole of the returns from that city are vicious, without a decent claim to official recognition anywhere, and in all their character a gross insult to our institutions and laws, and a most offensive mockery of the great principles of political independence and popular suffrage."

I have now closed a review of the papers before me. Is not this a case for inquiry, Mr. Speaker? Or shall we hesitate, and stop to count the cost, when the interests of whole constituencies are concerned? when, in fact, the great republican right of suffrage belonging to the only free people on earth is attempted to be abridged by fraud and violence? This is not, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, a question which concerns merely the city of Baltimore. It is not merely whether one person or another shall occupy a seat on this floor from the fourth congressional district of Maryland. It involves far higher considerations—considerations which affect directly every Representative of a metropolitan district, more or less affect every member upon this floor, and still more directly concern every elector who is represented here, or who is entitled to be represented here.

This case is, perhaps, the very best, embodying these considerations, which could be presented to the attention of Congress. It is in this case, perhaps, that the right of free suffrage has been most flagrantly violated; if not, it is, at least, one in which we can easily rise above partisan considerations, and base our action upon broad, general principles. Here we see a whole city disfranchised by the employment of force and fraud, even when the party resorting to such means does not seem to need them in order to carry its men and measures at the polls. The electors are shot down, or knocked down with slung-shot, as they go to deposit their ballots. The voting places are surrounded by cordons of bullies who know each other by the signs of their secret organization, who know the color and shape of the ballots, who intimidate peaceable citizens by the fear of violence, and who use actual violence upon those who are bold and determined enough to insist upon their rights in spite of it. Sir, if this were merely a passing, local excitement, it might be viewed with a certain measure of charity, and the liberal spirit of our institutions might extenuate, though not excuse, an occasional excess. But it is not, Mr. Speaker, a mere passing local excitement. I solemnly believe, sir, that for the last four years, there has not been a legal election in the city of Baltimore. Their elections have not been occasionally, but uniformly, carried by fraud and violence. The electors of that city have lately been accustomed to only such a sort of free suffrage as that possessed by the people of France when they were called on to vote yes or no for Napoleon III., and when every man was warned beforehand that to vote no was to incur the suspicion of an arbitrary authority, which had even the safety of their persons at its disposal. I think that, if any comparison is to be drawn, the advantage is on the side of the French. They, at least, ran no risk of being knocked down in the streets, stabbed with bowie knives, or beaten with slung-shot.

The public misfortune is—though it is the better for my argument—that Baltimore is not the only example of this kind of lawlessness. The same or similar events have been transpiring in nearly every city of the Union; wherever, indeed, a secret organization has attempted to control the destiny of the country. The public mind has been alarmed by a repetition of such scenes in Louisville, in Cincinnati, in Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, and elsewhere throughout the nation. The public have been led to believe by such occurrences that, heretofore, as well as now, persons have secured and occupied seats on this floor by violence, and that the blood of our adopted citizens was on their garments. These things must not continue, if we are to exhibit to the world a successful example of self-government. The ballot-box must be protected, and the right of suffrage must be secured to every citizen to whom it is granted by the laws, no matter what his nationality, his religion, or his condition in life.

The war of races and of religions must be suppressed. Hitherto this has been the most prolific source of the various miseries which have scourged mankind; and in England, after centuries of wars and carnage, the various races only harmonized, aided by amalgamation and marriage, under one of the most tyrannical Governments on the globe. The problem is now to be solved here; and it is to be seen whether the result will be of the same disastrous kind. It is to be determined whether we can harmonize the races, and terminate the war of religion and of nationalities, and secure, as the result, the permanent fabric of a free Government. I proclaim it here that the problem must be solved in blood, if these bold and aggressive conspiracies against the right of free suffrage are not arrested.

I trust, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this inquiry will go on, and that the attempt to interpose technical objections to prevent the redress of great wrongs to personal freedom and the honor of the House, will be repudiated as unworthy of the place and the grave subject under consideration. Not to act, not to inquire in such a case, is treason to the rights of almost four millions of adopted citizens; treason to the cause of equal rights; treason to liberty and humanity.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call back the attention of the House to the report of the Committee of Elections in regard to this case. I shall not detain the House longer than for a few moments. The clear and fair statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BOYCE,] in regard to this case, places it, I think, in its right position before the House.

What is this case? This election took place on the 4th of November, a month previous to the assembling of Congress, and of course the sixty days had not run out when the memorial was presented by Mr. Brooks to the committee for their consideration. Now, Mr. Speaker, I object that any gentleman upon this floor shall furnish us with additional reasons other than the memorialist himself has presented in regard to the determination of this case; and I ask the House, and each member of it, to look to the reasons which he himself has placed before the committee, and to determine the case upon them, without reference to the political opinions of either party.

I will read the reasons set up by Mr. Brooks in his memorial presented to the House and to the committee, why there should be a departure from the law of 1851, and that evidence should be taken in the presence of the House, or in the city of Baltimore, by a commission. What is the first reason?

"That the disgraceful proceedings charged by your memorialist implicate the authorities of Baltimore as being either unwilling or unable to preserve the public peace; and it is upon those authorities that reliance is to be placed for inspiring the witnesses with that sense of personal security indispensable to the proper investigation of this case, for insuring their personal safety, and for preserving order during the examination."

He charges that he is unable to proceed under the law of 1851 to take evidence in the city of Baltimore, because of the unwillingness of the city authorities to allow that evidence to be taken. He charges further, as a reason why there should be a departure from the law of 1851, that no order could be preserved to the authorities during the examination of the witnesses. This is the charge. What are the facts? This charge was first presented in the case of Whyte against Harris, now before the committee. The Committee of Elections said, and I believe properly said, to these parties: "Take your evidence, if you can, under the law of 1851. If you cannot take it under that law, then we will grant you power sufficient to have it taken." What was the result? From the time the notice was given in the city of Baltimore, on the part of Mr. Whyte, contesting the seat of Mr. Harris, up to this hour they have quietly proceeded to take the testimony of every witness produced by either of them. And further, each and every one of the public authorities of the city of Baltimore has given to them every security. No complaint has come before the committee; no complaint has come before the House; no complaint has originated before the public. All the investigation in that case has proceeded in accordance with the law of 1851, and the parties are now, while you are considering this question, taking their evidence in that city according to the law of 1851. Thus, there is a sufficient, ample, conclusive answer to the first charge made by the gentleman as a reason for a departure from the law of 1851.

Then, I say that the first reason alleged by Mr. Brooks before the committee is not sufficient, because the evidence in the case of Whyte and Harris is being taken in Baltimore quietly, and in accordance with the law of 1851.

The second reason is, that

"But sixty days are allowed for evidence to be taken, with the right of the contestee to cross-question and examine the witnesses; and the extensive nature of the conspiracy charged would prevent as full investigation as should be had, unless conducted by a power competent to prevent delays, which could not be as effectually done by any judge or magistrate as by a committee of this House with extraordinary powers."

He says that the sixty days which are allowed by the act of 1851, to take the evidence in the case of contested elections, are not sufficient to develop the conspiracy charged by him; but, mark you, he is not confined to sixty days, for in the law of 1851, you find the following language:

"Provided, That the House may, at their discretion, allow supplemental evidence to be taken after the expiration of said sixty days."

Again, if the taking of this evidence had been commenced, and had proceeded the full length of sixty days, but still additional time was required to take evidence, neither this House nor the committee would refuse that right to any individual, much less to Mr. Brooks, contesting the right of the sitting member.

Then, sir, what further? He was not only entitled to the full length of sixty days, but under the law of 1851 he could take evidence beyond sixty days, until every witness was sworn, and that evidence produced which would enable this House to determine, as between these parties, which was entitled to a seat as Representative from the city of Baltimore.

Again, I think, and a majority of the committee so agreed, that this law of 1851 is not imperative, that it is not binding; and that is a sufficient answer to the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] in regard to his constitutional objection. We do not consider the law of 1851 as imperative; but we do consider it a good, safe, and proper rule to be adopted by the House and by the committee in all contested-election cases. But what now is asked? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] says he wants a precedent set. Here is a popular remonstrance, he says; the party is not claiming a seat, he is not asking admission into this body, but the people are demanding an investigation, and he wants a precedent set that the people may have the right. And how? By a departure from the law of 1851, by a special commission. Do so, and what might be the result? Possibly a memorial might come here from the city of Philadelphia; might come from the city of New York; possibly from the city of Cincinnati; contesting the election of members of this House. Would the House upon any such memorial grant extraordinary commissions in all those cases for the purpose of taking evidence by which to determine the legality of the election? Suppose that it should be charged that in the twentieth ward, or any other ward of Philadelphia, a large number of illegal votes had been cast; take for instance, the gentleman's [Mr. PHILLIPS] own district: would the House therefore grant an extraordinary commission, or would they say to the memorialists, "bring the evidence forward as in other cases? We will hear all you produce, and give you our decision."

But it is contended that this case is different from ordinary contested-election cases. That here no person claims the seat. That Mr. Brooks does not claim it for himself, and that, therefore, a departure from the law of 1851 is proper. That it is a petition of the people, and therefore a commission should be granted. I do not admit the conclusion. It does not follow necessarily; on the contrary, the rule is just opposite. I hold in my hand the "contested-election cases," and I will refer the House to a few cases, without reading them.

You will find them on pages 38, 112, 127, 135, 165, 224, 411, 504, and 516. All of them were cases of contests by persons not claiming the seat—contests by citizens themselves—and no extraordinary commission was granted in one of those cases. What did the committee do? They heard the evidence produced by those persons, and upon it determined the right of the parties, and when the report of the committee was made to the House, the House determined the right of the parties upon the evidence so produced.

The fact, then, that Mr. Brooks does not claim a right to a seat here, is no reason why an extraordinary commission should be granted to him to go to the city of Baltimore, or why he should ask you to depart from the usual custom of the House, or the law of 1851.

What is the third reason?

"Ten days' notice is required under the act of Congress to be given to the contestee of the names and residences of witnesses; and your memorialist believes that many persons whose testimony is important would be intimidated and prevented from appearing."

Sir, the same answer may be given to this as to the first—simply this: that witnesses are being produced every day, and evidence heard every day in the city of Baltimore in the election case now undergoing investigation there. No one is intimidated. The halls of the courts are open, and all the witnesses that the parties in the case need are brought forth and sworn, and their testimony placed on the record. These are all the causes assigned by Mr. Brooks, and I object that gentlemen shall make a better case for Mr. Brooks than he makes for himself. He places his objection to the law of 1851 on these three grounds, each and all of which have been answered fully and emphatically by the conduct of the city of Baltimore and its officers, in the case of Harris and Whyte. For this reason we say that there should be no departure in this case from the law, and we ask the House to determine the matter on the facts presented by Mr. Brooks to the committee, and on none other. The majority of the committee say that his reasons are insufficient, and ask the House to inform Mr. Brooks that he must proceed under the law of 1851—to tell him that if that is not sufficient, when he has fully tried it, to guard his rights, then come before the committee and before the House and ask for a commission and it will be given to him.

One word in answer to the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HATCH.] He seems to have mistaken the question before the House. He argues it as a political question. He speaks for the country to the prejudices of party. I have no such appeal to make. The simple question for us to decide is, who is the Representative of the city of Baltimore? How shall the investigation in this case be made? By the law of Congress, or by a departure from the law of Congress? It is not a question of the political opinions of Mr. Davis or the political opinions of Mr. Brooks. I do not agree entirely with either of the gentlemen, nor do I conceive it necessary that I should in making up my judgment. But I say to that gentleman now and here, that no attack of his can intimidate the citizens of Baltimore or drive them from a manly and determined advocacy of their political principles. That Baltimore will in the future, as she has already done in the past, protect her rights and the rights of her citizens from all attacks, no matter where made, here or within her own limits. This House may take its own course—order this commission; invest it with extraordinary powers; ay, even eject the present Representative; the House may do all this; but when it has so decided, then, sir, then Baltimore will answer back, vindicate her sovereignty from Monument square to Fell's Point, with the same voice and the same majority as on the 4th of November.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, I did not seek the floor for the purpose of discussing the question raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HATCH] in regard to the oaths and obligations of the Know Nothing order. With that order and their secret obligations I have nothing to do. Their oaths are matters that belong to them, not to me. I have no curiosity about them. The Republican party, that has allied itself with the Know Nothing party, plants itself on the great basis of popular suffrage; but on the other hand the great national Democratic party stands on a still higher and more liberal principle—the principle of popular sovereignty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. BOWIE. Certainly. That is the exordium of the speech that I am going to make in regard to the great power of this House. [Laughter.]

I now approach great constitutional questions which concern every man and every true citizen. And, first, as to the power of this House to determine the mode and manner in which it shall protect the elective franchise. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] said this morning, that there was a general judicial power in the House. Does my friend mean to say that this House has a judicial power except it is confided to it? There is no use in talking to me about general inherent powers. Inherent powers belong to individuals, belong to man in a state of nature, and not merely to man, but to animals and plants—the power to protect themselves. Why talk of the inherent powers of such a composite composition as a legislative body?

I am merely speaking now in response to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, who said that there was a judicial power inherent in a legislative body. Now, here, in the beginning, I enter my protest in the name of the people of this great country, against any such doctrine. The question before the House is a very plain one. Every man who chooses to place his mind to the task may understand it. As my friend from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] said this morning, it is nothing but a mere question of expediency. The power of the House is undoubted, and I believe, in the honesty of my heart, that if the gentleman from South Carolina will listen to me, he will be satisfied that it is expedient before I am through. No man doubts the power of the House to invest a committee with authority to investigate all questions connected with contested elections. From the earliest history of the Government up to 1798 there was no other mode adopted, except to appoint committees of elections, with full powers over the subject.

In 1798, there was a law passed very nearly like that of 1851. It purported on its face to relate to members of the House only, having no reference to the Senate. Now, sir, that law was universally acknowledged to be unconstitutional. The Constitution confers upon the House the exclusive right to judge of the election and return of its members, and the Senate could not interfere. The law very soon ceased to be taken heed of, and some fifty years passed over our heads, the House all the time exercising its exclusive power over its own contested elections, the power never having been questioned or denied; and with the single interregnum of seven years from 1798, no other power has been claimed or exercised up to 1851. Sir, how true is the judgment of the public mind to the judgment and feelings of a statesman! The fifth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States shows how utterly worthless is this act of 1851; and, sir, I will meet the gentleman from South Carolina at every point, and show that it is utterly worthless.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not Brooks's case. It is the case of the great power of the people of the city of Baltimore—call it what you may; call it any name you please, and it will suit me. The great, eternal principles of justice give the people the right to form and regulate their own laws; but I deny the right to trample down the Constitution and laws. No, sir; the law must be observed. Know Nothings, Democrats, Black Republicans, and all other men, are amenable to the majesty of the law.

But, sir, I said the law of 1798 was similar in its provisions to that of 1851. The title of the law of 1851 is, "An act prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections." That of 1798 was, "to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections in the House of Representatives." Some smart fellow, no doubt, thought that, by giving a good title to the act of 1851, jurisdiction might be given to the House. Now, to show you this fraud upon the powers and privileges of this House, look to that statute. From its first section to its eleventh section, does it say one word about the mode of determining contested-election cases in the Senate? There is the point. Yet, sir, men who claim to stand by this act of 1851 have only been duped. You have agreed that the Senate of the United States shall have coordinate powers with you in determining the rules and proceedings in elections of members of this House. Have you not done this? It says here, "Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

I turn now to that glorious instrument, which is my shield and protection, the Constitution. It is my shield and protection, and the protection and shield of every man in the country. The Senate has undertaken to pass a law, signed by the Executive, against our prerogative rights, against my prerogative rights—for I am a member of this body, sent here by a loyal and Union-loving constituency. The Constitution says that "each House shall be the judge"—not the judges—"of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." "Each House may determine the rules of its own proceedings." Who, then, gave the Senate any power to pass upon the mode in which we should determine the proceedings in regard to contested elections? Who gave the Senate any power to pass any act on the subject? I defy any man here, and in the face of the Constitution, to say that there is any such power in the Senate to control our proceedings. Yet this law does so, and seems to confine and restrict this grand inquest of the nation. We do not mean to be hampered in that way. Where, sir, do you find the power to do this? The Constitution is dead against it. The Senate can no more join with this House to regulate and control the proceedings of this House than it can do that thing of itself; any more, sir, than we can join to control and regulate the proceedings of the Senate. It makes no sort of difference whether the attempt is made by law or by joint resolution. It is a surrender in either case of our prerogative rights, which, as a Representative of the people, I shall object to. Compromises are sometimes very good and sometimes very bad; and whenever they are made for the surrender of one right of those I represent, I shall oppose them.

My friend from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] said he had some doubt about it, and it was because of his doubt that he went with the adverse party, giving them the majority in the committee. I say, if you turn Mr. Brooks and the disfranchised people of Baltimore over to that law of 1851, you turn them over to a dead law. That law has no vitality. The sitting member is now prepared to give advice to those men who are taking evidence in the case of Whyte against Harris, that they are not bound to return a particle of it. I would give the same advice. I believe this law is unconstitutional. But when the testimony is returned here, I shall use it.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Phillips] agrees with me that it may be useful. If you say, that instead of examining the matter yourselves you will send out a commission, that becomes the rule of this House, and it is lawful. That would meet the approbation of my head and my heart, and I will go for it. But when you come to form it into a law, and the legislative power of the Government—the Congress—and the Executive come to tell us how we are to regulate the rules of our House, I pass it by as a usurpation, and it falls dead beneath my feet. The power of that law of 1851 is nothing—nothing as a law, certainly.

The law of 1798 was declared to be unconstitutional, and was never carried into effect; and the law of 1851 is the same, only they changed the title. The title of the act of 1798 was "to prescribe the mode of taking testimony in regard to contested-election cases in the House of Representatives." Now, they struck that out in the law of 1851, and said "in contested-election cases." Yet not a solitary sentence is found in that law which affects the Senate. They hold on to their prerogatives—their eternal, prerogative rights. While you have basely surrendered yours, they stand firm. When I say basely, I do not mean meanly; but I mean ignorantly. [Laughter.] The law, therefore, amounts to nothing—nothing in this particular case, because every jury empaneled to try a cause, must try it upon the peculiar circumstances which surround it. Is not that so everywhere and under all circumstances? You turn us over to a law which is dead, not only because of its unconstitutional want of flesh, but because even in its letter it is dead. Gone, clean gone, forever. The sixty days have passed, and no notice has been given, and here is a case where the great mass of the people come up to us by memorial and petition, alleging that their rights have been invaded, their homes violated, and the lives of their fathers and their children taken, by a lawless band of men. The very man who makes an assault, who kills another, who shoots another, who cripples another, is borne off in triumph, while the injured man is taken to jail. I do not know by what combination these things were done, but I know they were done.

I will not say a word against the sitting member. He is a very respectable gentleman; he has a sort of mind, in my judgment, which I should call rather flimsy-flimsy, namby-pamby. [Laughter, and cries of "Order."]

The SPEAKER. Personalities are not in order, Mr. BOWIE. You do not call that personal, I hope? [Roars of laughter.] Ben Jonson said that the smartest thing a man could say, was something good-natured in regard to his friend. [Laughter.] Now, when I say "flimsy-flimsy, namby-pamby," what do I mean? [Renewed laughter.] The gentleman is here to answer for himself. He need not take any offense at it, when I so characterize the nature of his letters and of his mind. [Great laughter.] If it be a crooked mind, if it does not go in the straight direction, it is not my fault, nor is my remark personal; because it does not relate to him, but it relates to all classes of men who go crooked ways. Whenever I indulge in personalities, I shall never be misunderstood. [Laughter.]

Now, I say that this law is not only not obligatory, but, as a rule of action, it is not binding. Gentlemen upon the other side say, that although it may not be constitutional, and may not be obligatory, yet, as a rule of action of this House, it is binding. It is not a rule of action because the Senate has assisted us in making it, when we were, by the Constitution, allowed the privilege and prerogative of making it for ourselves.

But there is another objection stronger than that. The act of 1851 does not even profess to be a rule of the House. It relates to men and to measures, to be taken outside of the House, and not in reference to proceedings in this House. It imposes fines upon witnesses who do not attend; it makes it the duty of judges to take testimony; and it provides for the summoning of witnesses outside of the House. It has nothing, whatever, to do with the proceedings of the House. Do you call that a rule of proceeding? No reflecting mind will say so. It is vicious as a law, vicious as a rule of action, and eternally wrong in every sense.

I had supposed that my friend from South Carolina [Mr. Boyce] was too zealous a guardian of the great, eternal constitutional rights of the South, to allow a thing so palpably unconstitutional as this. I should have supposed that such a proposition would have instantly stirred up his instinct of State rights; and I appeal to him whether it is not far better to grant the ordinary power to send for persons and papers to the Committee of Elections than to have a new commission issued to Mr. Brooks? He says he is willing to extend the time; it ought to be done. No favor should be shown to those who are bound by such oaths as have been read here to-day. Lady Macbeth says:

"I have given suck, and know
How tender 'tis to love the babe that milks me;
I would, while it was smiling in my face,
Have plucked my nipple from his boneless gums,
And dash'd the brains out, had I so sworn as you
Have done to this."

Even woman, sir, the sweet harmonious soul that makes man happy, the only really charming portion of creation—if she can be brought to this state of mind as to dash her babe's brains out when she has sworn it, how much more are men to be influenced by their oaths? The disfranchised people of the city of Baltimore are imploring you, in the name of Mr. Brooks and twenty-eight others, to have an investigation, and you delay it. You allow the sitting member to interpose dilatory pleas. How dare he do it? At the last Congress, in the case of Reeder and Whitfield, he went for a general investigation. Let gentlemen come up to the point. I do declare, most sacredly, in the presence of God, that I go for investigating frauds wherever we have jurisdiction. I agree with the sitting member, when he said in a former speech that this House has no jurisdiction over frauds in Kansas. I say so now, but he does not seem to say so.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman to refer to Kansas matters.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, you do not know, [laughter,] or rather you do not seem to perceive the application of my argument. The gentleman [Mr. DAVIS] votes for a thorough examination into frauds connected with Kansas; and I say that that is a question over which this House has no jurisdiction. I defy him to show any jurisdiction in the House over it. But now I have got a case before me in which the House has jurisdiction; and I mean to hold on to it. That is the difference—a wonderful difference. In the one case we have no power, no jurisdiction. I say so on the authority of the sitting member himself. That brings Kansas into the discussion. I do not care whether they determine their constitution by blood and by cannon. I know that my own glorious State established herself in spite of all difficulties, and that for three years a bloody war was carried on within her borders. I have nothing to do with border murders, or consternation, or fire, or dangers, or difficulties, outside of my own State. I only say to those who indulge in them, keep them to yourselves. Virginia and Maryland have gone through blood and war, and now do you do the same thing. Whether I will take part with you or not is another question. I always go for peace and quietness, but for fighting when necessary. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BORCE,] whose particular attention I want, because I want his vote, says that he is perfectly willing to extend the time provided by the act of 1851. I have shown him, as a State-rights-Constitution lawyer, that that law is itself an invasion of the privileges of the House, and worth nothing; and that when Mr. Pinckney Whyte's evidence is all taken before the magistrate, Henry Winter Davis, of this House, will advise them that they are not bound to return it. Nor are they bound to return it. I agree with him in that. The law is totally defective. It punishes witnesses, and imprisons them; but it does not impose any penalty on State judges or on State magistrates who are called upon to execute its orders. It is totally defective; and the defect can never be supplied, unless you do what you have done in the bankrupt cases, and in the fugitive-slave-law cases, execute its provisions by your own officers.

Now, in my own State, under the guidance of Know Nothing doctrines, a law has passed the lower House, and is now before the Senate, which body, being composed in the same way, will pass it, I suppose, making it a misdemeanor for a State judge to naturalize any foreigner; and that in the very face of the act of 1795. Yes, sir, wherever the Know Nothings have the power they will do the same thing; but, thank God, they have got the power in but one State; and that is my own disfranchised State. That is the reason why I plead here to-day that the House will come right up—all sides and parties—and put down all this sort of fraud and iniquity. Everybody knows that the Constitution gave to Congress the power of establishing uniform rules of naturalization. Well, Congress never passed any uniform rules of naturalization, but required the State courts to naturalize foreigners. But suppose the Legislature of a State passes a law, which says to the courts, "you shall not do this;" then the question comes up between the State power and the Federal power.

Sir, the Know Nothing party of Maryland are a bloody party. Won by the siren songs of the sitting member in this case, they are ready for a street fight at any time. I will not say how they hold their elections; but, at all events, they let every native vote, and shut out all the foreign voters. Do you deny it? Dare you deny it? And such men as that now appeal to us! Sir, Robespierre was a coward; yet Robespierre counseled death and destruction. You may be unlike him for aught I know.

"I have no spur
To prick the sides of my intent."

I counsel death and destruction only that it may come back upon the head of the offender. Yes, I tell you, you have a day of reckoning to come, gentlemen, in the city of Baltimore. There will be a war there, and it will be a war of the people against clubs and mobs. I only hope that, in the providence of God, I may live to counsel, advise, and direct you. I will not advise anything which I am not ready to take the foremost ranks in executing. You may be a Robespierre to counsel death, but always absent yourself. I will put you under my foot. You shall not live an hour. There is a day of reckoning for you. You must either fight or escape it by flight, in your wickedness, your malice, your malignity, your utter disregard of all the rights of a great city—yes, sir, a city that ought to be, and I hope will be, the southern emporium of this blessed and glorious Union.

Mr. Speaker, I speak only for the great Democracy—yes, sir, the Democracy. Need I be ashamed to avow it? Ay, sir, you may talk about disregarding parties in this House; but you may take off these hands, let this head fall from my shoulders, before I will do it. When the Democracy in the city of Baltimore are disfranchised, it will not do to taunt them with cowardice. Sir, we will show you whether we are cowards, when the proper time comes. We are a law-abiding people. We have waited time after time, until we have seen these thick clouds gather round us. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] said that the Democracy of Maryland want this House to help them. It is a libel upon the Democracy of Maryland. All we want you to do is, to carry out the great principles of the Constitution, and exercise the powers which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BORCE] acknowledges you have. Now, I submit to him, whether it is not better to go right along, and not delay? If not, time must be allowed to file a petition for further time to take testimony, and to act on it; and long delays will follow. Why, then, will it not be better to go right along, and take the evidence ourselves?

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what may be the result of this investigation. I know very well that the city of Baltimore is now under Plug-Ugly government and Know Nothing government. All the police of the city are of the same stamp, and God Almighty only knows what they will do. They may allow the contestant to go on, and have a sort of investigation; when the time comes they will take the position which I do to-day: that the law is unconstitutional, and they will not send you the evidence. I say, therefore, to gentlemen, if they have any doubt whatever on this subject, do not allow your adversaries to catch you; exercise the power which this House possesses, and do not put any confidence in these city officers. I want you to tell me how, under the act of 1851, you can compel these men to make their return to the House? No constitutional lawyer can do it. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I rise with a view to call the previous question; but, before doing so, I will make a few remarks, not extending at furthest beyond five minutes.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BORCE] concluded the majority report from the Committee of Elections with the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the memorialist for the appointment of a committee to take testimony.

And the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who submitted the minority report, moves as an amendment to that, the following:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses and evidence in the case of the contested election of the Hon. H. Winter Davis, from the fourth congressional district of Maryland.

It cannot have escaped the attention of the House, that for the last two hours scarcely one word has been said on the propositions directly before it. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HATCH,] forgetting the fact that the party to which he belongs now holds the control of the legislation of New York by an affiliation and coalition with the Know Nothings and Americans; and also forgetting that he himself holds a seat here by a minority of votes of his district in consequence of a diversion, got up for his benefit, on the part of the American party, has seen fit to spend a large portion of his hour in denunciation of that American party. I shall not follow his example, although, perhaps, in a strict party sense, I am as little of an American as he is. I do not think there is any wise or safe foundation upon which an American citizen can build except that of human rights; and I think that the American citizen will best serve his country who endeavors as well as he may to enfranchise and elevate all men, no matter what be their color, no matter what may be their race, no matter in what climate or under what sky they were born; that he will best serve his country by doing all he can to prevent the oppression and degradation of any race. But I will not dwell on this.

The question, it seems to me, for the House to decide is, whether or not there is any power under the law of 1851 to take the testimony necessary to make out the case of the contestant's memorial? I think there is. I think that the law of 1851, though I hold it to be merely directory, provides for taking testimony under it. I believe that any citizen of Baltimore, who is dissatisfied with the result of the election, could go to work, serve his notice, and take testimony under that law. It does not appear that that has been done. There is no evidence offered to the committee or to the House that the contestant in this case may not take testimony easily and readily. If this be so, why should we depart from the law? Why should we go outside of it and undertake to take testimony in an extraordinary and unusual manner? I have listened to the gentlemen who have spoken, and I have heard no reason assigned to satisfy me that there is any propriety in the House departing from the law. The sixty days within which testimony could be taken did not commence until the latter part of December. The contestant then might have proceeded to take this testimony, and if, during its progress, it should have appeared that he could not take it easily and readily, he might have applied to the House; and then, I have no doubt, the House would have provided for taking it.

I can see no reason why the contestant cannot take testimony under the laws. It is said that it will involve him in expense, and it is asked whether he should pay the expense in an investigation of this kind? Should the people of the United States, or the people of the district directly interested, meet this expense? If Mr. Brooks or his friends are interested in ousting the sitting member, why should they not take testimony at their own expense? Is there any reason why they should not? Has any reason been shown why the United States should bear the burden of the expense? I have seen none, and heard of none.

Besides, how easy it would be, under the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] to evade the law. If it be right, then, an individual who contests a seat has only to get some friend to send in a memorial making a contest for him, and the House must order the testimony to be taken at the expense of the Union, and to be brought here outside of the law of 1851.

I do not believe that there is any reason in this case for going outside of the law of 1851. A gentleman representing another district in Baltimore is at the present time there, taking testimony without any molestation. This testimony should be taken in the same way and under the act of 1851, no matter whether the contestant claims the seat or not. This was thought a just rule for all parties to contests, for sitting members as well as all others. Under it, parties are taking testimony now, and at their own expense.

I call for the previous question.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question. I would like to have an opportunity to make some remarks on this question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will withdraw the call for the previous question for nobody.

Mr. HOPKINS moved that the House adjourn. Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes 68, noes 95.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I desire, if I can get the ear of the gentleman from Maine, to appeal to him to withdraw his demand for the previous question, in order to allow the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. STEWART] to make a speech if he desires to do so.

Mr. BOYCE. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is very anxious to address the House upon this subject. Being detained from the House to-day, he has not been able to do so. I should be glad if the House would give him an opportunity to do so to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, as the previous question has been demanded.

The previous question was then seconded—ayes 95, noes 58.

Mr. WARREN moved that the House do now adjourn; and called for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WARREN and DEAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 80.

Mr. WARREN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Pending which, on motion of Mr. BOGOCCK, (at four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. W. PINCKNEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in pursuance of law, a statement of the expenditures from the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the military establishment; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the petition of the Mayor and Council of the city of Omaha, Nebraska Territory, praying for the reimbursement of money expended by them upon the Capitol building in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. EVANS presented the petition of Margaret McGuire, praying for a continuance of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms, or lots of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of citizens of New York and New Jersey, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms, or lots of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of L. Lyens and others, citizens of the United States, praying that land may be granted in quarter sections to actual settlers in the proposed Territory of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Hopkingsville, Ohio, praying that the policy of the United States, in respect to the public domain, may be so changed as to secure the public lands to the use of actual settlers only; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PEARCE presented additional evidence in support of the claim of Charles West to a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the petition of Marie Genand, sole heir of John Hudry, deceased, praying the reimbursement of money advanced and expended in 1814 and 1815, by said Hudry, during the defense of New Orleans; which was referred, with the papers on file, to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress to use all proper means to prevent the further extension of slavery in the Territories of the United States, or the admission of any more slave States into the Union, and to oppose the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State under the Lecompton constitution, or any constitution maintaining slavery therein; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. JONES presented five petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying for a grant of land to the McGregor, St. Peters, and Missouri River Railroad Company; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Grayson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Nock, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of R. S. Hamilton and J. E. L. Hamilton, heirs of Persis Locke, widow of Josiah Locke, submitted an adverse report.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the National Institution for the promotion of science, at Washington City, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the Provident Association of Clerks, reported a bill (S. No. 151) further to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the civil Departments of the Government of the United States, in the District of Columbia;" which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Joshua D. Todd, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 153) for the relief of Lieutenant Joshua D. Todd, United States Navy. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of William F. Carrington, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 154) for the relief of William F. Carrington, passed assistant surgeon in the Navy of the United States. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Carter, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 155) for the relief of Robert Carter, passed assistant surgeon, in the Navy of the United States. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Morris, submitted an adverse report.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Joshua Shaw, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 156) for the relief of Joshua Shaw, of Bordentown, New Jersey. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PEARCE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 152) to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. POLK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 157) to provide for the payment to the State of Missouri of two per centum of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands therein, heretofore received under a compact with said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SHELTON'S ISLAND.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to cause to be furnished to the Senate all the correspondence, papers, and documents on file in the Department of State, in original or copy, in the case of Philo S. Sheldon and Sampson and Tappan, respecting "Shelton's" or "Aves" Island, not heretofore furnished by said Department to the Senate.

MEXICAN PROTECTORATE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask that the resolution which I offered yesterday, in relation to the establishment of an efficient protectorate by the United States over the States of Mexico, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, and San Salvador, be now taken up, with a view to its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to hear the resolution read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas, the events connected with the numerous efforts of the people of Mexico, and of Central America, of this continent, to establish and maintain order and good government, since their separation from the mother country, have so far resulted in failure and consequent anarchy, and demonstrated to the world the inability of said people to effect an object alike so desirable and so indispensable to their welfare and prosperity: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into and report to the Senate upon the expediency of the Government of the United States declaring and maintaining an efficient protectorate over the States of Mexico, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, and San Salvador, in such form and to such an extent as shall be necessary to secure to the people of said States the blessings of good and stable republican government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the resolution be taken up for consideration.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the reference of this resolution, for I have no special objection at any time to refer resolutions of any description to committees, for the purpose of investigation; but I should like, before it goes to the committee, as this is a resolution of a most extraordinary character, that the honorable Senator from Texas, who has introduced it, shall explain to us what he wishes to attain by it. It seems to me that this resolution, which declares that nations with which we are at peace have failed in their own government since they have been independent nations, and that therefore we should extend over them a protectorate, and assume to govern them, is certainly a most extraordinary one. Whatever may be its object, or its purpose, it really seems to me that it is intended to encourage that spirit of filibustering which has disgraced this country in the face of the Christian and civilized world. Instead of repressing the tendency of such enterprises, I think it will encourage that very spirit which I understood the honorable Senator from Texas the other day to denounce on this floor, in regard to Walker and Nicaragua.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe it is unusual, in a case of this kind, to object to the reference of resolutions.

Mr. WADE. I will ask the Senator from Texas whether this resolution does not "instruct" the committee? and therefore its adoption by the Senate becomes necessary before it can go to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. It instructs them to report, but not in any particular way.

Mr. WADE. It instructs them to make an inquiry.

Mr. HOUSTON. To inquire into and report.

Mr. SEWARD. Let it be read once more.

The Secretary again read the preamble and resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, as I have remarked, it is, I believe, unusual, at this stage of business, to object to a resolution of inquiry. This resolution lays down to the committee no particular course of conduct to pursue. In the first place, we are aware that the people of the regions referred to are not in a very settled and regulated condition; and supposing that the sources of information would be open to the committee, I have offered this resolution, instructing them to inquire into the causes of the evils in those Governments, and, if they thought proper, to suggest a remedy. With these views I have proposed to refer it to them; but they are not bound by it to recommend a remedy. They are simply instructed to ascertain the cause of the evils, and by their report impart to the nation very useful information. It was not with a view of eliciting opposition that the resolution was introduced, nor did I expect any. I supposed the committee the most competent to attain the object for which it was intended.

I am sorry that the gentleman from Massachusetts has supposed that it was my object, or that this resolution could have a tendency, to foster the filibustering spirit that is abroad in the land. The very opposite was my belief and my intention. I have always denounced filibustering, when upon individual enterprise such schemes were conducted; and I shall never cease to do it.

But, sir, we are aware that these people, for a quarter of a century, I think, or near that time, have been making experiments to establish a Government similar to our own. They have invariably failed. It has brought wretchedness on the community. If they had great grievances to endure under the despotism of Spain, they are certainly more intolerable now than they were then. Every description of crime runs riot there; they have no stable government; there is no foundation, on which to build up human happiness or rational institutions, yet laid, after all the experiments that have been made; and it does seem to me that it is due to the enlightenment of the present day that this subject should claim the attention of the civilized world.

This resolution is not offered with a view to extending our dominion, but with a view of improving our neighborhood. These people are contiguous to us; our commerce has connection with them; and our political relations necessarily have been and will be further extended to them. Their defenseless situation is well calculated to invite aggression from other nations, or from individuals who, either from vicious or enterprising considerations, see proper to invade them. They are not in a condition to defend themselves. The want of organization, the want of regulated government, the want of power, the existence of distraction amongst them, are all calculated to invite aggression; so that it is due to humanity that the situation of these people should be considered by the great community of nations. I cannot conceive that the course suggested in the resolution will be at all detrimental to their future peace or well-being. I do not urge it as a necessary measure, but I throw it out as a subject of consideration for the age and for the world.

If this nation throws its eye over those countries, I cannot conceive that that will induce individuals to invade them. When it is seen that this nation has its eye on those people, that it embraces all within the scope of its vision, they will be less encouraged to set on foot individual enterprises for the accomplishment of an object which they know the Government could achieve, and that they must be subservient to its views, and not indulge their personal enterprises and desires. So, sir, I think it is calculated rather to restrain aggression by individual enterprises, than to encourage them.

It is with these views that I offer the resolution. A much more enlarged view than this might be taken of the subject if it were necessary. We have relations with these people. We must have an eye to them. The country on the Pacific coast of the United States has a right to command our consideration. The facilities of communication with our Pacific possessions being through these regions, must necessarily be protected by this Government at all hazards, until we have a direct transit within our own territory. We have the means of doing this, and we are traitors to ourselves if we do not use them. If it were an infliction of wrong, or an aggravation of the misfortunes of these people, I should scorn to do it on account of their helpless condition; but I wish to build them up as a powerful people, whose national prosperity shall be based upon virtue and regulated government. Our connection with them and our interests as their neighbor, require us to take their condition into consideration.

For these reasons, I wish an inquiry made by the appropriate committee as to what may be proper to be done touching these matters. Other nations have an eye to these people, but we are their neighbors, and we ought to make them our friends. If a Power foreign to them is to control them and to wield their destiny, let it be the Power of the United States, and not of any transatlantic Government; let it be the Power in geographical affiliation with them, and immediately connected with them.

I did not intend to make any remarks on the subject; indeed I did not anticipate that there would be any necessity for them. I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MASON. I certainly do not entertain, and therefore do not intend, the least discourtesy to the honorable Senator who has moved this resolution, nor the slightest disrespect for the object of the resolution coming from that Senator; but I submit to the Senate, that if it involves a subject of inquiry which, in the judgment of the Senate, ought not to be inquired into, the reference should not be made.

The first objection to it which I entertain, and one of the weakest kind, or rather weaker than others that belong to it, is, that if this proposition were to be entertained by a reference to a standing committee, it would be received, and justly received, by the South American States as an indignity to them; for however weak and feeble those States may be, we have recognized all of them, five in number, as sovereign and independent States; recognized them as equals, and they stand as equals before the world.

Mr. SEWARD. We have treaties with them. Mr. MASON. We have treaties with some of them. It would be justly taken by those States as an indignity, if the Senate were to go into an inquiry whether the United States would extend to them a protection which they have not asked.

The second objection to the resolution is that it involves a policy on the part of this Government that I apprehend very few are ready even to consider—the policy of taking any of those distant States under the protection of the United States. It is a policy that, for one, I should be exceedingly reluctant even to inquire into.

Then I would say to the honorable Senator, that although those States have certainly exhibited weakness, that weakness has only been shown in the case of two of them, the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, because of the single fact, according to my belief, that one or both of those States—one certainly, the State of Nicaragua—possess the most desirable transit route across the isthmus to connect the two oceans, and that transit route has become the great object of cupidity that leads depredators upon them. It is my decided impression that it is nothing but the wealth and value of that transit route across Nicaragua, and by the means of Lake Nicaragua, which has tempted the predatory expeditions that have from time to time left our shores—a temptation of cupidity only. They have exhibited weakness; Nicaragua certainly has; they are feeble; they are constantly having domestic broils among themselves, which they seem to be unable to quiet; but in the other States of Guatemala, San Salvador, and Honduras, I am not at all aware that they require protection; certainly, they have never asked it.

I think, therefore, that it would not only be a departure, and a very grievous departure, from the general policy of the country, but it would be an indignity offered to those States even to entertain the proposition. I mean no discourtesy at all to the honorable Senator, or to his resolution, in the motion that I shall make—unless gentlemen wish to discuss it—merely to test the sense of the Senate on the reference, to lay it on the table.

Mr. HALE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the motion will not be made.

Mr. TOOMBS. I desire to say a word on it.

Mr. MASON. I shall not make the motion now, but will make it after a while.

Mr. HALE. I simply desire to offer the following amendment:

And whereas, a state of colonial dependency is not calculated to illustrate the theory and practice of popular sovereignty and perfect freedom, said committee is instructed to extend the same inquiries to the Canadas, and the other British possessions on our continent. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOOMBS. It is not the appropriate time now, on this motion of inquiry, to discuss our tropical policy, though I very much concur in the resolution proposed by the Senator from Texas, and I shall give it my support. I think the time has come for us at least to inquire into that question; it will soon be upon us. Mexico and tropical America are worse than Turkey was said to be by the Emperor Nicholas—they are all sick men; they are in the very last agonies of political dissolution. Their fate is a question very much affecting our interests. It is a question in which there will be a policy of the people of this country, however the Government or its more immediate representatives in this Hall may attempt to evade it or avoid it; and I think it would be well that the Senate should at least take into consideration the very critical condition of Central America, and our southern neighbors generally.

So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to adopt a national policy towards those countries, one which I think becomes our position on this continental. I desire to have an American policy there, irrespective of any views of Great Britain, and more especially a policy opposed to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. But, as I before stated, I wish simply to announce this fact, and not to discuss the question. I hope the resolution of the Senator from Texas will be referred to the appropriate committee, of which my friend from Virginia is chairman, and that a report will be made upon it. I think it is time we should take the matter into consideration. The time for action is not distant, and therefore the time for consideration is not too long.

Mr. GWIN. It seems to me, after the announcement made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that my friend from Texas had better have a select committee. He proposes to send his resolution to a committee, the chairman of which announces opposition to it in advance.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no wish to incur further imputations of filibustering myself, and I should be unwilling to move for a select committee on this occasion; and particularly I should dislike to be chairman of such a committee. I have presented this resolution with a view to coming events, which cast their shadows before. The subjects involved in the resolution have almost become tangible. There is not a single one of the States referred to that has not, within my recollection, undergone one or more revolutions. Their Governments are unsettled; they are arbitrary and despotic so long as a party can hold power—until oppression has ceased to sustain them, and the people rise en masse against them without intelligence sufficient to construct a Government of permanency which can give protection to individuals.

At this very time it is announced through the intelligence of the day, that the recent President and Dictator of Mexico is upon our soil at New Orleans. How many mutations has that Government undergone within the last twenty-five or twenty-eight years? I presume not less than that number of changes. I think about twenty-five revolutions, at least, must have occurred in Mexico during that period. At this time, there is no probability of any permanent Government being established there, or in the other countries referred to in the resolution. If the weakness of the people of Central America, and the circumstances of the existence of the transit route there, have given rise to the filibustering spirit that is in our community and among our people, it would be a legitimate subject for the committee to inquire into the causes of it, and to suggest a remedy. I should be perfectly willing to submit it to the impartiality and intelligence of the Committee on Foreign Relations. From my knowledge of its chairman, I am satisfied that his familiarity with constitutional law—but that would not be a question that would arise, I presume—and international law, would enable him to make a report that would be satisfactory. Something must be done, and that time is coming when it will be very necessary to take into consideration the condition of these people, there is no doubt; for, instead of becoming nationalized, they are every day becoming more denationalized and demoralized in their condition. Intelligence is gradually fading away or becoming impaired among them. We should not wait for events to rush upon us, and become embodied in a formidable shape; but it is the duty of statesmen through prescience to look to contingencies, and to be prepared for them when they come upon us.

It is not from a disposition to overreach the necessities of our country, that this resolution is offered; but it is to contemplate them while they are distant, so that when they approach us we may be ready to grapple with them, if difficulties should arise, and to control them. The day is coming when an influence, which is now in the East, must pass off to the West and South, and control and enlighten these people. It is as inevitable as that the Indian tribes have faded before the majesty of the Anglo-American morale. When they have all faded away, the natural consequence will be, that a weaker race will be brought in contact with us, and the stronger must prevail. These people will have to yield to the dominant spirit of the American people. The structure of our institutions, their moral, their physical, and all their powers, indicate a controlling influence that at some day will not even stop at Central America, but will go beyond it. We are an increasing people. We have continual accessions from other nations, and they become imbued with our spirit, and commingle with us and our enterprises. This mixture of races causes an irresistible impetus, that must overshadow and overrule that whole region.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will pause for a moment. It is the duty of the Chair to call for the special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was done, at all events.

Mr. MASON. To dispose of the subject, I move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand the Senator from Texas is not through with his remarks.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had finished.

Mr. MASON. I make that motion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls up the special order. Is there any motion to postpone it for the purpose of taking the vote on the resolution of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to postpone the special order, so that the vote may be taken on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MASON. I did not contemplate that. I thought by general consent we might informally pass over the special order, and dispose of this motion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection in any quarter, the Chair will consider it to be the pleasure of the Senate so to dispose of this question.

Mr. MASON. By general consent we may take the vote. ["Agreed!"] I move that the resolution and amendment lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to give notice that I shall modify the amendment I design offering, by adding to it a section which I ask may be read for information.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may, at his discretion, detail such officers of the regular Army as he may think proper, to command in the regiments hereby authorized, who shall receive, as their entire compensation, the pay and emoluments of the grade in which they may serve, and who shall return to the regular Army when the said regiments shall be disbanded, with such rank as they would have held if they had never been detailed to serve in the regiments so disbanded; it being intended by this act that such service shall be without prejudice to their promotion in the corps to which they respectively belong. All the field officers above the rank of captain, in the regiments herein authorized, shall be detailed by the President from the regular Army as above directed, in the mode and on the conditions therein prescribed.

Mr. HUNTER. I merely wish to give notice that when I offer the amendment which I suggested yesterday, which I shall do if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should fail, I will modify my amendment by adding this as an additional section.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to present an amendment to this bill, which I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to accept in lieu of his proposition. My amendment is, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the President, for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States and protecting the citizens on the routes of emigration in the Territory of Utah, and to be employed in said Territory, be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding in all four thousand officers and men, who may offer their services as infantry to serve for and during the pending difficulties with the Mormons in said Territory, and no longer; and that the sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers so offering their services shall be accepted by the President in companies, battalions, or regiments; and that each company shall consist of the same number of officers and men as now prescribed by law for the infantry arm of the Army; and that the companies, battalions, and regiments, shall be each respectively authorized to elect their own officers, and when so elected shall be commissioned by the President of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers, when mustered into the service, shall be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, and, until discharged therefrom, be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be organized in the same manner and shall receive the same pay and allowances as the infantry arm of the Army of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, and who shall be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred upon persons wounded or disabled in the service of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by this act, shall immediately be disbanded at the termination of the pending difficulties with the Mormons in the Territory of Utah.

I merely present the amendment now for the purpose of having it understood that I shall offer it at the proper time, if the Senator from Massachusetts does not accept it in lieu of his proposition.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Tennessee consulted me in regard to a modification of the substitute offered by me, to which I consented. He has now moved an amendment, which I prefer to the one I offered, and I accept it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. That being the case, I understand my amendment to be the proposition now pending.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Chair will state the question before the Senate. The original bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, as modified by such amendments as the Senate have agreed to, is before the body. For that entire bill the Senator from Massachusetts offered a substitute. Instead of his own substitute, he now accepts in place of it another substitute, offered by the Senator from Tennessee, which is his right and privilege to do. The substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee is proposed as an amendment in place of the original bill. These are the questions now before the Senate; and it is the privilege of the friends of both to modify either before the vote for substitution shall be taken. According to parliamentary order and regularity of proceeding, the original bill should first be perfected, and then the substitute; and after having been modified, if it should be modified at all, then the question upon the substitution will be in order, and not before.

Mr. BIGGS. I wish to suggest to the Chair that the pending question before the Senate, as I understood when we adjourned yesterday, was an amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Before any amendment has been made to the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, the Chair thinks it is competent for that Senator to accept another substitute in place of his own.

Mr. BIGGS. That disposes of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe that when the bill was laid aside, an amendment was pending to strike out the fourth section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The application to the Congress of the United States for an increased military force is made in the name of the President of the United States; and we are called upon to sustain it as an Administration measure. I have offered this amendment for the purpose of setting myself right; for the purpose of showing how far I am willing to go; and to enable me, if I can, to act understandingly on what is presumed to be the measure of the Administration. I do not, however, sustain this simply and alone because it is an Administration measure, but I offer the proposition which I have presented because I believe it is right in itself, and at the same time will come up to the views of the Administration, in regard to the request it has made to Congress to increase the military force of the country.

I set out with the proposition that I am against an increase of the standing Army. I am against adding another man to it. Standing armies are contrary to the genius of this Government; they are contrary to the temperament of our people; and, so far as I am concerned, I shall go against adding another soldier to our regular Army. I think, when we come to examine the subject, we shall find that the Committee on Military Affairs, in the bill reported by its chairman, has not represented the Administration in its true character before the country. The bill of the committee, in the first instance, provides for an increase of the rank and file of the Army, to the extent of about four thousand men. In addition to this, it provides for thirty additional companies, as a permanent part of the standing Army. I do not understand the President as asking for a permanent increase of the standing Army. I understand him to have asked us to grant him an imposing force, that will enable him to correct the rebellious condition of affairs in Utah. For the purpose of setting myself right, and showing that my proposition covers the idea of the Administration, I propose to read a single paragraph. The President, in his annual message, after speaking for some considerable length upon the difficulties in Utah, and the declarations of Brigham Young, states:

"A great part of all this may be idle boasting; but yet no wise Government will lightly estimate the efforts which may be inspired by such frenzied fanaticism as exists among the Mormons in Utah. This is the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories; and humanity itself requires that we should put it down in such a manner that it shall be the last. To trifle with it would be to encourage it and to render it formidable. We ought to go there with such an imposing force as to convince these deluded people that resistance would be vain, and thus spare the effusion of blood. We can in this manner best convince them that we are their friends, not their enemies. In order to accomplish this object, it will be necessary, according to the estimate of the War Department, to raise four additional regiments."

Here the President tells us expressly that these troops are wanted to quell a rebellion which it is said exists among the Mormons in Utah. Is that asking Congress to make a permanent increase of the standing Army? Does he come before the country in such a position? He says that for the purpose of settling the difficulties in Utah we should give him an imposing force to quell rebellion, and thereby save the shedding of blood. Is this asking us to add six thousand or seven thousand men to the Army, to be salaried permanently at a great expense? Does the President ask any such thing? He does not. Why, then, should we be driven into an increase of the standing Army in compliance with the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs? We are not called upon by the Administration, as I understand it, to increase the standing Army by the addition of six or seven thousand men, as proposed by the committee.

I have said thus much for the purpose of showing that I am opposing no request of the Administration. Nor do I wish to be understood as being very squeamish and particular in the support of every measure that may come before the Senate as an Administration measure. If I support any measures that come before this body, I do so because I believe them to be right in principle and right in policy. I shall not support them on the mere dictum or recommendation of an Executive, without regard to their being right in themselves and correct in principle.

Then, as I understand the President, he asks for no additional force in the shape of an increase of the standing Army. He asks you to give him an imposing force to send to Utah, and thereby to prevent the shedding of blood, and put down the insurrection that is alleged to exist there. Why not employ volunteers for this emergency? Will not that answer the call of the President? I know it has been said that volunteers will cost more than regulars; but how can that be? I think it is evident that it will cost no more to call out volunteers than to call out regulars. We pay them the same amount, officers and men; and the volunteers are to be dismissed when the difficulties cease; whereas, regulars are a continual expense.

There seems to be a discrepancy between the President, the Secretary of War, and the Committee on Military Affairs. The Secretary of War asks for five regiments. The President tells us in his message that four will be necessary. There is a difference of one thousand men; and a difference in expense of $1,000,000, according to the estimates of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. Hamlin.] It seems to me that we ought to act understandingly; we ought to know the exact effect of all the propositions that are before us. One reason why I have said what I have in reference to the Administration is, that we were called upon by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to act upon the bill when it was last before the Senate, so as to let the Administration know what it had to depend upon. The inference is that all those who are opposed to increasing the standing Army must be set down as opponents to the Administration and the recommendations of the executive.

Mr. BROWN. My friend will allow me to interrupt him at this point. My colleague is absent from the Senate, and I am sure my friend from Tennessee misunderstood him on that point. He certainly did not mean to be understood as saying that those who opposed this measure were to be set down as opponents to the Administration; but that the Administration must shape its policy in reference to Army operations according to the force which it had; and if Congress meant to deny additions to the Army we should let them know it before the spring opened, so that they could dispose of whatever force they had to the best advantage possible. That I think was his meaning.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. In the first instance, I have stated what I understood the chairman to say at the time; and in the next place, I shall show that statement to be substantially correct by the report of what took place here on last Thursday; for usually the reports are very accurate, and most speeches, if they have any method and order in them, are given with the fidelity of the daguerreotype. But this does not state it as strongly as the chairman stated it. I heard it with my own ears as I have stated it. The report is:

"Mr. Davis. Let us pass the bill or reject it, and let the Administration know it."

Then it would seem that it is principally to be urged on the ground of an Administration measure. If we are to act on it as an Administration measure, let us see whether we cannot agree to a proposition that covers the ground the Administration really occupies.

It is agreed on all hands that the cost of the regular Army is about a million dollars to each thousand men. By one statement made by the Senator from Georgia—and I am free to say that I always hear him speak on this subject with great pleasure, and rely much on his statements—it appears that the cost is about a thousand dollars per man. That being so, each thousand men will cost $1,000,000. By another statement, made by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. Hamlin,] who seems to be accurate, and I presume is so, it appears that, including all expenses, the Army costs about fifteen hundred dollars a man, or a fraction less. If the force to be raised be five thousand men at $1,500 per man, they will cost $7,500,000; and that is to become a permanent expenditure, because the men being raised are a part of the permanent military establishment of the country, and must continue a charge on the Treasury of the United States.

I wish to ask Democratic Senators if this is a time to increase the expenditures of the Government? You are responsible for the expenses of the Government; you have the majority; you have the control of the Treasury in your hands. It is idle to go before the country, and talk before the people about the expenditures of the Administration. Who holds the purse-strings of this nation? When we run through the appropriations of this Government, from its origin to the present time, we find that the appropriations have generally outgone the expenditures. Who makes the expenditures? The President may recommend for this and for that, and he may make extravagant recommendations; but the query comes up, is Congress bound to appropriate? You, the appropriating power, hold the purse-strings of this nation in your hands; and if the expenditures of this Government go on increasing as they have been going on for a considerable number of years back, you are responsible, not the Administration.

Then I would ask, when we take up this question of expenditure, where is it going to carry us to? Is it not time to pause? Is it not time to reflect? Is it not time to consult our log-book, and get a new reckoning? It seems to me that it is. At this point I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Finance of this body, that I shall look to him with great interest in reference to his moves in retrenching the expenditures of the Government. I will follow him as a humble volunteer, for I favor the volunteer system; it is more in accordance with the genius of the Government, and the patriotic impulses of the American people. Let us go into the unnecessary and extraordinary expenditures of this Government, and reduce them down to what is reasonable and right. Is there no place at which we can begin this work? Cannot the expenditures be arrested? When we talk about retrenching upon this bill, it is said, "this is not the place; let this go; this is not the bill." This is allowed to pass, and soon we find another bill before us for the civil or naval department, or the West Point Academy, or the military establishment; and then we are told, "this is not the bill either; we cannot get along without this." Well, where is the bill? What measure is it? Some how or other, we cannot find any. "This is not the place; this is not the bill; this is not the department to which to lay the pruning-knife. Oh! no; we must not begin here." That is the constant cry.

Then if war happens to exist, and we talk about retrenching and reducing the expenditures in time of war, the answer is, "Oh! you cannot do it now; the public mind is occupied about something else; the public mind is engaged in carrying on the war." I ask, when will the time come? When are the foul, reeking corruptions of the Government to be stopped? Your newspapers are filled with the details of them every day, and men are confined in prison for refusing to tell the truth in reference to the corruptions of the Government. What do those corruptions grow out of? The unnecessary and improper expenditures of the Government. It seems to me the time has come, and I think it is the duty of the Democratic party to commence the work of retrenchment. We have preached it in theory a long time. Let us commence to reduce our theory to practice.

I came into the Senate of the United States as a Democrat; and, if I know myself, I intend to be one in practice as well as in theory. I know it is against the taste, the refined and the peculiar notions of some men who get into high places, to talk about curtailing or reducing the expenditures of the Government. That, with them, is all cant; that is all for Buncombe; that amounts to nothing! Some may talk about it in that light, and some may act upon that principle, if it is a principle, but I intend to act in good faith, if I know myself. It may be said, "Oh! he is a pence-calculating politician; he talks about the pence; he talks about the shillings; and consequently he is not to be regarded as being a statesman expanded in his views, liberal in his feelings, that grasps and takes in the scope of his mind all the nations of the earth, and the rest of mankind." [Laughter.] I wish to quote what a very distinguished man once said in reference to public revenue, and I do it with no desire to speak disparagingly of American Senators, for I put a very high estimate on their character and position, and especially so since I have got here. [Laughter.] Mr. Burke was a man of no mean consideration—I do not mean Edmund Burke, of New Hampshire, but the distinguished British statesman—and what does he say on this subject of revenue? He says "the revenue of the State is the State." That is a book; it is a text worth preaching from, that the revenue of the State is the State; and that Government which manages its revenue best operates most lightly and best for the people:

"The revenue of the State is the State in effect; all depends upon it, whether for support or reformation. Through the revenue alone the body-politic can act in its true genius and character; and therefore it will display just as much of its collective virtue as it is possessed of a just revenue."

That is what Edmund Burke said. He was one of your pence-calculating politicians. He was one of those demagogues who talk about the interests and the rights of the people. He, who was not only a statesman but a philosopher, declared that the revenue of a State is the State, and the virtue of the Government is indicated in the very same proportion that it collects a just revenue from the people.

Again, on this idea of the revenue of a Government, Lord Bacon, who was not the most virtuous it is true, but who wrote well, and said a great many good things, declared:

"Above all things, good policy is to be used that the treasure and moneys in a State be not gathered into few hands; for otherwise a State may have a good stock and yet starve; and money is like muck, no good unless it is spread."

What does he mean by that? Do not collect large sums of money from the people and appropriate them among the few; revenue, like muck, does no good unless it is spread; but how spread? Let the industrious portion of the community, the producers, spend their own money; let it be in their own pockets; appropriate it in such way as their interests, their happiness, and their prosperity may suggest; but we have reversed that proposition. We go on gathering muck from the barn-yards of the nation; we go on gathering revenue from the industry of the whole people, and we bring it here and squander it in appropriations, as I believe, wholly unnecessary to promote the interests and happiness of the people. As the cant is very common about demagogues, I desire to lay down as a text what was preached by Edmund Burke, one of the most distinguished of British statesmen.

Now, let us see where we are going on this subject of expenditure. And first as to the Army. I will divide our history into decades. At the end of the first decade, in 1800, the expense of the Army was $2,560,000. In 1810, it cost $2,294,000. In 1820, it cost $2,630,000. In 1830, the War Department cost $4,767,000. From 1820 to 1830 it jumped up to double. In 1840, it cost $7,695,000, nearly double again. It ran up from $7,695,000 in 1840, to $9,687,000 in 1850. You will mark that at the end of all these decades, in the year for which the calculation is made, no war existed; but these sums embrace all the expenditures of the War Department. In 1857 what do we find them to be? They reach the pretty little sum of $19,159,000! This is the way we are traveling. Whither are we going? What destination shall we reach at this rate?

Then, suppose we take the aggregate expenditures of the Government, and how does the matter stand? We find that in the year 1800 the entire expenses of the Government were $7,411,000; in the year 1810, $5,592,000—there was a decrease; in the year 1820, $10,723,000. In the year 1830, the entire expenses of the Government were $13,864,000. So we find that from 1800 to 1830 the expenses never got above $13,000,000. Then we find in 1840 the entire expenses of the Government were $26,196,000; in 1850, $44,049,000. Now, in 1857, before the end of another decade, the expenses run up from $44,049,000 to $65,032,000. In the year 1858 the expenses are estimated at $74,963,000. Here is an increase of ten millions in one year. At this rate where shall we go? At this rate of increasing the expenditures ten millions per annum, in another decade the expenditures of this Government will go up to the enormous sum of $175,000,000. If we increase them five millions per annum, in ten years we shall run the expenditures of the Government up to $125,000,000.

Is it not time to pause? Is it not time to inquire where we are going, and how much we are spending? We find a corresponding increase to that which I have traced in the War Department running into the Navy, running into the civil department, running through all the expenditures of the Government. I have added together all the expenditures of your Government since 1790, embracing the Army, the Navy, the civil department, and all the other objects of appropriation; and I find the sum total to be $1,313,658,000. This is the large sum which has been drawn from the people since this Government was established. How much of that has been expended upon the Army and Navy? In a country where the prejudices of the people and the genius of the Government are against a standing army, in a country where the standing army has been put down to the lowest possible point, how much of this $1,313,658,000 have been consumed for military purposes? Here where you say your Army is in miniature, where your Navy has not got out of its swaddling clothes, how much has been expended on these two departments? Eight hundred and sixty-seven million five hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars have been expended on these two arms of the public service; and that, too, while your standing Army has been kept down to the lowest point, as we are told. Two thirds of the entire revenue collected from the people of the United States has been expended upon this Army and Navy in miniature. Let them grow until they become men; let them get matured; let them get full strength, and how much of the people's substance will it take to sustain this Army and Navy? As I remarked, it has already taken the sum of $867,573,000, leaving $446,085,000 to be applied to all the other purposes of the Government.

This should, I think, teach us a very important lesson. What lesson? Here where they have been kept in miniature, where they have been kept down, where their influence has been felt less than in other Governments, the Army and Navy have consumed two thirds of the revenue drawn from the people. Go to the Governments that have risen and fallen before us, and what has been the cause of their downfall and decline? It has resulted from the influence of armies and navies. Standing armies and navies sustained by money drawn from the people, are the two arteries that have bled the nations before us to death. They are the two arteries that are now bleeding our people more freely than any others in the body-politic. Shall we not profit by experience? Shall we not stop and consider?

I know it is very easy for Senators, and those who are not Senators, to speak disparagingly of those who count the dollars and cents when an appropriation is proposed for this or for that purpose; but we see where our appropriations have brought us. They have brought us just where we are—in the midst of extravagance, in the midst of profligacy, in the midst of corruption, in the midst of improper applications of the people's money. Is there no way to arrest it? I tell the Democratic party, especially when they find the Opposition willing to unite with them on this question, now is the time to curtail the expenditures of this Government. If it is not done now, when you get up a sufficient stir here, and go on constantly increasing the governmental expenses, the people will hear the noise. They will hear the struggle, and now and then a few of them will come up and look in and ascertain, if they can, what is going on; and when they do ascertain that there is a considerable struggle going on to reduce the enormous expenditures of this Government, to enable the people to retain the product of their honest labor in their own pockets, to be expended in their own way, they will come to the rescue of the party that is for arresting the extravagant expenditures of this Government. I now admonish those who have charge of the Government to commence the work in time; to commence it now.

But, sir, I come back to the more immediate question before the Senate, and that is as to calling out an additional military force. We are told by the friends of the committee's bill that we do not want volunteers. General Washington, in 1794, ordered out fifteen thousand of the militia to suppress the insurrection of what were called the whisky boys in Pennsylvania, and General Washington at that time acted upon what he understood to be the theory of the Government, as contained in the Constitution.

In the enumerated powers of the Constitution, we find the grant to Congress of power—

"To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water."

"To raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years."

What is meant there? Does the Constitution contemplate a large standing army? Congress has power to declare war; and the body on which this power is conferred is authorized to raise and maintain an army. This is given as an incident as necessary to the express grant to carry out the war-making power. Does that imply that you can keep fixed on the people a large and expensive standing army? Proceeding with the Constitution, we find that Congress has power—

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

Do we not see that the militia was considered the proper force to sustain the strong arm of the Government? It never was contemplated to have a standing army. But it is said we do not want this description of force. When we look into the Constitution further, we find that the States are prohibited from keeping a standing army. Our Federal and State Constitutions were made by our fathers, who were familiar with the oppressions of the Old World, who had witnessed the encroachments and dangers of standing armies in those old Governments. Hence we find in all our bills of rights—perhaps not in all of them, but certainly in most of them—that standing armies are dangerous, and shall not be allowed; and the Constitution of the United States provides for calling forth the militia to suppress rebellion or insurrection against the Government. What does this contemplate? It contemplates most clearly that the power of this Government is to be vested in the citizen soldiery, that they are to be called forth when the Government needs them, and to answer the purpose for which the Government calls them into service. I am for that description of force; I am for confiding in and relying upon the volunteers of the country. They are the citizen soldiery in the proper acceptance of the term. I am for that description of soldiers that go when war comes. I am for that description of soldiers that come when war goes, who are not willing to enter the Army for a livelihood, and depend upon the Army for their support. General Washington gives us, in his message of 1794, an illustrious example in what he said on this subject. He says of the fifteen thousand men who were called out to suppress and put down the whisky boys in Pennsylvania:

"It has been a spectacle displaying to the highest advantage the value of republican Government to behold the most and the least wealthy of our citizens standing in the same ranks as private soldiers, preëminently distinguished by being the army of the Constitution."

That was what Washington thought. He would be considered a demagogue, a pence calculator, a narrow-minded politician if he were to live and speak that language now; but he thought the true army of a republican Government should be composed of the most respectable and the least respectable, of the most wealthy and the least wealthy, fighting together when an occasion required them to tender their services. This was the army that Washington presented as an admirable spectacle of a republican Government; but when we come to modern times and to more distinguished men, we find a different doctrine preached. The honorable chairman of the Military Committee—I am sorry he is not in his seat—in speaking of the citizen soldiery, or of volunteers, makes use of the following language:

"Nothing would be more unjust than to call people from their peaceful avocations, and keep them for a long period at frontier posts to guard frontier settlements. It would take lower material, too, than compose the volunteers who turn out in time of war. Among my objections to the employment of volunteers for such service, is the very elevated character of the young men who are often induced thus to enter the service; men who are worthy of better employment; whose habits are injured, whose train of thought or pursuit of some profession is broken in upon by this temporary service where a cheaper man would do as well."

General Washington presented it as a noble spectacle that the force which he had ordered out, in obedience to the wants of the Government, was composed of the most and the least wealthy and respectable. That was the idea that General Washington had, and he presents it as an illustrious example in a republican form of Government. But hear the chairman of the committee:

"If I may be permitted, without an appearance of egotism, to refer to my own observation, I would say that when I have traveled among the people from whom the volunteers were drawn who went to Mexico, I have had this fact more deeply impressed upon me by the sad countenance of some father, the tears of some mother, over the fate of a promising young man, who fell in performing the duties of a private soldier. The material is too high, except when the honor of the country demands it."

This carries us back to the condition and material of which armies are composed in European countries. What is the material of which they are composed? There is a broken-down and brainless-headed aristocracy, members of decaying families that have no energy by which they can elevate themselves, relying on ancestral honors and their connection with the Government. On the other hand there is a rabble, in the proper acceptance of the term—a miserable lazzaroni, lingering, and hanging, and wallowing about their cities, that have no employment; and they are ready and anxious to enter the service of the Government at any time for a few sixpences to buy their grog and a little clothing to hide their state of nudity. Such is the material of which their armies are composed—the rabble on the one hand, and the broken-down, decaying aristocracy on the other. Where does the middle man stand? Where does the industrious bee that makes the honey stand, from whose labor all is drawn? Where is he? He is placed between the upper and the nether millstone, and is ground to death by the office-hunter on the one hand, and the miserable rabble in the shape of soldiery on the other. I want no rabble here on the one hand, and I want no aristocracy on the other. Let us elevate the masses; and make no places in our Government for the rabble, either in your Army or the Navy; but let us pursue those great principles of government and philanthropy that elevate the masses on the one hand, and dispense with useless offices on the other. Do this, and you preserve the great masses of the people, on whom all rests; without whom your Government would not have an entity.

Cheaper men and lower priced men! Are these the men that a great Republic like this is to depend upon when danger is upon us? Think of it, Mr. President! An army composed of a rabble like this! You have heard much from the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] as to military despotism; but think of the result that will ensue if you increase your standing Army a regiment now and a regiment then, until it runs up to fifty or a hundred thousand men, with all power concentrated here, composed of these "cheap" men—of this miserable rabble. Suppose then a difficulty should arise between one of the States and the Federal head here; these cheap men would feel it to be their duty and their highest pride to obey the commands and dictates of some daring military adventurer; and we might not have to wait for dextrous moves or for coups d'état by a Louis Napoleon. No; you would have some man to make the move here. What high pride, what high patriotism, what high sentiment in reference to Government can these "cheap" men entertain? They will feel it to be their duty to obey orders when commanded to charge on one of the sovereign States of this Union.

Already the military spirit and patriotism of the States are diminishing; the militia system is giving way; all eyes are turned to the Federal Government, this great central head that is collecting its millions annually from the people. Your State officers, and your States themselves, are sinking into insignificance. Here is the great center; here is the great attractive power. Abandon your military systems in your States, do away with the military ardor that exists among the several States of this Confederacy, and where are you? States that are now sovereign and independent, will revolve around this great central orb as so many dependants or satellites, receiving from the great center their light, their heat, and their motion. Let him advocate a standing army who will—to give another direction to the language of the Senator from Georgia, at the conclusion of his speech, when he said, "I tell Senators to beware," I vary the language, and tell the States to beware, for their sovereignty is at an end, if you persist in your career.

If we do not commence the work and arrest the expenditures and corruptions of this Government, the time will come when this Government will be overthrown; the time will come when the sound from the hoof of the cavalry horse will announce to the sovereign States the approach of a usurper; the legions of the Government, in advancing column, announce a despotism; when the goddess which presides in the temple of liberty will descend, and the last expiring hope of free Government go staggering from our land through carnage and through blood.

A standing army is an incubus, a canker—a fungus on the body-politic. Rely on the citizen soldier—the man that loves his country. When you call for volunteers, the lowest man in the company does not start out with the feelings or subdued spirit of a common soldier; but each man that goes, goes as a hero—and with the expectation of distinguishing himself, even as a private, before he returns to his home.

But it would seem from reading the speech of the honorable Senator—and you can see that old European idea of standing armies, commanders, and subjects, sticking out—that when he returned to Mississippi, and met the mothers and the brothers and the sisters and the fathers of those gallant men who had gone to Mexico, many of whom now sleep in a foreign grave, with not even a rude stone to mark their burial place, and many of them, perhaps, without a winding sheet save the blanket they slept upon in the tented field, and it saturated with their blood—they had tears, they had sympathies, they had some one they cared for. Those men who entered the service, and went into a foreign land as volunteers, had somebody to care for too. They had their country that they loved, and were willing to defend, and in whose cause they were willing to perish. Notwithstanding the tears that trickled down the mother's cheek, her heart would expand with patriotism when she reflected that her son had fallen in a glorious cause, defending his country's rights. He could not have died a more glorious death.

But to return to the idea suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs; that we want some cheap man, I suppose, that has no mother, no father, no sister, nobody to care for him or to shed a tear over him. Oh no; that is not the man we want. We do not want the Army filled up with a rabble that have no country, no friends, nobody to care for, but are ready and willing to obey the order of their commander whatever it may be! I do not want such cheap men. I am opposed to such an army. I do not want to provide a place in the Government for them. I want men who have homes, who have mothers, who have fathers and friends and relations to care for them. I want them to feel that they have something to defend, and that they have a country which is worth defending.

In the course of the discussion on this bill, there were occasionally some strange developments. The eloquent chairman, who sustained the bill with so much ability all the way through, whenever he came to notice a man who had distinguished himself, seemingly had prepared a standing eulogy to pronounce on his character. As to everything that pertained to the standing Army proper, he seemed to be au fait. He was ready at every point to present them and to identify them with the Army, and especially with West Point. He commenced with Washington, and pronounced a eulogy upon him, the great and good, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." My heart responds to all that. He spoke of Jackson, from my own State; and if there is any man that ever lived that I venerate, it is the illustrious Andrew Jackson. He spoke of Colonel Johnston, who has command of our forces now away in the region of Utah, and he pronounced a eulogy upon him; of General Taylor, distinguished and brave, (and I have not aught to say against him,) and he pronounced a long eulogy upon him, his courage, his valor, his chivalry; and last, though not least, of my distinguished friend from Texas, [Mr. Houston,] on whom he pronounced a eulogy, and I say amen to all of it.

I will not undertake to add anything to what he said on that occasion; but in this brilliant galaxy of military chieftains, men who have been in the thickest and hottest of battle; men over whose efforts your gallant banner has triumphantly waved, upon whose standard the eagle of liberty has again and again perched, did it not occur to you that there was another man who was somewhat distinguished? I understand that that man too concurs with the Secretary of War in asking for regiments; not to fill up the rank and file with cheap men, but to have regiments, not companies. Who is that man? It occurred to me as being somewhat strange that nothing was said of him. I am no admirer of the individual to whom I allude, in a political point of view; but his military reputation is a part of the history of this country, and his military renown is only bounded by the limits of the civilized world. Who is he? When you come to look to him exclusively in a military point of view, he stands up in this great cluster of military chiefs like some projecting cliff from a lofty mountain. Did we never hear of Winfield Scott? Has he no place in the military annals of our country? Has he fought no battles? Has he shed no blood? Has he not shown himself to be illustrious as a soldier, as well as a tactician? Why was he omitted? Why was he excluded from the category of great men? Why was there an omission to pronounce a eulogy upon him? I know there is nothing I could say that would add one gem to the brilliant chaplet that encircles his illustrious brow, and therefore I will not undertake to say anything in reference to that distinguished man. As a military chieftain, he belongs to the nation; his success in the battle-field, to the history of the world.

I do not understand the proposition before the Senate, as presented by the Military Committee, to be an Administration measure. When I turn to the report of the Secretary of War, in what terms does he recommend an increase of the Army? The principal idea in his mind seems to be that because his predecessor had recommended an increase of the standing Army, he too should recommend it. Who was his predecessor? The illustrious chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I say it not in disparagement of him; but I refer to it as a fact that we all have pride of character, and anything which emanates from us is, in our opinion, better than that which emanates from anybody else. It was recommended by him as Secretary of War. He comes into the Senate as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to execute and carry out his own recommendation; and then we are told that it is an Administration measure. We see how this matter stands. It is so of human character. Notwithstanding it emanates from that distinguished committee, (for all of whom I have the most profound respect, for their talents and their integrity,) I must say that committee, distinguished as it is, is not infallible, and may originate measures that are not perfect. We are all attached to our offspring. When we claim paternity, though the infant be imperfect, crippled, deformed, not capable of taking care of itself, such are the affections of the parental heart that it clings with more tenacity to its crippled and dependent and imperfect offspring than it does to those who can go alone and take care of themselves. It may be so in this instance.

In reference to the volunteer service, the amendment I have offered proposes to raise four regiments of volunteers in the very language of the President himself, and for the purposes for which he states in his message that he wants them. The officers and men are to be paid precisely the same amount that you propose to pay to these "cheap" men who have no home, or country, or friends, to care for them. I state here now, in my place, that it is estimated the cost will be about a million dollars per regiment. I state here, in my place, that if you will enter into a contract with me, I will guaranty that Tennessee, the volunteer State, will take your $4,000,000 and acquit you of every claim hereafter, and will settle all your difficulties in Utah in less than six months. I was going to add, yes, we will do it for half the money. Tennessee has her companies and her regiments ready; and all the Government has to do is to say, "we will receive you into service and commission your officers," and the work is done. Volunteers are the very men to send there. Send them; and when Brigham Young has come to terms, when he has reached a state of subordination, when he has complied with the law, our volunteers will not only stop there, but if you will grant the boys homesteads, they will break up that rookery of polygamy, and Brigham will move to some other place. As a matter of economy, as a matter of expedition, as the most effectual means of restoring peace to the country, accept the proposition, and we will perform the work.

But there has been a great deal said on this subject; and especially the remarks of the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] struck me with some force. In speaking of Brigham Young, and the institutions established under his government, if I remember right—I have not the speech before me, and it is not in any unkind spirit I refer to him; it is not my intention to make a wrong quotation—he said that they were a kind of Judaism; that they were deluded and fanatical; and the whole tenor of his speech was, that the power of the Government should be brought down upon them, and the anathemas of all Christian people should be hurled against them. The gentleman informed us that the Mormons had their origin in

New York; that they went from there to Missouri, from Missouri to Illinois, and from there they took up their line of march, and located themselves at the Salt Lake, where they are now.

When we allude to Salt Lake and Brigham Young, there are many associations that come up with them, all of which were thrown out in the honorable Senator's speech. He is pronounced to be a deluded man, and his followers fanatics; it is said they are all laboring under a delusion. Suppose this be so: in what does this delusion consist? In the establishment of polygamy. Let us talk of things as they are.

In reference to the religion or delusion of these people, we should be a little careful in the advances we make upon them. We have a very striking illustration, admonishing us upon this subject. Charles V., the Emperor of Germany, when tired of the cares of State, resigned the possession of his dominions to his son, and retired to a monastery. While there, to amuse the evening of his life, he undertook to regulate the movement of watches; but after repeated efforts he found that it was impossible to make any two of them keep precisely the same time. He was thus led to reflect upon the crime or folly and wickedness he had committed in attempting to make men think alike. It is as natural for men to differ in their religious and political notions as it is in the complexion of their hair and their skins.

Does polygamy exist nowhere else? We are wonderfully alarmed at a little polygamy at Salt Lake; yet no longer ago than yesterday a resolution was reported by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations which may result in the expenditure of thirty or forty thousand dollars to receive—whom? To receive the representative of the Grand Turk of Constantinople. [Laughter.] The first song I ever heard in my life used to run:

"The turban'd Turk who scorns the world."

We all know the lines that follow. It is said that he has his harem of six hundred wives; and yet we are almost agonizing ourselves to appropriate the money of the people of this country, who are so much opposed to polygamy, to receive the representative of polygamy of the grand harem itself. Have we forgotten when Amin Bey went through the country representing the Grand Turk and his harem, that he was escorted by the Secretary of State through the House of Representatives? An appropriation of money was made to defray his expenses. What all those expenses were, I shall not undertake to say.

Go to China; does not polygamy exist there? How long have we been trying to open commercial relations and intercourse with the Emperor of China? We have appointed a Minister and we pay him a large salary to represent us at the court of that country, which tolerates polygamy. I think it ought to be a little excusable in Brigham Young, who is said to be a deluded fanatic, living and moving and acting under his delusion, and his poor, blind followers, too. If they are laboring under a delusion, let us act as Christians. I fear that all those suggestions have been thrown out to excite the prejudice, not to say the anger, of the American people, against these misguided, and, I was going to say, abominable people.

Why, Mr. President, have we forgotten the accounts we read about the Crusades? That was a delusion got up by the simple power of speech. Three million people were moved by a delusion. Richard I., the lion-hearted Richard, who was alluded to here the other day—the great conqueror of the East, engaged the embattled hosts that were led by Saladin, in carrying out a delusion. It is very easy to say that one man is a maniac, that another is deluded, that this or that man is not in his right mind. Of that are we to be the judges? They may say that we are deluded, that we are misguided, that we are misdirected; and who shall judge between us? Sir, in the midst of all this delusion, while we pursue the career upon which we intend to enter against the Mormons, we should act as Christians; and with the light of Christianity, with the Bible before us, we should endeavor to correct and reform that deluded and misguided people.

But suppose we come a little nearer home. Does polygamy exist nowhere else? I intend to speak of things as they are; and I will venture to say that there is more practical polygamy in the city of New York than there is in all Salt Lake, with this marked difference: at Salt Lake it is according to their religion, according to their delusion, according to the law and custom of the place; it is tolerated and made a matter of conscience: while in New York and many other places, practical polygamy exists in violation of our standard of morals, in violation of the law, in violation of what a sound virtuous community consider to be right. There is more practical polygamy now in many of the cities of this Confederacy than there is in all Salt Lake. Then, before we get so fierce, so rampant, and so willing to run these misguided and deluded people into the mountains, into the caverns and the gorges, as hiding places, I think we should be a little considerate, and see if we cannot correct the evil which lies at our own door.

I have occupied much more time, Mr. President, than I intended; but I desired to set myself right in the vote I should give in reference to the increase of the Army of the United States. The proposition I have introduced as a substitute for that of the Senator from Massachusetts, which is substantially his proposition with a little variation, covers, I think, what the President asks. I am willing to call out whatever number of volunteers is necessary to meet the emergency and answer the purposes of the Government; but I want to call out that description of men that have a country and care for somebody, and for whom somebody cares. I do not want to fill up the Army of this nation with a rabble. I do not want to fill up the Army of this nation with those who feel and have no responsibility. I want the men upon whom our liberties are to depend in time of battle to be men who have a country, and who feel an interest in that country. Stating these as my views for voting against the original bill and in favor of the proposition I offer, I conclude by expressing the hope that the Senate will adopt the volunteer proposition. If they think proper afterwards to authorize the War Department to do so, we will make a contract to do the work for half the money you propose to pay your "cheap" men.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Chair to state that we were first to act on the original bill, before any action could be taken on the substitute. Was I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) Both the original bill and the proposed substitute are before the Senate. Any modification that may be proposed to either the original bill or the substitute, must be acted on before the vote for substituting the one for the other shall be taken. The original bill is now before the Senate, and open to amendment or modification. After that, the substitute is open to amendment or modification. If no amendment or modification be proposed to either, the question is directly upon the substitution of the proposition offered by the Senator from Tennessee, and accepted by the Senator from Massachusetts, in lieu of his own amendment to the original bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. On the adjournment of the Senate last week, a motion was before the body to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion has been withdrawn.

Mr. CHANDLER. Precisely; and if the original bill is now to be perfected, I wish to renew that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion will be in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to strike out the fourth section of the original bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. There is an amendment to the bill now pending—the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts; and it is incompetent to offer another amendment which reaches the original bill, before we dispose of that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has repeated, and such is the ruling of the Chair, that when a proposition is offered as a substitute for the original bill, it is the privilege of the friends of the original bill to perfect it before taking the vote on the substitution; and it is also the privilege of the friends of the substitute to perfect that before the vote on the substitute shall be taken; so that a motion to strike out the fourth section of the original bill is now in order.

Mr. IVERSON. If it comes from the friends of the bill; but is the Senator from Michigan a friend of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I make no pretensions of that kind. I suggest that an amendment may come from an enemy, as well as a friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The quarter from which it comes makes no difference as to the question of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I renew the motion that the fourth section of the bill be stricken out. It is well known, sir, that I am opposed to the original bill, from beginning to end, in general and in detail; and I shall probably vote against it, however it may be amended; but if it is to pass, I desire that it may be made as little objectionable as possible. I have risen now merely to point out the great injustice which will result from the adoption of the fourth section; and the few remarks I shall make on this point are based entirely on the Army Register for this year, which I hold in my hand.

In my judgment, the remarks made last week by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. Davis,] in regard to this section of the bill, are entirely fallacious. If we were at this time reorganizing our Army, and all the appointments were to be made by rank in the service, it would not be as objectionable as it is at present, when we have some fifteen old regiments, and only four new ones in the service. The effect of the fourth section, if it be enacted into a law, will be to degrade the officers in those old regiments, and place them below others whom they have heretofore ranked. The chairman of the committee, when this subject was last under consideration, said:

"If a regiment goes out to meet the enemy, or is exposed to perilous campaigns, or is exposed to the perils of climate, vacancies will occur, and it was thought that those who shared the hazard that created the vacancies, were best entitled to the promotions."

Now, it is very well known that a regiment never goes into battle alone, and that all the regiments in our service are equally exposed to the perils of climate and to perilous campaigns. Our regiments are continually changing their positions. One regiment may be stationed in Florida, or some other sickly climate, for one or two years, and then it changes with a regiment from the North, and goes to a more healthy climate. If I understand our military system, every regiment in the service is equally exposed to the perils of climate as well as to the perils of war; and consequently that argument has no force, the risks being equally divided. The officers in all the regiments are perfectly willing to take the perils of life and their chances of promotion. The chairman said, further:

"Then again, it will sometimes occur that two lieutenant colonels of about the same date, being in different regiments of the same arm, may have had all that rivalry that belongs to their position."

I was surprised to hear that remark from the Senator from Mississippi, who has himself been a military man. There must be a very low state of feeling, there must be a deficient regard for rank and grade, in our Army, if such a consideration were allowed to have weight and impair the efficiency of any regiment in the service. Why, sir, one of the first principles inculcated upon our cadets at West Point is subordination to authority. It matters not whether one officer is ranked by a day or by ten years; if he is ranked, he is ranked, and he knows what his relative position is to be; and those rivalries to which the Senator alluded have no weight whatever, as I am informed by those who are conversant with the Army. That argument falls to the ground.

Further, the Senator said:

"Again, it inevitably follows, that a man promoted into a regiment he has not previously seen, as a major, lieutenant colonel, or colonel, ignorant of the officers and men, will be less efficient than a man who had been serving in the regiment, and knew both the officers and men."

I am informed by officers of the Army, and others, that the direct opposite of this proposition is the fact; that frequently in the old regiments which have been officered by the same men for a number of years, when you take a new man from another regiment as commanding officer, he comes in unbiased and unprejudiced; he looks upon the facts as they are; and if officers have been petted or indulged by their former colonel, he corrects the abuses which may have existed, and suppresses dissatisfaction; or, in other words, he repairs wrongs that may have previously existed in that regiment, and the efficiency of the regiment is improved rather than damaged by that transfer.

But, sir, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a few cases in which gross injustice would be occasioned by the adoption of the fourth section of the original bill. It will be found, on reference to the Army Register for 1858, that Brevet Major L. P. Graham was a captain of three years' standing, in 1846. By the same Register it will be found that Delos B. Sackett was at that time a brevet second lieutenant, at the foot of his regiment, and that he entered the service July 1, 1845. At the battle of Resaca de la Palma, when the dragoons charged the enemy's batteries, Captain Graham was the second officer in command, and received a brevet of major for his gallant conduct on that day. Lieutenant Sackett, on the same day, received a brevet of first lieutenant. On the organization of the four new regiments, Lieutenant Sackett was made senior captain of the first regiment of cavalry, and he holds the same rank as Captain Graham, who was a captain of two years' standing when Mr. Sackett graduated at West Point; and yet there is not a more gallant and efficient cavalry officer in the service than Captain Graham.

The next case to which I allude is that of Captain Wood—and I wish it to be understood that I do not know any of these officers, but I have collated from the Register the facts which I present to the Senate, and I think they ought to be considered. Captain J. T. Wood, in 1846, was brevet second lieutenant in the corps of topographical engineers, at the bottom of the list, and we now find him second on the list of captains in the first regiment of cavalry, and holding rank equal to Henry H. Sibley, who was captain in 1847 in the second regiment of dragoons, and was breveted major for his gallant conduct in the Mexican war.

Captain Charles S. Winder joined the Army as brevet second lieutenant of artillery July 1, 1850, less than five years before the new regiments were formed. He was appointed fourth captain in the ninth regiment of infantry in 1855, not having then been five years in the Army. A further examination of the Army Register shows that Daniel Ruggles, who received two brevets, one of major and one of lieutenant colonel, for gallant service in the war, is fourth captain in his regiment, although he entered the Army in 1833. He was appointed captain in 1846, about the time when Captain Winder was entered as a cadet at West Point. Here seems to be a case of gross injustice and favoritism; and if you adopt the fourth section, and it shall become a law, it will place Captain Winder on an exact equality in the line of promotion with Captain Ruggles, who was breveted both as major and as lieutenant colonel before Captain Winder entered the service at all. Captain Winder has never taken any part in any war in which we have been engaged; and yet the fourth section of the original bill places him on an exact equality, and will render him just as likely to be promoted to major, lieutenant colonel, or colonel, as Captain Ruggles. This is a case of gross injustice, which I trust every Senator will see at a glance.

Again, Captain Caleb C. Sibley, the senior captain in the fifth regiment of infantry, entered the Army as brevet second lieutenant, in 1829. He was promoted to a captaincy in 1840. By reference to the Register, you will see that Franklin Gardner is the senior captain in the tenth regiment of infantry. Captain Gardner entered the Army in 1843, and was made a captain in 1855; and yet he has the same relative rank in his regiment as Captain Sibley, who was captain in his regiment three years before Captain Gardner graduated at West Point. On a further examination of rank in the infantry arm, Captain Sibley will be found to be the senior captain, while Captain Gardner is the sixty-sixth on the list; and yet, by the fourth section of the original bill, Captain Gardner will be placed on an exact equality, with regard to rank, with Captain Sibley.

When you examine the higher officers in the new regiments, and compare them with the majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels of the old regiments, you will find the same disparity. Let me take the ninth and the fifth regiments—the ninth being one of the new regiments, and the fifth being one of the old. The lieutenant colonel in the ninth regiment has been thirty-two years in service; and the lieutenant colonel in the fifth regiment thirty-eight years. The senior major in the ninth regiment has been twenty-one years in service; in the fifth, thirty-eight years, or nearly double the length of service of the senior major of the ninth regiment. There is a difference of seventeen years' service; and yet, by the fourth section of this bill, you propose to do away with these seventeen years of hard service, and place the senior major of the ninth regiment on an exact equality, as to promotion, with the senior major of the fifth regiment. Again: the junior major in the ninth regiment has been seventeen years in the service, while the junior major in the fifth regiment has been twenty-nine years in the service—a difference of twelve years; and yet you propose to place the two in the same relative position. So, sir, you may go through the whole list, and you will find that in almost every instance gross injustice would be done to the officers of the old regiments by adopting the fourth section.

But let me read what the Senator from Mississippi said on this point:

"I think the equity is on the side of the provision. It is a reform, and therefore it must bear upon somebody. No reform can ever be instituted that will not violate the just expectations of somebody. If the reform is proper, if equity is on the side of the provision, the sooner it is adopted the better."

I ask particular attention to the remark which follows:

"It so happens that we now have four new regiments in the Army; two of them are infantry, liable to cross promotion; but no cross promotion has yet occurred; and I think it better, if the provision is to be adopted at all, that it should be adopted before such cross promotion has arisen than after it shall have occurred, and claims have been perfected in the hands of other officers."

This last argument is like the postscript to a lady's letter: it contains all there is in it. Here are four new regiments in which no cross promotions have yet taken place, and performe it is meant that no cross promotions ever shall take place. Gross favoritism has been shown in officering the new regiments. Did not the honorable chairman know that no cross promotions could take place out of those new regiments? Did he not know that the officers of the ninth and tenth regiments of infantry must take their chance in relative rank for promotion into any other regiment, and they never can be promoted over the old officers of the Army until the time shall come when they stand oldest on the list of officers? No cross promotions have occurred over the heads of these new officers by older officers in the Army; and the intention of this clause is that no cross promotion ever shall take place over these special favorites of the late Administration. I trust that a sense of justice will influence the Senate to strike out the fourth section of the bill. It is an outrage upon all the old and able officers of the Army. Here is a man who entered the Army as second lieutenant in 1850, placed on an exact equality with the man who was breveted major and lieutenant colonel for his gallant service in the war. Do you suppose for one moment that that man who was twice breveted for gallant service would remain in the Army and allow this boy, the mere pet of somebody around Washington, to be promoted over his head? If he did, he would be unworthy of the epaulets he wears. The adoption of the fourth section would drive your ablest officers out of the Army; and in justice to them (not one hundredth of whom do I know) I demand that that section shall be stricken out.

Mr. PUGH. I consider the fourth section the best section in the original bill, and I say so with all the observation that I have been able to give to this subject during the short period of my connection with the Army and with public life. There are a number of the regiments which are stationed at posts, not at any scene of danger, not at any place of danger. Through the influence of the field officers, or the officer in command, they see no hard service. They are regiments remarkably exempt from casualties. Other regiments are sent to the frontiers; and by disease, by death, by wounds incapacitating from further service, vacancies occur in the higher grades, in the field officers; and then they are filled from officers who have taken good care to repose their heads on the pillow of easy service at these posts.

Why should we not promote by regiments to field officers, as well as to company officers? We promote from second lieutenant to first lieutenant, and from first lieutenant to captain, by regiments. Why should we not promote field officers in the same way? Why should all the captains of a regiment which is in Utah, for instance, or in Nebraska, serving against an enemy, if a vacancy occurs in the rank of major or lieutenant colonel, be overruled, in order that some senior captain who has been commanding a post on the Atlantic coast for the last twenty years, shall all of a sudden be put over their heads? I consider this provision an act of sheer justice to those officers who perform military service, in contradistinction to those who hold their rank in the Army and do not perform service. Those officers who serve in the field ought to have this promotion, and not those whose only merit is their longevity. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not strike out this section.

Mr. PEARCE. I do not propose to enter into the debate of this section, but the Senator from Michigan alluded to a young officer of the Army whom I happen to know, and know to be a young man of great merit. I allude to Captain Winder. He spoke of him as owing his promotion to his being a pet of somebody about here. The truth is that that young man, whom I have known from boyhood, is a man of uncommon merit, and he distinguished himself on a melancholy occasion, which the Senate have not yet forgotten. He was one of the officers in charge of the regiment which was shipped from New York by the lost steamer San Francisco to go around Cape Horn. On that occasion when older and perhaps able soldiers did not exhibit quite as much composure as might have been desired, he distinguished himself by extraordinary courage and composure and by remarkable efforts for the preservation of the ship and those on board. I believe his conduct on that occasion was so favorably regarded by the Administration that it induced his promotion when the new regiments were raised. I think he owed it to no partiality, to no feeling which would authorize any one to call him a mere pet. He owed it to his merit displayed on a single occasion it may be, but certainly a signal occasion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I said that I did not know a single one of the officers to whom I alluded. I merely looked at the Register, and noticed the date of their entry into the Army, and I perceived that some of these young officers could not have seen service, because there had been no service since the date of their entry into the Army. Let me say, in answer to the Senator from Ohio, that I find by looking over the Army Register, a great number of men who were promoted for gallantry on the field of battle, that have been totally overlooked in officering the new regiments. If the Administration had taken men who had distinguished themselves upon the field of battle, without regard to rank, I should not have found fault, but such has not been the case. In all the four regiments I can find but one officer who has ever received a brevet for gallant service on the field of battle; and that is the case of Captain Lugenebel, the senior captain of the ninth regiment of infantry, who received a brevet as major.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator is surely mistaken.

Mr. CHANDLER. I find, on looking again at the Register, that I was mistaken. I perceive that one of the majors is a brevet lieutenant colonel, but there are very few brevets among the new captains—only one in the ninth and tenth regiments; and there are but very few among all the officers appointed to the four new regiments who received a brevet for gallant services in the Mexican war, while many of them were young men who had never seen service at all. Perhaps it was an assumption of mine, that the men who had not seen service were appointed through favoritism.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the motion to strike out the fourth section will prevail; and I will state two considerations which seem to me to commend it to favor; but, in the first place, I ask that the section be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That hereafter regular promotions to vacancies occurring in the regimental grades of commissioned officers of the United States Army, shall be by regiments or corps, instead of by arms of service, as now regulated and provided in certain cases.

Mr. SEWARD. This, Mr. President, is an innovation establishing a new principle, one entirely new, and in antagonism to the system which has prevailed in the Army from the beginning, so far as my knowledge extends. As an original question, I am informed by military men that it would have been quite unobjectionable, and, perhaps, wise; but it cannot be introduced now without producing derangement, confusion, dissatisfaction and discontent throughout the Army, and to a very wide extent.

This bill was introduced as a bill for the purpose of increasing the regular Army of the United States. It is quite apparent that it has already changed its character; and it is to be no longer such a bill, if it shall pass at all. What it will be, if it shall pass at all, will be a bill to increase the military power of the United States, either by adding to the regular Army or by calling out volunteers for a brief period of time, and with reference to a particular occasion. The Senate has already perfected the original bill, so far as to limit the term of service, of the two additional companies to each regiment which are to be raised, to the period of two years. It will either stand in that shape, or else it will stand in the shape of limiting them, as proposed by all the substitutes, to the period of service in the Territory of Utah necessary to reestablish the authority of the Government there. It is, therefore, an ephemeral bill, it is an occasional bill, and not a bill to increase the Army of the United States, or to affect the general arrangement of that institution. To engraft on a bill of such a temporary character, a provision so important as to create this innovation would seem to jeopard the original bill itself, and would probably be the means of producing discontent which may be avoided; while, if there is merit in this proposition, it can come up as a distinct proposition in a special bill.

Mr. WILSON. In spite of the opposition of the Senator from Ohio, I trust the Senate will strike out the fourth section of the bill, and not adopt, in a measure of a mere temporary character, a provision making so great an innovation on the established system. While I am up, I wish to call attention to the first section of the bill as it has been perfected. I understand that by that section, as perfected on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BRAGS,] the commissions of all the company officers in the Army of the United States are to be placed in the hands of the President. The first section provides for raising thirty companies, two to be added to each regiment; and it also provides for discharging two companies from each regiment at the end of two years. In these thirty companies there are ninety officers. Thirty companies and ninety officers are to be discharged at the end of two years, and by the provisions of this section, the President can discharge any two companies in each regiment, and any ninety officers he chooses. He may retain every officer whom he may appoint under this bill, and select among all the other officers of the Army ninety whom he will discharge.

Now, if it be the judgment of the Senate to add two companies to each regiment, and to discharge the whole thirty companies at the end of two years, I hope that in justice to the old officers now in the Army, we shall so amend the first section that the officers to be commissioned under this bill shall be discharged, and that the present officers of the Army shall not be interfered with by this temporary measure. I have but little acquaintance with the officers of the Army. Eulogies have been pronounced upon them, and they have been somewhat assailed here. I take it that officers of the Army are very much like all the rest of us in the country in public and in private life. Many of them are gentlemen of talent, and of character, who adorn the profession they have chosen. Some of them I know to be the merest snobs in the world, who do no credit to their profession or any other; but they are in the service, and I hope that in this temporary bill, increasing the military force of the country to operate in the Territory of Utah, we shall adopt no provision that will in any way interfere with them.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has laid down the doctrine that we ought to increase the Army for general purposes. Some of us are opposed to the increase of the Army as a general principle; but there are those here—and I trust all of us agree in it—who think that exigencies have arisen in the Territory of Utah demanding that the President of the United States shall be authorized to raise a force to maintain the laws of the country, and to suppress rebellion in that Territory if he shall find it necessary to do so. The Senator from Tennessee has, to-day, admonished his political friends not to increase the Army as a permanent military establishment at the present time, but to authorize the President to raise an additional force if he shall come to the conclusion that it is necessary. The Senator has told the Senate that we ought to diminish the extraordinary expenses of the Government. I hope his admonitions will be regarded by his political friends; and that the Senators on this side of the Chamber will also profit by them. I noticed this morning an article in the official journal—

A SENATOR. What is that?

Mr. WILSON. The Washington Union, I suppose, is the official journal; at any rate it assumes that character. I noticed in that paper this morning another of those articles which the Senator from Mississippi, the other day, pronounced to be "flippant," and I think the same description applies to the article of to-day. It tells us that to increase the Army will reduce the Army expenses. It says that if we add to the Army five regiments we shall not increase the expenditure, for it has already cost more to transfer regiments from one part of the country to another as the service demanded, than it will to increase the number of regiments and keep them permanently stationed on the frontiers. Our experience does not justify this assumption. Three years ago we added four regiments to the Army and the expenditures of the military establishment have gone up more rapidly than this increase of men. The experience of the country shows that when you add to the numbers in the Army, you increase the expenditures per man in a still greater ratio. I do not mean to say that the addition of three or five regiments at this time will increase the expenses in this proportion; I am not sure that it would; but we all know that the addition of three regiments or five regiments to the permanent military force of the country must increase the annual expenditures of the Government for years to come.

I trust the Senate will agree to the amendment I offered yesterday, as it has been improved by the proposition presented to-day by the Senator from Tennessee. I should have put it in that shape, if I had not feared it would lose support from some quarters, from Senators who sustain the Administration. The amendment, as modified at his suggestion, authorizes the President of the United States to raise volunteers to be used in the Territory of Utah to maintain the authority of the Federal Government there, to suppress any rebellion existing there, and to protect the people of the United States who pass from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific coast. I hope that proposition will receive the sanction of Congress; and that the President, if he needs this force, will summon it into the field; but if he has force enough, as I think he has in the Army of the United States, as it now exists, he will not summon three or four thousand volunteers into the service in the present condition of the country, when our Treasury is more than empty.

I thank the Senator from Tennessee for having said, what perhaps in some sections it requires some courage to say, that we ought to deal with the Mormons in Utah as Christian men should deal with other men. Words have been uttered in Congress and in the public press, in regard to the Utah troubles, which should receive the stern condemnation of every Christian man in America. The Mormons, in 1848, went across the country to their new homes in the gorges of the mountains, and there are now some sixty thousand of them there. They have a city at Salt Lake, with about twelve thousand inhabitants. They are a people remarkable for their industry; but they have adopted a false religion, as we all believe. They have adopted the system of polygamy, which has made their name infamous in this country and throughout the world. I am told, however, that there are only about one thousand polygamists in the whole Territory, and the great mass of the Mormons are not polygamists. Be this as it may, nobody has yet proposed in Congress, to my knowledge, to pass a law prohibiting and punishing polygamy in the Territory of Utah, as I think we ought to do in that Territory and in every other.

But, sir, this system of theirs has brought down upon them the condemnation of the country; and there are persons who would welcome a contest in that Territory which should result in bloodshed, in civil war, in blotting them out, and scattering them broadcast over the world, or driving them out of our own country. I read to-day with pain the letter of the commanding officer of our Army in that Territory, in which he expresses the opinion that the Mormons will resist, that this will lead to war, and that the people of the United States should desire and welcome it. Sir, for myself, I welcome no contest in any part of this country between the Army of the United States and any portion of the American people, however deluded they may be. This remark of the military commander in that Territory will, I think, be received, as it ought to be received, with regret, and with disapprobation by the country.

The people of Utah complain that we have sent there unworthy persons as officers of this Government. Nobody doubts that; but I do not see that it justifies them in their conduct. Let them come to this Government as they should come; let them represent their wrongs, and I think we shall redress them. I believe the great mistake was originally made when President Fillmore appointed Brigham, the head saint among them, Governor of the Territory of Utah. I have been told by Senators that when that appointment was made, and since it was made, the Mormons all over Europe regarded it as sanctioning, by this Government, their religion, and that thousands of them have flocked to this country and gone to Utah on account of this recognition by the Government of the United States.

I suppose this increase of the military force of the nation, if made at all, will be made in view of the difficulties in Utah Territory. The Senator from New York who has sustained this bill, put it on this ground, and this ground only. The President of the United States asked for a force for that purpose, and so did the Secretary of War; and I think the only reason which has been assigned of any weight whatever for increasing the military force of the country is in reference to Utah. For one, I am ready to vote the men and the money necessary to execute the laws and preserve the peace in that Territory, and I do not wish to stand in any other position here. I believe we shall accomplish all that is necessary by the passage of the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee authorizing the President, if he needs an additional force, to raise four thousand volunteers or any less number, to be used in the Territory of Utah. I hope the Senate will sustain that proposition.

Mr. IVERSON. The first question, I believe, is on the motion to strike out the fourth section of the original bill, and on that question I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate; and I may possibly submit some remarks on the main question, on the substitution of volunteers for an increase of the regular force, when that question comes up in its proper order.

The fourth section provides that promotions, hereafter, shall be by regiments, and not by arms of service, as heretofore. The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber and everywhere, all admit that it is founded on a correct principle. The Senator from New York has admitted that it is a correct principle, and he says that if it had been proposed to be applied at the first organization of the Army it ought to have been applied.

The Senator from Massachusetts agrees with him, and makes the same admission; and so does every Senator who has spoken. Even the Senator from Michigan has acknowledged that it is a correct principle; but he says it might operate harshly and unjustly in half a dozen cases, and therefore he objects to its application on the present occasion. If it be a correct principle, ought it not to be adopted at some time? And I ask Senators what better time can you select to adopt it than the present? If it be correct, it ought to be adopted. When is it to be adopted? Will a better time ever arrive than the present? It seems to me not; because, no matter to what extent of time the Army may go down for all time to come, the same objection will exist—that, if you adopt this principle, it will overslaugh three or four or half a dozen others who are older than those who will be promoted in regiments. That will be the argument always. There never will be a time when you can more properly adopt this principle, which every gentleman admits to be correct. All reforms necessarily must do some injustice; but are reforms never to be adopted because they necessarily carry some injustice with them? I think that, surely, is not a correct rule of action.

I do not think that much harm will be done by the application of this principle to the Army in its present condition and at the present time, if I know anything about its material. Whenever you form new regiments, the very best material is always selected to command those regiments. In relation to the new regiments formed recently, I undertake to say, notwithstanding the sneers of the Senator from Michigan, that there are no better officers in the American Army than have been put over the heads of those regiments. They have been selected with great care with reference to their skill and ability for command. Take the two regiments of cavalry—the first and second cavalry; where will you find a better set of officers in our service, or any service in the world, than compose the field and company officers of those two regiments? The gentleman now commanding in Utah, who has been selected by the President out of the whole Army to put in command of that hazardous and important expedition, is at the head of one of those regiments, the second cavalry. The officers of those two regiments, and of the infantry regiments that were formed at the same time, are men selected for their eminent ability. Some of them were taken from private life; and the same objection would apply to them that the Senator from Michigan has presented to the selection of younger officers from old regiments, to take places in the new ones.

I think that when new regiments are formed, generally speaking the material of those regiments is made up by selections out of the Army. The President has the whole field of the Army from which to select; but ordinarily, and I am very sure it is so, as far as my observation has gone, the selections made have proved eminently beneficial to the service. The way the old plan operates is this: when new regiments were formed, young officers are taken—men of science, men of talent, men of ability—young, active, and enterprising men are put in command; but if one of the officers dies, his place is taken by some old fogey who belongs to some of the old regiments, and he comes into the family of this new regiment for the purpose of disturbing them and commanding them. The officers of a regiment are a family circle as it were, and they do not want, and ought never to have, any intruder to come into it against their will and wishes. The operation of the present system is, that if any of the gallant young officers who have been selected by the President on account of extraordinary merit and put in command of new regiments, die or resign, their places are filled by old, worn-out, and superannuated veterans in the older regiments.

An instance has just occurred which illustrates the way this system works. Here were three men promoted recently, by the action of the present Senate, to the command of colonels and lieutenant colonels in some of the regiments by seniority. Those men were called upon for service for the last four or five years by the Secretary of War, who asked them to join their regiments, and the report was, invariably, "sick." They got certificates from their family physicians that they were sick, and unable to do military duty, and therefore they were excused. They are called upon this year to join their regiments, and the report is, "sick;" next year they are called upon, and the answer is, "sick;" the next year they are called upon—"sick;" until finally, by the death of some other officers in other regiments, these gentlemen happen to get promotion, and then the Secretary of War calls on them, "join your regiments; and if you do not, I will strike you from the roll." They join their regiments, but it is only for the purpose of avoiding being stricken from the rolls and to get promotion, that they are found well enough to do so.

Is it just and proper that such men, old, superannuated, and worn out, should be appointed to command? If they were truly infirm, they ought not to be put over the heads of old and energetic officers. If they were playing "possum," they ought to have been discharged from the service. That is the way this system operates. These old, superannuated, worn-out men, who are either infirm absolutely, or pretending to be sick so as to shirk duty, are now by your system put over the heads of superior young, active, energetic officers, who are in those regiments. Once commence the plan proposed by the fourth section of this bill, and after you get rid of a few of the old men, it will go on and work well, and then promotion in each regiment will take place in the regiment. That is a system which I think every gentleman concedes to be a proper one if you select a proper time to commence it. I think there is no more proper time than the present, and I trust the section will not be stricken out.

Mr. STUART. I wish to state some facts on this subject which have been communicated to me. It will be remembered that the other day I moved to strike out the fourth section, but withdrew the motion for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Virginia to offer his substitute. Perhaps the best comment that can be made is an illustration contained in a letter to me:

"The senior major of infantry entered the service in 1824, has been a major since 1850, and is, of course, now the first for promotion, having ten colonels, and ten lieutenant colonels to make a vacancy for him, while by the fourth section of the bill he can only be promoted by a vacancy occurring in the place of colonel or lieutenant colonel in his own regiment. The senior major of the ninth infantry, who is fourteenth on the list of majors, entered the Army in 1837, was promoted a major by selection in 1855, and under the present system would not be promoted to a lieutenant colonel in less than eight or ten years; but if this bill passes, his chance for promotion will be as good as that of the senior major, and he may be promoted before all who now rank him. The senior captain of infantry entered the Army in 1829, was promoted to be captain in 1840; and there are now forty field officers to make a vacancy for him. Under the provisions of this bill he can only fill the vacancy of one of the four field officers of his own regiment. The senior captain of the tenth infantry entered the service in 1848, was promoted by selection to be captain in 1855, is now sixty-sixth on the list of captains, and, by this bill, his chance for a majority is just as good as the first captain's, and he may be promoted before him."

This communication is from an officer of great intelligence and experience; and it seems to me to present a difficulty that will exist at any time in adopting a section in this form. I, with the little military experience I have had, and it is very little, would agree that this principle might be adopted in a bill which was prepared carefully for the purpose, and without any difficulty might make exceptional cases, a few of them now, so as to enter into a general law, which might, perhaps, operate well. I am not prepared, however, to subscribe to it so fully as some gentlemen.

I think my friend from Ohio has gone a little too far when he charges upon the officers all the delinquency. They are subject to orders by the President through the Secretary of War. He may order any part of the military establishment to any particular service he chooses. It is no fault of those who are not ordered there that they do not go. He may order some to the frontier, others to our fortifications, just where in his discretion and judgment he thinks they should be. But is it just, they being all subject to this military discipline, that a system should be thrown in without exception changing the whole line of promotion in the Army? It seems to me not. It is always a matter of very great difficulty to undertake to introduce any such general revision of law as that which is proposed here. Whenever it is done, it should be done carefully. It should be done in a separate measure by itself and not thrown into a general bill increasing the Army. There may be very much in what has just been said by the Senator from Georgia, but when that argument was introduced on this floor and sought to be used with some effect in regard to inefficient officers in the Navy, it produced no effect at all.

I stand on the ground on which I stood then, and I would strike these officers from the list and send them out of the Army if they would report themselves sick when that report was untrue. I would do that same thing in the Navy, and I would do it everywhere where officers saw fit to demean themselves in that way. It is no answer, however, to the objections to this section. If there be such cases as the Senator from Georgia alludes to, let the individual thus perpetrating that sort of conduct be promptly ejected from the service; but a meritorious officer, and a meritorious set of officers, could not be in any wise injured by that species of conduct.

The simple question now is, will the Senate introduce into a bill for the temporary increase of the Army, a new system of promotions, which, upon the very face of it, is seen to produce at once the injuries alluded to in the letter which I have read? Is there any just compensation to be derived from it? Is the public service, so far as the Senate is advised, now suffering on account of the present law of promotion? Not that we are advised of. It is only an opinion put forth that this principle is a better one than the one which now exists, as a principle. I am not prepared to concede the argument of the Senator from Georgia, that everything which is true in principle ought to be promptly adopted. I think that the experience in legislation which the honorable Senator himself has had, will show him that that is a course of proceeding that is unsafe. Abstract principles cannot always, they cannot very frequently, be introduced at once into a general system of legislation, if they are contrary to that system, without working manifest injury. We may imitate the laws of nature in legislation, so far as we can, with great propriety. Great radical changes are accomplished, but so slowly and regularly as not in the least to disturb the harmony of the great system itself. That is the way to introduce reforms, whenever it is necessary, into any system of government—not by sudden revolution, producing disastrous consequences; but by a careful application of a great, correct principle, discreetly and prudently, and no faster than it can be done with justice.

Now, sir, inasmuch as I see no good to arise from thus changing unqualifiedly, and without saving the rights of individuals, the order of promotion in the Army, I think it better that this section should be stricken out. As I do not wish to detain the Senate unnecessarily on this subject, believing that the facts in my possession have been fairly presented, and that they are such as ought to induce the Senate, in this place, to waive the adoption of this principle, I am content.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Michigan. I do not understand him as yet to impugn the correctness of the principle. Then I ask, as the Senator from Georgia says, why not apply it? What is your Army for? Is it to accommodate the officers? Is that all? You want an efficient army; you want that army which, with the smallest number of officers and men, will accomplish the most service. That is the end to be looked at, and to do that certainly all military experience shows that a rivalry between regiments, emulation, and identification of officers with regiments, will give you the most efficient military corps.

Now, sir, what is your present system? As I stated before, you promote by companies within the regiment, you promote by lieutenants from the grade of second to first, and from that to captain. During all the most useful part of their lives, they are identified with the particular regiment, they become acquainted with the officers, with the non-commissioned officers, and with many of the privates; they are accustomed to the usages of that regiment. By and by, they are transferred to a regiment of which they do not know a single non-commissioned officer, and, perhaps, not a single one of the commissioned officers. What is the consequence? When a captain rises to the rank of major he has to learn again all that he has been learning in the regiment from which he was transferred. That is the reason why your regiments lack efficiency. It is a positive injury to the service.

Not only is the proposed change good in principle, but the present practice is as bad as the practice can be, and why should it not be changed? The Senator from Michigan says it will injure the chances of promotion. If any gentleman's vested rights are interfered with that is a question; but we do not touch a commission. We simply prevent some gentleman from getting what he hopes to get: not what he has, but what he hopes to get. What is the difficulty with every change? Whenever you propose to reform a bad practice, to cut up an abuse by the roots, you are told, if you do so, some gentleman will be prevented from obtaining what he wants. I am exactly in favor of preventing them from obtaining this. I do not wish to see a captain of the first regiment of infantry promoted to be a major in the tenth regiment. Let him stay in the first regiment, where he belongs. Let him stand with it in prosperity and adversity. If it goes into the field and distinguishes itself, let him bear a part of that distinction. If it remains in the interior of the country, free from toil, free from hardship, free from exposure, let that compensate him for the loss of his expected rank.

The Senator from Michigan says they are all subject to the orders of the Secretary of War and they ought not to be blamed for being in this place in preference to that. We all know that in the Army, as in civil life, the War Department is continually overrun with applications from officers to give them this, that, or the other desirable post. Military men are like civilians; they have no idea of doing hard work if they can help it, and they like easy posts, and they will take them if they can get them by influence over the President or Secretary. It comes back at last, as I said before, to this: will you take a regiment in the field, which has been in the field for years, and promote over the heads of all the captains in it some man who for ten or fifteen years has been staying at home or commanding one of the posts on the sea-board, and finds himself suddenly promoted to be the commander of this regiment. I think it is a gross abuse, and it ought to be remedied; and the only question is, shall it be remedied now?

The Senator from Michigan says, do not do it now; it may be very good, but put it off until to-morrow; let us have a general bill, and let us look into the thing. That will be the argument to the end of time, and it will always be so. Now is the time; now you have the subject before you. If you intend to pass the bill for volunteers it is not material; but if you intend to pass the original bill to add new companies to the regiments, now is the time to make this reorganization of the Army. It will add more efficiency to the Army of the United States than all your thirty companies. It will give them more vigor, more life, more emulation. It will put new courage and new spirit into the live officers of your Army to let them see that they have a chance of promotion, instead of being forever overslaughed by those officers who are not disposed to do their duty in the field. I say, in my judgment, if the original bill is to pass, this is the best section in it; and I would be in favor of this section if no other part of it be retained.

We know the fact that at the time of the Mexican war many of our regiments were commanded in the field by the fourth or fifth captain—its field officers and three or four of its senior captains reporting themselves unable for duty. They took all the pay. They did not perform the duty. It was performed by the junior officers. I have seen lieutenants with gray heads, grayer than any I see in the Senate Chamber; and I say that that is the fault of the system. The Army is weighed down by that incubus; and the only way I see to remedy it, is as the Committee on Military Affairs now propose.

We hear a great deal about the righteousness of promotion by seniority. We all know why it has been adopted in our service. It is an objectionable system; but, all things considered, in time of peace and time of war together, it offers less ground of controversy. It is not the system in all other armies. It is not the best system. In time of war it is the worst system. I believe that in the French army half the promotions only are by seniority, and the rest by order of merit. But it will be the same thing: a man who has been twenty years a major will insist that he shall be the next lieutenant colonel, although he may not be half as well qualified for it as some captain in the line.

How was it in the Mexican war? You took Zachary Taylor, colonel of the eighth infantry, brevet brigadier general, and you made him a major general, over the head of twenty of his seniors, and you were rewarded for it. You took a man of true military genius and ability, and it redounded to the honor of the country. So it will be as often as you act in that spirit.

It is to counteract the evils of the system of promotion by seniority, that brevets have been introduced into the Army, and they have been a pregnant source of quarrel. The only reason that I have always been in favor of the system of brevets, was that they were necessary to counteract the evils of promotion by seniority.

How do you now get at it? You take a captain: if he stays in his own regiment he only ranks as a captain below one of those majors of twenty or thirty years' standing, who has never rendered any particular service; but this captain distinguishes himself, and you give him a brevet as a major, as a lieutenant colonel, and finally as a colonel; and then you assign him to his brevet rank—for what period? To take him out of the line; to take him from under the command of this piece of antiquity, who is set there to repress his energies and to overrule his judgment; and thus it is that our Army is a continual scene of quarrel. You confer brevets for merit, and you are keeping up a continual disturbance and dispute between the officers by brevet and the officers by seniority; and I do not see any way to get rid of it, unless you adopt the system either of the French army, of making half the promotions by order of merit, and the other half by seniority; or adopt the proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs, to make all promotions by regiments. Let an officer, when he enters a regiment, know that that is the place in which he is to stay until he goes out of the service; that all his fame, all his glory, all his service is identified with the name and the flag of that regiment; and then you will see the officers endeavoring to promote the honor of the military families to which they belong; and to raise the credit and the character of the regiment, instead of engaging in a perpetual squabble as to when they shall be promoted over the head of somebody else.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not intend to make any remarks upon the subject before the Senate, but it seems to me rather extraordinary that armies should have existed for such a length of time, under so many able heads as we have had over them in the United States, without a suggestion of this kind for the perfection of army organization ever having been made before. At any rate, if such a suggestion has been made, I am not aware of it. When there is certainly no particular urgency for a modification of the law in this respect, it is strange that it should be brought forward on this occasion. I shall not refer to the temporary character of this bill, but I go upon general principle that there is no necessity for any change in the present system of promotion. If a change is necessary, that necessity must have been of such long continuance that I am satisfied it would have been discovered long ago if it really existed. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs was Secretary of War for one presidential term, and it seems that it then never suggested itself to his mind, and perhaps never would have done so if it had originated with the rationale of the Army.

Mr. IVERSON. I beg leave to state to the Senator from Texas, that he is mistaken when he supposes that this reform was not suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs when he was Secretary of War. He carried it out in the formation of the new regiments; for, when the two regiments of mounted troops were raised, he caused them to be designated cavalry instead of dragoons, so that promotions should not take place out of the dragoons into the cavalry. In those regiments the promotions are by regiments and not by arms of service.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not astonished at that, because they were utterly useless; and any rule applied to them cannot be considered as an example of justice. I believe the cavalry formed part of the four new regiments.

Mr. IVERSON. There are two new regiments of cavalry and two of infantry.

Mr. HOUSTON. Promotions are not by regiments, as I understand, but by corps.

Mr. IVERSON. They are now, among the mounted troops.

Mr. HOUSTON. They are promoted now by corps.

Mr. IVERSON. No, by regiments.

Mr. HOUSTON. Perhaps that was a pet idea of the late Secretary of War, and it is necessary to remodel the whole military system in accordance with it; but still, that does not inculcate on my mind the necessity of conforming to that precedent. If gentlemen are called from their regiments who, by long service, are entitled to a majority or a colonelcy in another regiment, I do not think there is any great misfortune in that. It may be that in some cases they may not be so competent as a captain might accidentally happen to be who would be entitled to promotion under other circumstances in the regiment; but there is an equal chance that he will be as well qualified as the other. It is man against man, and no more; and he is as liable to be perfectly competent as the captain would be if promoted to a majority, to say nothing of his additional experience. So it is with the major, or any other field officer.

I cannot see that any advantage would be gained by confining the promotions of field officers to the regiments in which vacancies may occur; but, on the other hand, by pursuing that course manifest injustice would be done to officers who, although you may say they have no vested rights, have yet reasonable expectations under the system under which they came into the service. To be sure, it is subject to modification by Congress at any time; but still, they had a right to expect that for faithful service they would receive certain rewards upon certain contingencies; and I think it would be unjust to them now, suddenly, when there is no necessity for it, to change a system that has been of such long duration, that has worked so well and so successfully heretofore, and under which the respectability of the present military establishment has grown up.

Here let me say that, although I have been charged with having detracted from the Army, I believe my appreciation of it is very just, and I think it has respectability and character. I believe it is composed of as respectable gentlemen as are in the United States. I have objected to an increase of the Army, not on account of the unworthiness of its officers, but because of the expense, the inexpediency, the danger of such an increase. I have always entertained a just appreciation of the respectability of the officers, and have voted in this body for an increase of their pay, to allow them to surround themselves with the comforts and conveniences required by their position. It is to maintain the respectability of the Army, and not to disappoint the just expectations of meritorious officers, nor to subject them to caprice, that I am in favor of striking out this section. I maintain that, if you promote under the present system, you will be quite as likely to get good and efficient men for the high grades, as you will be if you confine promotion in each regiment to the officers of that regiment. When officers have given their years, and have been willing to give their lives, to the service of their country, I do not think it should be a crime that they become old. I do not think young aspirants, who have never on any occasion fleshed their maiden swords, should be preferred to them. Throw more duty, if you please, on the young and vigorous, and give some respite to age, if it be necessary; but give them all their just reward for faithful service and for valorous deeds.

I am not for postponing men if they are entitled to a position in the service. Give them the promotion to which they are entitled. You may call them old fogies, or old veterans, or what you please; but give them the reward of merit. As for your brevets, I am proud to say that though I served five years in the regular Army of the United States, I never received one. Whether I deserved it or not is another question; but certainly I never received it, and I am proud of it. Why? Because I have seen the practice prostituted; I have seen men breveted during the last war who never saw an enemy in their lives, and I have known men of distinguished merit who never received a brevet, and yet had not only offered their lives and given their blood, but their limbs, to their country. It is a system of partiality and favoritism, and the very lackeys who hang about the generals-in-chief are the men who receive brevets—men who are screened from the shock of battle and ensconced behind favoritism. I have no respect, therefore, for brevets. I know that gentlemen sometimes receive them who deserve them well; but the most deserving are not those who are most fortunate in obtaining them. It is a system that I would put down. I would brevet no man except for service on the field of battle, as knighthood was received from the royal touch on the field, and then I would only brevet for deeds that would attract and electrify the Army.

When brevets are thus acquired, you give a stimulus to gallantry on the field of battle—you create a spirit of daring that will be terrible to your adversary; but when they are obtained by favoritism, by skulking, through political influences and agencies, they are a disgrace, and in the end will honor you as little as they will them. But I can see no earthly necessity for this change in the system of the Army, and of promotion, and therefore I shall oppose it, leaving things where they have stood for nearly a century, and where they have operated well, and where there is no necessity shown for this change. Show that there is a necessity for it, that benefits will result from it generally, that it will create harmony and efficiency in the ranks of the Army, and I will then be prepared to vote for it; but not till then. Whilst it inflicts injustice on a single individual, I will oppose it as much as though it inflicted wrong on fifty or one hundred. It is the principle that I do not sanction, and I will not do it.

Mr. HAMLIN. The debate on this matter has been so very brief that I do not apprehend the Senate are sufficiently well informed to vote either on this amendment or on the bill. It ought to be discussed at length; it ought to be presented to the Senate in a variety of modes, so that we can be presumed to act with some intelligence. Laboring under a severe headache to-day, as I do, I ask the Senate to adjourn. I make a motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MARYLAND CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the motion made yesterday, by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered upon the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested-election case from the fourth congressional district of Maryland.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Boyce, Branch, Bratton, Buffinton, Burroughs, Cane, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clingan, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curry, Curtis, Durrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Robert Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Woodson—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Bacoock, Bowie, Bryan, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cockrell, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Devant, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Greenwood, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Montgomery, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Rufin, Sandidge, Seales, Searing, Seward, Singleton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Ward, Warren, White, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—68.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Pending the call,

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, stated that, had he been in the House when his name was called, he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. READY stated that his colleague, Mr. ZOLLICOFFER, was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MAYNARD asked permission to vote, stating that he was detained in his committee room until after his name was called.

Objection was made.

Mr. GILMER made a similar request, for the same reason.

Objection was made.

Mr. BARKSDALE stated that, had he been in the Hall when his name was called, he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, previous to the announcement of the vote, said: I desire, before the vote is announced, to propound a question to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] I ask that gentleman whether he suggested the calling of the previous question?

Mr. CLINGMAN. In what case?

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. On this Maryland contested-election case, and after my colleague had expressed a desire to address the House?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand that the previous question has already been ordered. I believe it was not upon my motion. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered yesterday, I believe.

The SPEAKER. They were.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. That is not an answer to my question. If the gentleman is disposed, he can answer it. I desire to know whether he suggested that the previous question should be called by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I did not suggest it to Mr. WASHBURN. I voted for it, and I thought it should be called. I do not understand why the gentleman makes the inquiry of me.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. With the permission of the House, I will explain why.

[Renewed cries of "Order!"]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I cannot hear anything that is said; and I object.

Several MEMBERS. Let it go on; it can do no harm.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the House will allow the gentleman to ask his questions, and make his explanations.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The result of the vote, as above recorded, was then announced.

The SPEAKER. The majority of the committee reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the memorialist for the appointment of a committee to take testimony.

And the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who submitted the minority report, moves as an amendment to that, the following:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses and evidence in the case of the contested election of the Hon. H. Winter Davis, from the fourth congressional district of Maryland.

The question now is upon the amendment.

Mr. BOWIE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 86, nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Abl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cokerill, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Goode, Groesbeck, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, MacLay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scates, Sealing, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, White, Wortendyke, and Augustus B. Wright—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Woodson—110.

So the amendment was rejected.

Pending the vote,

Mr. WALDRON stated that Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, was detained in his room by illness.

The question recurred on the resolution reported from the majority of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty, noes not counted.

So (more than one fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hoard, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Woodson, and John V. Wright—115.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Abl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cokerill, Corning, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, MacLay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scates, Sealing, Shorter, Singleton, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Wortendyke, and Augustus B. Wright—89.

So the resolution was adopted.

Pending the vote,

Mr. HUGHES stated that Mr. GREGG was detained from the House in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that his colleague, Mr. CLARK, of New York, was confined to his house by sickness.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, its Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 18) for the reception of Vice Admiral Mehmed Pasha, of the Turkish navy, and to facilitate the objects of his mission in superintending the construction of a vessel of war in the United States; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have yielded the floor for nearly two weeks for questions of privilege. Mine is a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio rises to a question of privilege, it will take precedence of a privileged question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The question is whether I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state the purpose for which he rose.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, in making that motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the House that the appropriation bills are now ready for action, and I hope that—

Mr. SEWARD. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I object to the gentleman from Georgia interrupting me every time I get the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has a right to interpose the objection that this matter is not debatable. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] will state what is his question of privilege.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is this: my veracity is,

I think, involved in the truthfulness of a statement which I made to the House. I send to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a short extract from the application which I made to the House, through the Committee of Elections, to take further testimony in reference to my right to a seat here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Unless it is strictly a question of privilege, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear from the gentleman from Ohio on what particular ground he assumes that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. CAMPBELL. An issue is presented involving my veracity. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a statement.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I object, unless it is a question of privilege.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that my character for veracity is involved. I will not consume more than five minutes.

Many MEMBERS. Let us hear it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I renew my motion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Ohio. I think it is due to him that he should have the opportunity he desires.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I dislike exceedingly to make any objection, and I am not in the habit of doing so; but I have been obliged to wait here for the last ten days under privileged questions and questions of special committees. However, as gentlemen all round me wish me to withdraw my objection, and as the gentleman from Ohio says he will occupy but a few minutes, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SHORTER. I renew the objection. I suppose that the statement which the gentleman from Ohio wishes to make, has reference to the contest for his seat.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I renew my motion.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to permit me to offer some joint resolutions from the State of Kentucky, that they may be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must decline to yield the floor for any purpose.

Mr. HOUSTON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 151, nays 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Abl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bocock, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Burnett, Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, Lovejoy, MacLay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Morrill, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scates, Sealing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Walton, Ward, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus B. Wright, and John V. Wright—151.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Bennett, Blair, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Comins, Covode, Damrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Eustis, Gooch, Howard, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Howard, Jenkins, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Leiter, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Ricard, Robbins, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, William Stewart, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, and Wilson—48.

Pending the vote,

Mr. CAMPBELL stated that as he desired to facilitate the business of the House, he would change his vote, and vote "ay."

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said: I desire to say that I voted against the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Ohio an opportunity to be heard. He desires, however, to go into committee. I will now change my vote, and vote "ay."

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.)

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, the first bill on the Calendar is, I believe, a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. As we have passed the Senate bill for the same purpose, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I prefer, for the present, to take these bills up in the order in which they occur on the Calendar. The next is a bill (H. R. No. 5) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859. The bill is a long one, and is drawn up strictly in accordance with treaty stipulations and the provisions of law. It is not susceptible of amendment or alteration without modifying treaties or changing laws. I shall therefore ask that, by unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it may be read by clauses.

There being no objection, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with; and the first clause was then read for amendments, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes.

For the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, viz:

For the pay of superintendents of Indian affairs, and of the several Indian agents, per act of 5th June, 1850, 28th September, 1850, 27th February, 1851, 3d March, 1852, 3d March, 1853, 31st July, 1854, 3d March, 1855, 18th August, 1856, and 3d March, 1857, $66,250.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated that the bill now before the committee is one which will not admit of any amendment, unless it is by modification of a treaty or repeal of an existing law. We have already reached the month of February, and have passed but a single appropriation bill. There are nine on the Calendar already for the action of this committee and the House, and as there is an ample field for any latitude of debate which the House may choose to embark in, I am very anxious that the committee shall take up this bill, act upon it, and report it to the House, when another may be immediately taken up. My great object is to dispatch, as rapidly as possible, the public business, by the passage of these appropriation bills. At the same time, as I am well aware that a number of gentlemen are anxious to debate, not the question before the committee, but other questions, and as I have no disposition whatever to gag debate, or attempt to restrain it, except within reasonable limits, I give notice here that I shall not to-day, nor perhaps to-morrow, ask to have the debate on this bill closed; but I will ask the House at an early day to terminate the debate upon this bill within a reasonable period. I wish to say, that in doing so, I have no disposition to stop debate upon other questions, but simply that it shall proceed upon each of the other bills as it comes up, so that a portion of the time devoted to debate upon questions not before the House, may be taken upon each appropriation bill.

A motion was made, a few days ago, to hold night sessions, for the purpose of what is generally called Buncombe debate, and to confine the debate at other sessions of the committee to the questions immediately under consideration. That resolution failed, and I do not wish now to check the freedom of debate; but gentlemen will accomplish their entire object if they will, after allowing the general debate to go on for a day or two upon subjects not strictly before the House, allow the debate to be stopped, and the bill to be reported to the House and passed. We can then again immediately go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and take up another appropriation bill, upon which the same privilege of debate can be enjoyed.

KANSAS AFFAIRS—SLAVERY.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, conforming to a practice not unusual in this House, I shall pass by the immediate subject that now claims the attention of the committee, and shall proceed at once to the advocacy of the admission of Kansas into the Union with what is generally styled the Lecompton constitution. Kansas has become as "a thrice-told tale, vexing the dull ear of a drowsy man;" and yet it ranks in importance all other questions before this Congress. The peace and tranquillity of the country, the harmony of the Democratic party, and above all, the future policy which the dominant section of this country will foreshadow, if not establish, by their action on this subject towards the weaker section, are grave and momentous questions involved in this controversy, the proper adjustment of which is of the deepest concern to the patriot and statesman; this adjustment can be effected by the immediate admission of Kansas.

Kansas has occupied so prominent a position in Congress, and before the country, since its territorial organization; so much has been said and written of crimination and recrimination between the different parties—has been made by fanatics and demagogues the fruitful mother of discord, even to kindling the flames of civil war, that it is difficult to discuss the various issues growing out of that Territory without indulging in bitterness and reproach. Not so with myself. I am not "nursing my wrath to keep it warm." I have no pent-up fires seeking an outlet.

I would sooner ask a truce in this imbroglio, as the newspapers style it, for the moment, until we can reason together calmly and deliberately, as becomes the Representatives of the people, intent on truth and justice alone. We are told in the sacred writings that "a soft answer turneth away wrath;" and I am sure that the absence of passion is necessary to the proper investigation of any proposition about which the human intellect may differ. We all have indigenous ideas—ideas that derive their coloring from the influence of our particular locality; but we should never allow them to become so intensified by prejudice that truth cannot always overcome and vanquish error. I deeply regret that there is a difference of opinion in the ranks of the northern Democracy on this question; and it is to them, in a spirit of kindness, that I would address myself, there not being a single member of either branch of Congress from the North, outside of the Democratic party, to whom the South could appeal in behalf of her constitutional rights. Who does not know that it would be a work of supererogation to appeal to the Republican party? Though one were to rise from the charnel-house of death, and speak as never man spake, he could not make the least imprint upon their obdurate political consciences.

The principal objections urged by that portion of the Democracy who oppose the admission of Kansas may be summed up under two heads: first, that there was "no enabling act" of Congress, authorizing the Territorial Legislature to call a convention for the purpose of framing a constitution, preparatory to its admission as a State; and, secondly, that the constitution, as an entirety, was not submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to examine these two objections in the order in which they are stated.

This is said to be a progressive age. New principles and ideas are being constantly evolved in science and ethics, and why not in politics? If we advance as rapidly in the next decade as we have in the last, in the usurpation of power by Congress, not warranted by the Constitution, or consistent with the inalienable rights of American freemen, as is contended for by a certain party, who can say that not only the Territories, but the States themselves, will require the assent of Congress to change or amend their own organic law? What, sir, is an enabling act? It is defined, I believe, by political lexicographers, to be simply giving the assent of Congress to an organized Territory to throw off its territorial form, and to frame its organic law, with a view to admission on an equal footing with the other States. I do not think the objection can be urged with any force against this application; since the very terms of the Kansas-Nebraska act provide that the people of the Territories shall have exclusive jurisdiction and control over their own domestic affairs, not conflicting in any way with the Federal Constitution.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois said in the Senate, in July, 1856, that "all power which it is competent or possible for Congress to confer on the Territorial Legislature is conferred by that act;" and yet that same Senator now stands in a position asking Congress to confer still further power. It will not be denied, unless it be done by the advocate of unadulterated squatter sovereignty, that the people cannot exercise this control until they come to make their organic law; then the language of the act, "it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory, or prohibit it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their own domestic affairs in their own way, subject only to the Federal Constitution," contemplated that the people would form and regulate their own institutions in their own way, without any further legislative permission from Congress; that is, make their constitution, and prepare to put on the dignity and sovereignty of a State, and ask of Congress that the door of admission be opened. This Kansas has done. What need, then, had Kansas for an enabling act, when the law of her territorial birth declared that she had the power already to do that which an enabling act only authorized her to do? Did the patriots of the Revolution require an enabling act from George III. to ordain this their Government, or was the Declaration of Independence sufficient authority? Congress becomes a tyrant when it transcends its own legal authority and powers.

But is an "enabling act" necessary to the admission of a State? In other words, has Congress the right to refuse a State admission, simply because its assent has not been previously given? In order to answer this question satisfactorily, it is necessary to inquire where the sovereignty with which a new State is invested resides during its territorial pupillage. Does it reside in the States of this Confederacy, or the people thereof? If so, how do they proceed to confer it upon the new State? It cannot be with them, else it would forever remain with them for it has no mode of egress. Does it rest with Congress? The Democratic party has not taught it in its creed; the Supreme Court has decided that it did not; for if it did, then could Congress force any sort of laws, however obnoxious, upon the people of a Territory. Where, then, I ask, does it reside? I answer, with the people of the Territories, restrained only by the Constitution. Sovereignty, though in a latent form, resides with the people, and they alone are the tribunal to decide when they will prepare to be recognized by Congress as a political community clothed with the attributes of State sovereignty. It is not for Congress to suggest. Congress has the power to admit or reject. It may judge whether there is sufficient population to justify admission—whether the constitution is republican in form; but that optionary power does not require the Territory to ask the assent of Congress before it can proceed to organize itself as a State.

I would remark, in that connection, that I totally dissent from the doctrine which is beginning to find supporters among that class of public men in this country who are called national men—but who would be better denominated consolidationists or centralizers—that the people of a State or of any political government can alter, amend, or annul, their organic law, except in the mode prescribed by itself, which is the supreme law; or by appealing to the sacred right of revolution, when a government is obnoxious, tyrannical, and offensive.

It is no time for southern men to embrace a doctrine which, sooner or later, may be commended as a "poisoned chalice to our own lips." I hold that the people of Kansas, who made this constitution, are the only legal authority in the Territory, and, as such, embody the sovereignty of the Territory or State; while those who oppose it are lawless rebels and outlaws, who are acting outside of the law, and consequently are the representatives, not of a political sovereignty, but of mere brute force. The law, in this Government, is our shield and protection. It is intended to defend the rights of the minority; the majority can take care of itself. It is for this reason that I cling to the Federal Constitution with a reverence that amounts almost to idolatry. Our whole system admirably balances and adjusts the relative rights of the majority and minority, and is especially illustrated by the respective powers of the two Houses of Congress. For instance, Delaware and Rhode Island, in this House, are overshadowed and overpowered by the superior force of numbers from New York and Pennsylvania. Here their power is unequal, except in the accidental emergency which may devolve upon this House to elect a President of the United States. In that case the rights of the minority are protected. But, if you would see those rights fully vindicated, turn your eye to the Senate Chamber, and the voice of Delaware is as potent as that of the colossal State in the enactment of law. She sits there encircled and enrobed in all the queenly dignity of sovereignty—clothed with equal rights and privileges with the proudest of the sisterhood. The law of the Constitution is her shield, her panoply; and beneath it she reposes in conscious security. After a people have once established a constitution, and prescribed the forms and rules by which it may be altered or amended, I hold that to proceed to such alteration or amendment in any other manner than the one prescribed would be revolutionary. They would have no more right to do so, than posterity would have the right to repudiate the honest and legal contracts of its predecessors. If the people of a State have the right to upset and overturn a government without regard to the mode prescribed by law, why have not the people of the United States, by a popular vote, the right to upset and overturn the Federal Constitution, and build upon its sacred ruins a structure suited to the taste of the majority? And does any man doubt, if that were done to-day, the character of government that would be substituted? Does any man suppose that the spirit of compromise and sacred regard for the rights of the weaker, that animated our fathers—a Washington, a Hancock, an Adams, and a Jefferson—would enter into the councils of these latter-day statesmen and patriots? Never!

But it is alleged that an "enabling act" is necessary to the regularity of the admission of Kansas.

There can be but one mode of correctly judging of this "regularity" idea, and that is to conform to the practice of the Government. What is that practice? The history of the admission of new States establishes no rule; for, out of the eighteen new States that have been admitted into the great family of the thirteen old original revolutionary States, there have been only nine admitted with constitutions framed under express permission of Congress. They are Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, and Wisconsin. So it seems, that if to be "regular"—that is, to conform to the precedents which the history of the admission of new States furnishes—Kansas could have followed either rule; that is, she could first have obtained the assent of Congress before framing her constitution, or have proceeded without it; and, in either case, she would have been in the "line of safe precedence"—she would have been "regular." Since there has been so much excitement, unnecessarily forced by the Abolitionists upon the country, in regard to Kansas; and since the original object of the Kansas and Nebraska bill was to remove this entire subject of domestic government from the halls of congressional legislation to the people of the Territories, I submit if this is not rather a late day to assume a position of hostility to the admission of Kansas upon a mere technicality, and when that technicality is wholly unsupported by the practice of the Government; for the practice of the Government has been as uniform in vibrating back and to from the "enabling-act" policy, to its opposite, as the seasons of summer and winter have followed each other, or that day follows night.

I now propose to notice the other objection, namely, that this constitution was not referred to the people for their ratification or rejection. This is the main ground of opposition.

I beg leave just here to remark, that I was opposed in my canvass for the seat I occupy upon this floor by a gentleman who voted in the Thirty-Third Congress against the Kansas and Nebraska bill. Of course I arraigned him upon that vote, upon the ground that it was, as I conceive, in direct conflict with the rights, interests, and the equality of the southern with the northern or free States. In the progress of the discussion between us upon the slavery question, reference was made to the anticipated action of the Lecompton convention, when I assumed the ground that I was in favor of having, if the people desired it, a direct vote upon this vexatious question—slavery; provided it could be done in accordance with the doctrine of non-intervention, as contained in the Kansas and Nebraska bill.

This was in advance of the assembling of the convention. I am well satisfied that to vote to refer the Lecompton constitution back to the people and demand their indorsement of it as necessary to admission, would be a palpable violation of the doctrine of non-intervention, and of the rights of the people of Kansas. It would be virtually a repeal of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and set its great American principle practically at naught. But had it been consonant with that principle, I should unhesitatingly have stood up here in my place, as a Representative, and voted to refer the Lecompton constitution to the popular vote of Kansas. I am for carrying out the will of the majority of Kansas when lawfully expressed. The Lecompton constitution is their lawful will. When the delegates were elected, the people knew that the convention could submit the constitution or not, for Governor Stanton so informed them during the canvass. Governor Walker apprised them of the same thing, and was guilty of the interference of giving executive advice to the people of Kansas; thus endeavoring to prevent them from "regulating their own affairs in their own way."

The convention had full power to submit this constitution or not, as they chose. If Congress had the power, and were legitimately to exercise it, to reject this constitution, and demand a vote upon it by the people, it would be mere child's play; ay, it would be worse. It would be yielding to the fanatical and lawless spirit which has characterized everything that has been done by the free-State party of that Territory, composed, as it is, of straggling hordes of hired emissaries, carrying murder, rapine, and conflagration in their train. It seems that their only effort has been to experiment how far justice and law may be disregarded and trampled under foot with impunity.

The only question in all this Kansas controversy, between the Abolitionists and the friends of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, North and South, is the right of the people of the Territory to tolerate slavery in their organic law or not, as they might prefer. That was the question that we referred to, and it was the only one that we had any ground to suppose would be contested that was likely to be embraced in the constitution. It has been submitted, without any mandate from Congress, by order of the convention, to the people, on the 21st of December last, giving them a fair and legal opportunity to decide for themselves this great right at their own appointed time and in their own way.

I rejoice at the decision of the convention, and I commend the wisdom of its course, while I have, on the other hand, had it acted differently, no right to complain, as it is the exclusive privilege of that body to exercise supreme jurisdiction over the whole matter.

Kansas is following the example that has been set her by a majority of the States of this Union—their conventions having declined or failed to submit their constitutions to the vote of the people.

If the object is to secure to the people of Kansas the control of their own affairs, I submit if that object cannot be better effected by clothing Kansas with the authority of a State, than by continuing its territorial form, subject, whether properly or improperly, to the supervisory control of Congress?

But it is argued that the free-State men did not vote at that election. That is not the fault of the convention, but their own fault, and is but another stone to heighten the pyramid of folly that marks the history of that party in that Territory. Their failure to vote is not only their own fault, but, what is worse still, is a crime! for the failure was intended to operate as a check upon the action of Congress in the admission of Kansas into the Union, with the sole view of furnishing capital to the freedom shriekers in another presidential election. It was a crime against the peace of this Union. It was a crime against the spirit and genius of our free institutions—against the most sacred boon bequeathed us by our fathers, the elective franchise. It is not only the prerogative, but the duty, of every American citizen to vote; for he is a part of sovereignty; for suppose every man were to fail to vote at our elections, then the Government would be at an end. It was a crime against their own cause—against posterity, whose interests are intrusted to their hands. It was a crime against those who did vote; for the validity of their action, although in obedience to law, has, in consequence, been since denied.

It will not do to say the constitution was not ratified. If I fail to vote I only transfer my political power in the Government to my neighbor who does vote. I clip from the Washington Union of the 29th of January an extract, which I think presents this phase of the case in a very strong light. The editor says:

"The two elections in Kansas on the 21st of December last, and the 4th instant, show conclusively that a large majority of the people of that Territory have either approved the Lecompton constitution directly, or indicated their acquiescence in it for the purpose of securing the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State. At the first election 6,712 votes were cast in its favor, being the apparent Democratic party strength. At the second, held under the constitution, about 7,000 votes were cast by the 'free-State' party for their State ticket. It appears, therefore, that a total of 13,712 voters have distinctly committed themselves to the constitution."

But, sir, I take higher ground still. I assert, sir, that the leaders of the free-State party of Kansas, with Lane at their head, and all who follow his counsel, are lawless rebels; and that to recognize their opposition to this constitution as exhibited in their failure to vote, as well as in their illegal voting under the direction of Stanton's Legislature, would be to disregard the people who stand by the laws and Constitution, and to set up mobocracy and rebellion.

Then, sir, the only question in the Lecompton constitution which was distracting the political parties of this country, and which was discussed seriously before the people of Kansas, in the election of delegates to the convention, as the history of that canvass shows, was submitted without being clogged with any other proposition. The question was, the "constitution with slavery," or the "constitution without slavery"—that is, that no part of the constitution was submitted except the slavery clause. This is obvious from the reading of the seventh section of the schedule. It commences thus: "This constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States at its next ensuing session." This is an independent and imperative proposition, depending upon no conditions or contingencies. If it had been ordered to be submitted, and had been voted down by the people, how could it have been submitted to Congress? This is a great error into which some have fallen, and upon it assumed that this constitution is not republican in form. Had the whole constitution been submitted to the people, then there might have been various other questions which would have interfered with this particular one. The object of the convention was to frame a republican form of government, and to settle this one particular perplexing question in a manner which would admit of no doubt as to the views of the people: acknowledging the power, and leaving it with the people to alter, modify, annul, or reconstruct hereafter, their organic law in the manner and form prescribed and pointed out in their constitution.

Had the whole constitution been submitted, might not the free-State men—whose object has ever been to agitate—have complained that the all-absorbing subject of interest to them had been made to depend upon other, and not kindred subjects; that the clause tolerating slavery had been associated with the questions of currency, lands, internal improvements, schools, banks, &c.?

I think that the Republicans who have made such a noise in the country about slavery in Kansas, after the election of the 21st of December, and especially since the free-State party have acquiesced in the Lecompton constitution, and acknowledged its legality by participating in the election of officers on the 4th of January, with the view of organizing their State government, should feel rebuked, and their complainings should now cease. The Republican party in Congress are estopped in their crusade against the Lecompton constitution by the action of their friends in Kansas.

The northern Democrats who have intimated their intention of voting against this constitution, claim that they have not raised the issue of slavery alone. They contend for the submission of the whole constitution to the people, as well on one ground as upon another, whether it tolerates or prohibits slavery; because, as they argue, that in so doing they best carry out the principles of popular sovereignty, as they understand them, as originally enunciated in the act organizing the Territory. I must confess that I do not see in this a justification; but, perhaps, I may not justly appreciate the force of the argument. They contend that they were the original friends of popular sovereignty; that they met the storm when in its wildest and most terrific form; that they nobly came to the rescue in 1854, when, to all appearances, the fury of the blast must sweep everything before it; that they are, and ever have been, ready to vote for the admission of Kansas, as they aver, with or without slavery, whenever she presents herself, having previously voted upon, and ratified by the popular will, her constitution; that there is a wide difference between them and the Republican party; that, while they are not controlled in their action by a reference to slavery at all, the Republicans, though every man, woman, and child in Kansas should desire that the institution be tolerated, would unhesitatingly refuse her admission, though that refusal should slough her off, were it possible, into an independent and foreign State. This is refining too much for our homespun understandings. It is poor comfort to the South; it is the apology which the hangman makes to the doomed criminal, when he adjusts the halter; it is keeping the word of promise to the ear, but breaking it to the hope.

Now what is the difference between Mr. Buchanan's position and the northern Democrats, who oppose his views? It is this: while the President expected and preferred that the constitution, as a whole, should have been submitted to the people, nevertheless he favors admission, as the only question about which there was any controversy has been referred to them. The President thinks that the convention was legally authorized to make a constitution; that it was optional with the convention to submit any part, or all, or none of that constitution, except the slavery clause, contending that the language of the territorial act required the convention to submit the question of slavery to the people; while those who differ contend that the language referred to requires the whole constitution to be submitted to the people. I am with the President, except that while I prefer and rejoice that the slavery question has been submitted, yet I do not think that there is anything in the territorial act obligatory or imperative. It was entirely optional with the convention.

This is a representative Government; it is suu generis; no other nation, either of ancient or modern times, so perfectly embodies the representative principle. It is our boast that all power is inherent in the people, and that our public officers are at last but our public servants. For convenience and practicability we delegate that power to chosen ones for specified purposes, to act as our servants or agents.

Now, there is no rule of law better established, and the validity of which is more universally acknowledged, than that whatever is done by a duly and legally-authorized agent, the principal is bound. It is especially true when applied to our political polity. We are emphatically a representative Government, as before observed. What we do here in Congress, our constituency, through us, have done. We are the medium, so to speak, through which they communicate one with another, and to the world. Sir, will it be contended that the convention was not duly authorized to make a constitution? The proof is abundant on that point. They were legally elected; they were clothed with sovereignty—that sovereignty which lay dormant or in a residuary form until it was vitalized by the action of the people, and conferred upon their delegates. It was in their sovereign capacity that they sent this their solemn organic law for their future government, that we might in due form initiate her into the great sisterhood of States, and that we might bespangle our banner with another star answering to the young and virgin State of Kansas. Shall she be admitted or not upon terms of equality? The Constitution says that Congress may admit new States when their form of government is republican. Have we any option, without doing violence to the spirit at least of that sacred instrument which we have all sworn to support?

But to the difference. All are in favor of popular sovereignty in the Territories as declared in the Kansas-Nebraska bill. We think that the convention embodied this doctrine; that its action was the action of the people. But, says the distinguished author of the bill of 1854, "no, the people must speak and vote." Well, the people did vote; and they declare to us through the convention, the highest and most authoritative tribunal through which their wishes can be made known, that this constitution is the work of their chosen agents, and therefore their own. Then it becomes a question, not, say they, (if we allow to each other honest motives,) of principle, so much as a question of fact. There is no legal information before Congress that this constitution is not the voice of the majority of the people of Kansas. We must not go behind the law or proceed outside of the pale of the law. We all agree that no men or set of men—that Congress and the combined powers and energies of this great Government—can force a system of laws, a political government, upon the people of Kansas against their will, without first violating the territorial act of 1854, and every principle which underlies the whole federative system.

In a spirit of kindness, may I not inquire of our party friends on this floor who differ with us, if they are not going behind the principle of non-interference, when they refuse to accept this constitution as it came legally and regularly to them from the duly constituted tribunal; but propose to dictate to the people what manner and form shall be observed in the framing of their own government? Call you that leaving it to the people "to form and regulate their own affairs in their own way," or would it not be the act of the people in obedience to the mandatory behests of Congress? Call you that a question not of principle, but only of fact? It occurs to me if we maintain the doctrine of non-intervention in full force, and in its original purity, we must be cautious how we impose restrictions and make suggestions. It is none of our business how the people make their laws, or what kind of laws are enacted when they come to make a constitution, provided we know that it is the people, and not a faction, who are acting—which we can only know through forms of law, and regular procedure.

The Topeka constitution presented to the last Congress was a spurious emanation from a still more spurious and illegal source. It had none of the sanctions of law and regularity. Not so with this.

The great wrong to the pro-slavery party of Kansas has been committed by the negligence of the South, and by certain men in the South who have all the time desired that Territory to come in as a free State, supposing that political capital could be made thereby for themselves and their favorite partisan leaders. May not the pro-slavery party in Kansas—imitating the example of the great Roman General, when he was betrayed by his own friends, and in the agony of death exclaimed, "et tu, Brute!"—point to certain politicians of the South whose every effort has been to consecrate her soil to Abolitionism. For them there is no excuse, no palliation. They have been false to their own section and their own people. The position of certain leading politicians in my own State has done much to retard the progress of our cause in that Territory, by denouncing the Kansas and Nebraska bill. I do not, however, allude to my honorable colleagues on this floor, especially from the Hermitage and Murfreesboro districts, who stood up in 1854, and staked their political heads upon their fealty to principle; they, I believe, are the only gentlemen of that party who saved their heads in Tennessee; those who voted against the bill have been consigned by the righteous judgment of an injured people to the tomb, from whose sleep of death there is no resurrection. Instead of encouraging the southern people to remove thither, they have used means to dam up the streams of southern emigration to that Territory, thus becoming active and efficient emissaries of the anti-slavery Emigrant Aid Society.

Men who were friendly to the establishment of slavery in Kansas predicted that it could never go there; that it would not be profitable, and that the soil and climate forbade it; while quite another set of southern politicians urged, in addition to the reasons just stated, that there was no protection to be afforded the slave owner in his property, and that whoever emigrated thither with his slave did it at the peril of losing him. How false are all these predictions and positions! The soil, climate, and latitude of a large portion of Kansas are just the same as that of Missouri; where I am informed, by gentlemen whose credibility is beyond cavil or doubt, that the annual profits of the labor of a negro amount to $500 in the production of hemp and tobacco; and yet we are told that slave labor is unprofitable.

As to the danger of losing your slave by abduction or escape, the facilities are no greater than they are in some of the southern States. The courts of the Territory furnish now all the protection which the civil authority affords in the States. These are the arguments originally started by the Abolitionists, as soon as the Territory was organized, with the sole view of making it a free State; and I regret that southern men, prompted by whatever motive, should have caught them up and heralded them all over the South, to the detriment of the pro-slavery cause. I do not desire to see slavery by adventitious aid forced into Kansas, nor do I desire to see it forced out by any such appliances. In the mean time, Kansas has been exceedingly unfortunate in her Governors. I believe, however, that the Governors have been equally unfortunate; for while they have attempted to stab Kansas, they in turn have been stabbed; and all Abolitionism cannot staunch their wounds. The soil of Kansas has drank their political blood. And, as if in order to give the finishing stroke, Governor Walker has broke upon the country the startling fact that an isothermal line forever precluded slavery from the virgin and prolific soil of Kansas. Such, sir, have been the blunders and treachery of southern men.

Yet in spite of all these difficulties, through fire and storm, Kansas comes to us with a pro-slavery constitution. She has passed her territorial pupillage—she has conformed to all the requisites of the law; and may I not be allowed to ask gentlemen of the Democratic party, how can you refuse her? Did not the Democratic party go into the fight in 1856 with this very identical proposition—that whenever the already mentioned prerequisites should be complied with, that any Territory, North or South, slave or free, should be admitted upon terms of perfect equality? Popular sovereignty and State equality were emblazoned upon your banners; they were the household words of the party—principles as old and as honored as the Revolution, without the recognition of which this Union never could have been formed. Truly is this equality of the States a germ of the Revolution; its spirit is breathed upon every page of the Constitution; and not until 1820 was the face of that charter of rights blurred by drawing for expediency's sake the black line of the Missouri compromise, which fell upon the ear of Jefferson "like a fire-bell at night—as the knell of the Union."

To efface that black line, by which one half the States of this Union were placed under the ban of inequality—an unjust and unconstitutional discrimination against the South—was the mission of the Kansas and Nebraska bill; and surely, since the Sage of Monticello penned the instrument which, as a sharp sword, severed the ties that bound us to British rule, and baptized our infant colonies in the blood and name of freedom, there has not been such an offering laid upon the altar of constitutional liberty. The Leecompton constitution is the result of the Kansas and Nebraska act; how strange to see those who stood by the parent measure in all its days of doubt, vicissitude, and final glorious triumph, now turn their backs upon the legitimate offspring. It is but another one of those unmistakable signs that appear periodically, but with shorter intervals, upon our northern political horizon, which admonishes the South of her rapidly impending fate.

The right of the people to govern themselves, restrained only by the Federal Constitution, whether in State or Territory, though not formally, is yet practically denied. This great truth was the watchword that flashed along the lines of the Democratic army of 1856. Did not the Republican party plant themselves as distinctly upon the principle that no more slave States should ever be admitted into this Confederacy? These were the banners, with their inscriptions, under which the two principal parties of this country rallied in the last presidential struggle. The contest, in the South, it is true, was mixed up with the effete dogmas of Know Nothingism—the most of that party, with here and there a disgraceful exception, maintaining the same principles in common with the Democracy, touching the slavery issue. But how was it in the North? It was the bloodiest battle in the history of American political warfare. Only two years before that the national men of the North, with but very few exceptions, were overpowered and crushed out beneath the tramp of that mighty army with its myriads of fanatics, who marched in unbroken columns under that black banner upon which was written, in letters of blood, the memorable motto: "Anti-Kansas—no more slave States."

The admission or rejection of Kansas grows in importance and significance when we realize the fact that, with a large majority of those who oppose it—and that majority constitutes the larger moiety of the northern people—there is a settled determination not to admit any more slave States into this Union. This sentiment is growing at the North, and the southern people should know it. I am aware that the followers of the Illinois Senator contend that slavery is but an abstraction merely in Kansas—an admission I do not make; but even if it were, so much the stronger evidence that you do not intend ever that another slave State shall enter the door of this Confederacy. If you will not admit a State because it has the abstraction of slavery, without the institution practically, by what sort of logic are we to conclude that you would vote to admit a State that was clearly and unequivocally and practically in favor of slavery? If you are alarmed, and flee at the approach of shadows, how can we expect you to stand when the substance itself shall appear before you?

Whether Kansas shall be a free State or a slave State, will not affect my course; while I would prefer, as it seems to me every true southern man should, that she should come in as a slave State, in view of the effect which her close proximity may have upon Missouri, by whom the South should stand as one man, and never desert her though they had to march through fire and blood; nevertheless, I am here, to-day, ready to assume the responsibility to vote to admit Kansas as a free State, providing she applied in that capacity. It is principle that I contend for; the right of the people to govern themselves, and the equality of the States; is there nothing in that doctrine, though slavery be disconnected altogether with it, for which we of the South, as sovereign States, and as freemen, should contend? Should a gentleman submit to an insult any sooner than he would to a blow from an antagonist? The Boston merchants threw the tea into the ocean for the sake of a principle, which caused the first gun of the Revolution to be fired. It was a difference about a political principle or abstraction, that brought about the war of 1812. Principle is everything; deeds are only significant where they result from principle.

The leading idea of South Carolina's great statesman, of preserving an equilibrium of the strength and power of the free and slave States, is now gone forever. The admission of California threw the balance into the northern scale, and the admission of Oregon and Minnesota will forever preclude all hope of its readjustment. But was any one prepared to suppose that the day was so near at hand, that the sectional majority in either House of Congress would forever close the doors against the admission of any more States tolerating slavery? Truly will the South feel that the evil day is near if Kansas is rejected. No matter what the motive may be, let me say to you that the conservative men of the South will feel, that as their rights are trespassed upon inch by inch, that they must begin to look to and within the South for succor and relief. That principle once established and imbedded in the southern mind, it will not require a prophet to foresee the decline, and, unless there should be a returning sense of justice in the North, the end of this the model Republic that has yet been recorded in the annals of time. To quietly submit longer, would only encourage and invite continued aggression and wrong, and serve to deprive us, in the estimation of the enlightened Powers of earth, of the respect which resistance would at least entitle us to.

Oh! but the Republican party say that they are opposed to the extension of slavery. Southern expansion is their climacteric of political woe! Why are you opposed? It is a domestic institution—is it any of your business? Not if there is any truth in the doctrine that government was instituted among men upon the consent of the governed. That the people have a right to govern themselves, is an undeniable truth; and if they desire slavery, why oppose it? You cannot be opposed to slavery because the number will be increased thereby. Not a slave will be born by extending slavery into Kansas that would not be born by prohibiting the institution from that Territory. It cannot, then, be through motives of philanthropy and sympathy for the negro. Do you oppose its extension because you look forward to the day when you hope that the South may be overrun with a black population, with but few whites to control them—thus endangering the safety and supremacy of our race? Do you forget that we descended from a common stock? The Baptists of Virginia, the Huguenots of South Carolina, and the Puritans of New England, were all Anglo-Saxon. They were the nursery of this proud nation—the germ from which sprung this mighty people who now control the northern hemisphere of this continent, stretching from the icy North to the balmy South, and from ocean to ocean, shedding light upon the nations, offering a shelter to the downtrodden and oppressed of the world. And is it true that our northern countrymen, with the same blood coursing their veins that animates ours, are willing to force us into a war of races that would end in the extinction of the one while desolation and ruin would surround the other? Is this the heritage that you would bequeath posterity?

Sir, it cannot be concealed that the object Abolitionism—and Black Republicanism is its synonym—has in opposing the extension of slavery, strikes at its very existence in the States. They wish to confine it within narrow limits until it becomes burdensome and profitless, on account of its increased numbers within a limited area. They would dam up the stream until it overflows its banks, spreading devastation around.

Sir, the northern people who have been deluded and deceived by demagogues; who are made to believe that our beautiful South is a land of stripes and blood, are culpable for not having torn from their eyes the veil of misrepresentation and falsehood with which they have been hoodwinked. I had hoped since the nation, North and South, is becoming checkered all over with a network of railways, making the travel from the extreme limits of one section to the other cheap, comfortable, and expeditious, that the northern people would visit us more, partake of our hospitable boards, and see for themselves.

It is a remarkable fact, that our northern commercial men entertain sounder and more conservative views with reference to the institutions of the South than any other class as a class of their population. That is a fact worthy of reflection. Why is it so? Simply because they know more about the South from their commercial intercourse and social relations with the southern people. They know that all this sentimental philanthropy that would decoy and abduct a slave from his master—from a home of protection and plenty—and then permit him to starve in some miserable garret or cellar in some northern city is as cruel, false, and inhuman towards the deluded slave, as it is mean, dishonest, and an outrage upon the rights of the master. They know very well that slavery is the normal condition of the African negro, and that he has never attained to one half the degree of civilization in his native land or in this country, as a free negro, as he has under the guidance and control of his southern master. Commercial men, and they have been styled the factors of the agriculturists of the South and West, ought to make still greater effort to correct northern sentiment and to put down all this fanatical cry against the southern people. But for the products of slave labor, cotton, rice, sugar, hemp, and tobacco, which seek an exchange for other products in foreign markets, and thus constitute the commerce of our northern cities; and but for our direct trade with those cities pouring into their laps annually many hundred millions of dollars, the result of our slave labor, what would become of that commerce? What would become of the many millions who now swell the great cities of the North, and whose handicraft labor is enriching that people?

New York is now the great commercial center or heart of this nation. She does not experience the least irregularity in her inmost receptacle that does not forthwith extend itself to the extremest limit of our southern and western trade. Her pulsations vibrate throughout the land. We have just passed through (if indeed we may flatter ourselves that the dawn is breaking) one of the darkest periods known to the history of monetary revulsions. Oppression and bankruptcy have waved their black wand of despair and ruin over the fate of thousands. The arm of industry has been paralyzed; labor has been denied its just reward; credit has been destroyed; and a wail of woe has filled the air, produced how? Simply by the expansion and sudden contraction of a worthless paper currency based upon false promises instead of gold and silver. In all this distress—and one gentleman said a few days since that it had brought starvation into his district, staring like a specter of death at the helpless and poor—not one solitary dollar of actual capital of national or universal currency has been sunk, lost, or destroyed. It is all the result of fictitious causes.

Now suppose that you could carry out the schemes of the northern fanatic or Abolitionist, that you would so hedge in slavery, surround it on all sides by a cordon of free States, prevent its extension, making inroads upon it at every possible aperture, narrowing the circle at every source of approach, until it should become profitless, ay, burdensome, and thus effect its abolition: what will you have made in a monetary point of view? Strike down at one blow the immense profits of slave-labor, which to-day enriches the North, and, sir, instead of the teeming millions of operatives who now fill your workshops—your mills of various kinds, not a hammer scarcely will be heard to beat, and not a spindle will charm the ear with its musical hum; grass will spring up in your streets, and plenty will desert your land. The cry will be truly "blood or bread!" If such consequences legitimately follow the withdrawal of the productive energies of slave-labor, what would be the picture if abolitionism could accomplish the abolition of slavery, and the $2,000,000,000 (the value of slave-labor) were at another blow struck down from the bulk of American capital? Sir, will any man attempt to describe the picture? Instead of tenantless shops and crowded streets with the cry of "blood or bread!" the cry will be "blood and bread!" Think not that the evil will be upon us of the South alone. No; serious as it might be, if it were possible that the South would ever submit to such wrong—before which I am free to say every true southerner would first find his sepulcher—yet its effect upon the North cannot be described.

But you say that you once had slaves in many of the northern States, and that no such results followed emancipation. You never emancipated your slaves; you brought them down South, sold them, put the money in your pockets, and returned home, really doubting the morality of owning slaves. Pharisee-like, you were very conscientious after you got the money in your pocket. Sir, is the North determined that there shall be no more slave States admitted into this Confederacy? While the dominant power of the North uses every means within their grasp to prevent Kansas from coming into the Union, because she has recognized in her organic law the rights of her people to hold any kind of property they may choose, even though it be slaves, are they determined to wage an unending and relentless war against any and all efforts that may—it matters not how very remotely—look to the extension of slavery into Central America. I do not allude to Central America because I would advise any active movements upon the part of the South towards its colonization, but because it serves to illustrate the temper of the times as manifested by the Abolitionists of the North, and by the overweening cupidity of the British Government to get a foothold there that may be prejudicial to southern interests.

We are coolly told that Central America must be Americanized, and that the anti-slavery Emigrant Aid Society of New England is to accomplish the work. Is the object to surround the South with free States? New England men are to colonize and Americanize Central America, as though the North did not have free territory enough.

Empires have been acquired by southern valor and a common treasure, and consecrated to the free society and institutions of the North; and yet abolitionism, or Black Republicanism, would fain deny to the South any outlet for the expansion of slavery, but would confine it and manacle it in a limited area, that it might in the process of time bring incalculable and incurable woe upon the South.

New Englanders Americanize Central America—engage in pursuits requiring active manual labor and exertion, under the burning rays of that tropical sun!

You tell us that the climate and soil of the northern States forbid slavery within your limits. We believe it; and are willing that you may enjoy your own views to the fullest extent. But these same laws require and demand slave labor in the South; the law of making money looms up in bold relief, and points the devotee of Mammon to slave labor in that country. African slavery is destined to fill up the neglected and deserted wastes of Central America; and if Yankees go there, they may depend upon having to live beneath the shadow of that institution. The unbending law of necessity demands it. You may depopulate New England, and pour the stream of emigration as an avalanche upon that soil, as the Northmen overran Britain; and a few sickly winds, with a vertical sun, will expel every white man from the field of active manual labor. It is only the negro, whose physical constitution enables him to dig the exuberant soil of that country. White men may, and must, direct his labors; for a community of civilized negroes, making their own laws, and controlling their own government, is unknown to the political economist or statesman. White men must govern and control that miserable, stolid, ignorant race of people, who are, and ever will be, unfit for the arts of American civilization, if left alone to work out the problem of their destiny. A hybrid, mixed race, of all kinds of blood, color, language—Indian, African, Mexican, Malay—mingling and vegetating in inglorious emasculation and degeneracy, upon a soil that might, by a proper system of government and culture, be made to "bloom and blossom as the rose." A thousand anti-slavery emigrant aid societies cannot prevent the introduction of African slavery into that beautiful, but neglected land.

The annexation of Nicaragua or any of the Central American States to this country, either as States or Territories, is a proposition foreign to my present inquiry.

It surely is a matter of the deepest moment to all our varied interests, commercial, foreign, and domestic, that the Monroe doctrine be enforced strictly in Central America. England has been watching and looking on with a lustful eye. We owe it to ourselves that no European Government be allowed to establish a protectorate in that country, or exercise in any way civil or political authority.

General Cass, in a recent letter (21st May last) to a Walker meeting in New York, lays bare the designs of England in the following significant language. He says:

"A new day, I hope, is opening upon the States of Central America. If we are true to our duty they will soon be freed from all danger of European interference, and will have a security in their own power against the ambitious designs of England far better than Clayton-Bulwer treaties or any other diplomatic machinery by which a spirit of aggression is sought to be concealed till circumstances are ready for active operation."

We have had quite enough of meddlesome interference by Great Britain upon both American waters and upon this continent. She has entered into solemn treaty with Spain with the sole purpose of preventing this Government from purchasing Cuba. She has freed the black population in Jamaica, to the infinite joy of the Abolitionists in this country; and yet she enslaves the natives of India, and actually proposes to the French Emperor to furnish, through the agency of the East India Company, the prisoners of war who have been captured by the British army, to the people of France, to be worked and controlled as apprenticed slaves. She marauds the world over. She is obstructing our interests in every way she can devise in Central America. But the other day, in offering to aid Commodore Paulding in his seizure of Walker, she was guilty of an interference which was, in spirit at least, violative of the Monroe doctrine. The South owes it to her future independence and safety, that neither England or northern abolitionism, the one more than the other, or both together, be allowed to interfere in any manner whatever with Central America, Mexico, or any of the isles of the southern ocean.

The importance of the Americanization of Central America is growing daily; but we want none of the aid of New England's puritanical Abolitionists; still less do we want the scheme of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] put in operation—the establishment of a second St. Domingo and Jamaica upon our southern border. Nor do we need the gratuitous assistance of England or any other European Power; let it be the work of the South, as it is the geographical and legitimate direction for the expansion of her own and similar institutions. Certainly in those perilous days to the property rights and institutions of our fifteen southern States, when the lava-tide of Abolitionism is slowly but surely encroaching upon us, we could not be indifferent to seeing a neighboring country bordering so closely upon our southern limit, affecting our domestic as well as our commercial polity, as she emerges from the misty cloud of semi-barbarism into the full-orbed splendor of civilization, build up the same kind of institutions, based upon the same foundation and having a common interest and sympathy with and for each other; and when the time shall come—if come it will—and God grant it may never come, when all equality between these States shall be obliterated, when the unwelcome dilemma forces itself upon the men of the South, either to yield the spirits and rights of freemen and become substantially the colonial and vassal tributaries to support and enrich an aggressive central Power, or to assert those rights as becomes the sons of worthy sires, we shall not hesitate to elect between the alternatives.

But while I will not close my eyes to the danger and evil that threaten and impend upon our future pathway as a nation, I yet trust that "the sober second thought" may prevail, and that the honor of the South may yet be vindicated by the northern Democracy. I can never forget the gallantry and self-sacrificing devotion to principle that they displayed in the uneven hand-to-hand fight of 1856; with what heroic firmness they met the assaults made upon the rights of the South; how they made our cause, and the cause of the Union, their cause. But for the efforts of northern Democrats, the coordinate branch of this Government, the present venerable Executive—wise, just, patriotic and firm—we should in his stead have had a Black Republican régime inaugurated and established; whose unconstitutional and sectional policy, if it had not rent the nation in twain, and lit up the fires of civil war, would have dispirited the hopes of the patriot, and alienated the affections of the people to the Government to perhaps an irremediable degree. If you would have us continue to cherish a holy regard for this Union, we must be treated as equals. The cohesive principle of this Union is not force; it is rather the opposite; it is mutual love and forbearance; claiming no superiority and acknowledging no inferiority, either as citizens or as States.

Sir, in Tennessee we are imbued not with the love of section only, but of our section in the Union under the Constitution. I have an abiding confidence in the ultimate justice and good faith of the northern Democracy, and that, as a party, they will continue to stand by the Constitution, in all its sanctity and integrity. When, in the canvass of 1856, southern men were tremblingly listening for the result of the election in the old Keystone, as the avant-courier heralded it over the land, it broke upon the great southern heart, overwhelming it with gratitude. It was a noble spectacle to see the Democracy of Pennsylvania rising above the sectional jealousies of her latitude, and boldly stemming the turbid stream of fanaticism, and rescuing from threatening ruin the argosy upon which the memories of our nation and its future hopes are freighted, in the election of her favorite son, the evidence of whose patriotism, fidelity, and capacity is a record service of near half a century. Indiana, New Jersey, Illinois, and California nobly offered themselves upon the altar of the constitutional rights of the States; and though the Democracy in the remaining northern States were overborne by superiority of numbers, still they stood like a rock in the midst of the ocean, overwhelmed but unmoved by the conflicting surges that lashed it in ceaseless disorder. I trust the northern Democracy will continue to do us justice; if they desert—then is the South without hope.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HICKMAN,] who addressed the committee a day or two since, boldly proclaimed that he was in favor of a sectional candidate for the Presidency in 1860. I trust that sentiment does not find a response in the breast of any other Representative from the North, who calls himself a Democrat. He should attach himself to the party to which his principles have affinity.

My faith is strong in the northern Democracy. Sir, we have tried northern Whiggery, and, although there are names connected with that party's history, who adorned it and the country's escutcheon; and there are a few gallant spirits, even living, whose effulgence shines in upon the waste of darkness that encompasses its memory, like the light of the fire-fly of the tropics, which only makes the darkness the blacker still; still the serried ranks of that party, once led with the prestige of a Webster in the North, and frenzied in days of old to very madness, by the heaven-touched tongue of Clay, was time and again decimated by the sirocco breath of anti-slavery, until those chieftains saw, in the bitterness of their hearts, in their declining years, their old Whig flag hauled down, and the black banner of Abolitionism hoisted in its stead.

The American party next appeared upon the tapis, and strutted for a brief hour upon the political stage; but it, too, became imbued with the fell spirit of Abolitionism, and its northern wing has entered that maelstrom whose circling wave ever tends downward and to the center.

With the sad fate of these parties before our eyes, will the national Democracy plunge headlong into an abyss from which there is no extrication? I trust not. By its past history, its present strong position, and the future glory that awaits it, if it but be true to itself, I trust not. Somehow or other I am impressed that this Union cannot survive very long the dismemberment of the Democratic party. It has survived the downfall of the parties I have just mentioned. They were built upon sandy foundations, and when the storm-cloud of sectionalism broke upon them they fell. It has survived the dismemberment of all the churches, except the Calvinistic Baptists; Puritan philanthropists of New England cannot sit at the table of the Lord with slave owners. Be it so; we can bear all that so long as the Democratic party, the great conservator of the Constitution, still stands; with its ranks, though thinned, we shall still have sufficient force to overcome the enemies of our constitutional rights. But how long will the evil day stay away, when the Union of our fathers and their Constitution shall become a mockery and a curse? But little longer, I fear, than the dismemberment and destruction of the Democratic party.

Mr. Chairman, the drama which is now being played, in which we all are actors, and which soon must close, will either gild our prospects with a bright and joyous future; or may drop a curtain, the blackness of which will enshroud in gloom the patriot's hope for the nation's weal.

Admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, and peace will again return to a distracted land, and once more spread her azure wings over a free, contented, and happy people. Reject her, and it is not for me to say what course Tennessee will or ought to adopt—how far she may pay deference and acknowledge her obligations to her sisters of the South; but whatever her honor demands of her, that will she do; and being born and nurtured upon her generous bosom, and having been honored with her confidence in various posts of public service, "let fate do her worst," I will stand by her, lo, even unto the end?

Mr. LOVEJOY obtained the floor.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman from Illinois will give way for a moment—and I know no gentleman of whom I could better ask the courtesy—I desire to present a petition in relation to the appointment of chaplains for the Army and Navy.

Several MEMBERS. You cannot present a petition in committee.

Mr. FLORENCE. I thought I might get it in in a five minutes' speech, so that it may go in the Globe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that it is not competent for the gentleman to present a petition in committee.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then if the gentleman will give way, I will read it as my speech.

Mr. LOVEJOY. If the brother wanted to pray, I would give way; but for a speech I cannot. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. There are so many persons interested in this matter—"Order!" "Order!" If the committee will permit me to have it printed in the Globe as a part of the proceedings of the House, I shall have accomplished my object. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to give way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands not.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Chairman, before entering upon the consideration of the subject which is to be the principal theme of discussion, I desire to submit a few preliminary remarks as to the real nature of the contest in which we are engaged. To my apprehension, it is greatly desirable that we have a distinct and well-defined understanding of the conflict—for conflict it is—in which we are engaged, of the principles involved, and of the parties arrayed.

It is not, then, let me say, a conflict between the North and the South—a sectional strife between two portions of the country. I deem it unfortunate that the terms North and South are so frequently employed to designate the opposing forces in this contest. What is there to array the North against the South, or the South against the North? Nothing: so far as I can see, absolutely nothing. Is there any competition between the products of these two portions of our common country? Do the maize, wheat, and sorghum of the North, envy the rice, cotton, and cane of the South? On the other hand, the territorial extent of our country, the variety of its productions, and the range of its climate, are, if left to their natural operation, elements of strength, union, prosperity, and harmony. This complicated yet concordant unity is happily expressed in language employed for that purpose by one who has passed away:

"Not chaos-like together crushed and bruised;
But like the world, harmoniously confused,
Where order in variety we see;
And where, though all things differ, all agree."

If there is anything in the land that would destroy or even weaken this mystic, yet potent agency, that binds us together as a Confederacy, and which would hurl us in disjointed fragments into ruin and chaos, let it be brought to the altar of patriotism and slain.

What, then, is the source of this moral strife which at times wears an aspect so threatening and terrific? The source of the calamities which befel the Grecians in the Trojan war is recited in the opening lines of the Iliad:

"Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring
Of woes unnumbered, heavenly goddess, sing."

What Achilles' wrath was to Greece slavery is to our own country—the prolific spring of woes unnumbered. Not the discussion, not the agitation of the subject of slavery, but the existence of slavery itself. The conflict, then, is not between the North and the South, but between freedom and slavery—between the principles of liberty and those of despotism. The free States (I speak it with shame) have advocates of slavery extension; the slave States (I mention it with joy) have many hearts that are loyal to freedom, and these liege men will be greatly multiplied ere many years roll away. I venture the prediction. The great mistake has been in identifying the South with slavery and slaveholding—in using the words as convertible terms. There is a class who advocate the rightfulness, perpetuity, and nationality of slavery, who seem to think that they are the South. Any attack on slavery, with its nameless wrongs and pollutions and usurpations, is construed into an assault on the South, and is called sectionalism.

But supposing slavery were not, would there not still be a South? Would not its rivers flow, its forests wave, and its soil and mines yield their annual and accustomed tribute? What if the class indicated a class infinitesimal as compared with the population of the entire Union, and numerically insignificant as compared with the whole population of the South—what, I say, if this entire class should be annihilated by a single blow of that slumbering justice at whose anticipated waking Jefferson trembled; or be found, on some morning, heaps of slain, like the hosts of Sennacherib, pallid in their couch like the first born of Egypt, or buried like the horsemen of Pharaoh, beneath the avenging wave: would there not still be a South? What if the earth should open and swallow master and slave together: would there not be a class left more than equal in numbers to that of both the others, to wit: the non-slaveholders of the slave States, who, if freed from the presence and blight of slavery, would divide the territory into small freeholds, and commence a process of recuperation that would ultimately bring back the South to its original position, and make it the pride and glory of the whole land? Or—what is really desirable, and contemplating the only peaceful and bloodless and just exodus which I can see for the slave, and the only proper cessation of this conflict—supposing the present dominant class in the slave States, looking at this subject in the light of history, in the light of the inevitable workings and final triumphs of free principles, elevating themselves above the political expedients and shifts of a day, and taking broad, humane, and patriotic views of this subject, should, by some wise process, rid themselves of this malign system: would there not still be a South—a South jubilant, a country joyous, a world glad, and Heaven itself clothed in benignant smiles of approbation?

Then would be fulfilled that Divine injunction graven on the bell that used in the olden times to summon the fathers to their deliberations in Independence Hall—"Proclaim liberty throughout the land, to all the inhabitants thereof."

What an opportunity is here presented to the true heroic men of the South—an opportunity that never occurs but once during the life-time of an individual, and but seldom in the cycles of generations! Oh, that thou hadst known, at least in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace, and true glory! I pray God that they may not be hidden from your eyes. The first Revolution found a leader from the South. The hosts of Freedom now marshaled in grand and goodly array, having passed their Bunker Hill, ask the South for a leader to take them to Saratoga and Yorktown. Have you the man—the hero? If so, let him ride forth, and you shall see whether we are a sectional party or not.

Opportunity rare! Have any of you a heart to improve it? Would you have your sculptured form fill some niche which is now vacant in these new Halls, or perpetuated on canvas and hung up amid the illustrious dead that now ornament the rotunda? Seize, then, this opportunity; forswear allegiance to slavery, and take the oath of fealty to freedom. You can gain no permanent renown in fighting for oppression; or, if you achieve fame, it will be like that of the madman who applied the torch to the temple of Ephesus—a bad preëminence. Some of you have the mental gifts and culture and position to achieve a fame that should be permanent and enviable. Have you the moral heroism to do it?

"Fear not; spurn the worldling's laughter,
"Thine ambition trample thou;
Thou shalt find a long hereafter
To be more than tempts thee now."

Let us, then, hear nothing more of North and South. We make no assault on the rights of the South; it is the wrongs and aggressions of slavery with which we grapple. The South, the citizens of the South, have all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizens of the North or West. Let those rights be guaranteed and protected, anywhere and everywhere, "to the fullest extent—to the fullest extent, sir."

The King of France, Louis XIV., in view of the union of that country and Spain, said, "there are no longer any Pyrenees." And I say, let there be no longer any Mason and Dixon's line; let it disappear, and let the country be one united whole; the rights of all equally respected, equally sacred.

But, as to slavery, that is a different thing. Whatever legal sanction it may have under municipal statutes, it has no constitutional sanction save the negative one of being left alone; while it skulks under and behind the sovereignty of the States, beyond the reach of the delegated powers of the Federal Government. But where that Government has exclusive jurisdiction it has no right; and it has no moral right anywhere, and no suitable abode out of those penal fires that are never quenched. It is a very Caliban.

"Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum."

And this brings me, sir, to the question which I desire to discuss—the question not only of the day but of the age—the most important question that has agitated the country since the Revolution, and the most solemn and grave one with which Christian civilization has had to grapple in modern times.

The President, in his message, claims, or rather assumes, that human beings are property in the absolute and unqualified sense—property as the grazing ox or the bale of merchandise is property; and that the tenure of this property is a natural and indefeasible right, guaranteed by the Constitution. And it has been averred on the floor of this House that, as an abstract principle, the system of American slavery was right, having the sanction of natural and of revealed religion. As the whole of this discussion, in its real merits, hinges on this principle or dogma, I confront it at the very threshold, and deny it. I affirm that it has not the sanction of natural or revealed religion, or of the Constitution.

I need not say that this is a new doctrine, unknown to the fathers and founders of the Republic. Indeed, till within a very few years, slavery was acknowledged by all classes, in the slave no less than in the free States, to be an evil, social, moral, and political—a wrong to the slave, a detriment to the master, and a blight on the soil; its very existence deplored, and its ultimate extermination looked forward to with earnest and often impatient hope. It was regarded as the relic of a barbarous age, which must disappear before the advancing civilization of the present. It was deemed to be contrary to the benign spirit and precepts of the Christian religion, which would ere long supplant it. Many of its ablest and truest opponents were reared in the midst of it, and could be called neither intermeddlers nor fanatics. No one pretended that it had any right whatever, beyond the limits of the local laws which created and protected it.

But all this is changed now. The demon of slavery has come forth from the tombs. It has grown bold and defiant and impudent. It has left its lair, lifted its shameless front towards the skies, and, with horrid contortions and gyrations, mouths the heavens, and mutters its blasphemies about having the sanction of a holy and just God; dodges behind the national compact, and grins and chatters out its senile perillities about constitutional sanction; and then, like a very fantastic ape, jumps upon the bench, puts on ermine and wig, and pronounces the dictum that a certain class of human beings have no rights which another certain class are bound to regard; and then it claims the right to stalk abroad through the length and breadth of the land, robbing the poor free laborer of his heritage, trampling on congressional prohibitions, crushing out beneath its tread State sovereignty and State constitutions. It claims the right to pollute the Territories with its slimy footsteps, and then makes its way to the very home of freedom in the free States, carried there on a constitutional palanquin, manufactured and borne aloft on the one side by a Democratic Executive, and on the other by a Democratic Jesuit judge! It claims the right to annihilate free schools—for this its very presence achieves—to hamper a free press, to defile the pulpit, to corrupt religion, and to stifle free thought and free speech! It claims the right to convert the fruitful field into a wilderness, so that forests shall grow up around grave-yards, and the populous village become a habitation for owls. It claims the right to transform the free laborer, by a process of imperceptible degradation, to a condition only not worse than that of the slave. Yes, sir, while the border ruffians are striving, by alternate violence and fraud, to force slavery into Kansas, the President and Chief Justice, by new, unheard of, and most unwarrantable interpretations of the Constitution, are endeavoring to enthrone and nationalize slavery, and make it the dominant power in the land; and are calling upon the people, in the name of Democracy, to crowd up to the temple gates of this demon worship! And all this upon the false,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 43.

atrocious, and impious avowal, that human beings are property! Again I meet this doctrine, and spurn it. The Supreme Being never intended that human beings should be property.

In those far-off solitudes of the past, when that sublime manifestation of Almighty power was to be made in the formation of a human being, what was the utterance that fell from the Divine lips? "And God said let us make man in our own image, after our likeness; and in the image of God created he him." Made but little lower than the angels, crowned with glory and honor, there stood man, the delegated lord and possessor of the earth, and of all the irrational existence with which it teemed. This similitude of man to God is a reality. There is, in man's spiritual nature, a miniature God—debased this likeness may be, disfigured and dim, still there is the Divine tracery. The pearl may be in the oozy bed of ocean's slime; still it is capable of being burnished and made to glisten in the firmament of a future and immortal life.

When a monarch confides his signet ring to another, though that other be a beggar, that symbol carries with it the power and protection of royalty. And on whatever being the Divine artist has traced the image of himself, I insist that that being cannot, without wrong and impiety, be made an article of property. This spiritual existence with which man is endowed—this transcript of the Creator's likeness—is not a temporary endowment but an endless gift.

"The sun is but a spark of fire;
A transient meteor in the sky;
The soul, immortal as its sire,
Shall never die."

Shall a being thus highly endowed, and destined to an endless duration, be crowded down to the level of the brutes that perish? Does any one believe that that is in accordance with the Divine will?

As from the altitude of the stars all inequalities of earth's surface disappear, so from the standpoint of man's immortality all distinctions fade away, and every human being stands on the broad level of equality. To chattelize a rational creature thus endowed and thus allied, is to insult and incense the author of his being.

Look at it from another point. Eighteen centuries ago appeared the most wonderful personage that has ever moved among men—the God-man—the Deity manifested in human form. After a life of chosen poverty, passed amid the poor and the lowly, he laid down his life to expiate the sins of man. President Buchanan, believest thou the gospel record? I know that thou believest. Tell me, then, sir, did Christ shed his blood for cattle? Did he lay down his life to replenish personal property, to redeem real estate? I tell you, gentlemen, that this property claim in man is impiety rank and foul, against God and his anointed.

"Eternal Nature! when thy giant hand
Had heaved the floods, and fixed the trembling land—
When life sprang started at thy plastic call,
Endless her forms, and man the lord of all—
Say, was that lordly form inspired by thee
To wear eternal chains and bow the knee?
Was man ordained the slave of man to toil,
Yoked with the brutes and fettered to the soil,
Weighed in a tyrant's balance with his gold?
No! nature stamped us in a heavenly mold.
She bade no wretch his thankless labors urge,
Nor trembling take his pittance and the scourge;
No homeless Libyan on the stormy deep,
To call upon his native land and weep."

I adopt, with cordial admiration, the language of England's great statesman:

"While mankind loathe rapine, detest fraud, and abhor blood, they will reject with horror the wild and guilty fantasy that man can hold property in man."

In our preamble to the resolutions inviting clergymen to officiate as chaplains, we have avowed our belief in Christianity. One of the divinely uttered utterances of that religion is: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." The President, in his recent message, justly says that the avowed principle which lies at the foundation of the laws of nations is contained in this Divine precept.

Take one single feature of slavery: it annihilates the family; it tolerates no home; it tears with relentless diabolism its plowshare beam deep right through God's domestic institution; and, having leveled it with the dust, rears the devil's domestic institution, and transforms the home, the house, into a stable, and its inmates into cattle. The relation of husband and wife, of parent and child, and the endearments of the home circle, are not, and cannot be legally known among the victims of slavery.

What a contrast between that family portrayed in the Cotter's Saturday Night—though they were in the depths of poverty, though they had been out to service during the week; what a contrast between that rude home and the best slave dwelling! From one springs a country's glory and greatness; from the other, a country's decay, shame, and disgrace.

Take away what there is of earthly happiness growing out of the endearments of home, and how much of human felicity have you left? I look around me, and see scores of men, many of whom have, in homes more or less distant, those dearer than life. Can any one prove to you, gentlemen, by any course of reasoning, that it would be right, under any possible circumstances, to doom those children to the auction-block, to be sold like cattle? If I can prove that it is right to take and chattelize another man's children, then he can prove it is right to do the same with mine. Make it right, as an abstract principle, to enslave one human being, and you have broken down the barriers that protect every other human being.

I come now to the constitutional question. The limits that I have assigned myself will not allow a full or even an extended discussion of this point. The President contents himself with declaring, in general terms, that the Constitution regards slaves as property, and adds that this has at last been settled by the highest judicial authority in the land. The Chief Justice who, according to the Executive, has settled this question, also alludes in a general way to the Constitution, and bases his dictum on coterminous history and sentiment, rather than upon anything found in that instrument. Both these gentlemen profess to be strict constructionists of the Constitution. Now, I beg to ask them upon what portion of the Constitution they rely for the support of this property dogma? They say it is in the Constitution. I say it is not in the Constitution; and in the absence of all proof my say is as good as theirs. In no article, in no section, in no line, word, or syllable, or letter, is the idea of property in man expressed or implied. It is a mystery to me how any man could ever believe it; and it is a double mystery to me how an utterance so absolutely untrue and so slanderous towards the framers of the Constitution, could be thrust before the American people from the supreme judiciary and receive the sanction of the Chief Magistrate. An ancient Roman prince said, that if truth should be driven from every other place, it ought to find a home in the hearts of rulers.

We have fallen upon evil times, when a Chief Justice and a Chief Magistrate deliberately and officially utter what, seemingly, they must know to be untrue. Terrible are the necessities and exactions of slavery! How can these gentlemen help knowing that these declarations are untrue? Do they not contradict the entire history of the country? Do they not contradict the repeated declarations of Madison on this very point? Has he not avowed, over and over again, that the idea of property was carefully kept out of the Constitution, so that when slavery should cease to exist in the States there would be no evidence in that instrument that it had ever existed at all? And now this instrument, so instinct with the spirit of freedom, so abhorring the idea of property in man, that it would not be polluted with the word slave, slavery, or servitude even, this Constitution is assumed, by its own inherent force, without any express law or legislative sanction whatever, to carry human chattelism into the Territory of Kansas, and if into the Territory of Kansas, into the State of Kansas; for what right has Kansas, or any other State, to adopt a constitution that contradicts or invalidates the Constitution of the United States? If the slave owner holds his slave in Kansas by a tenure derived from the Constitution, I would like to know what power can take it away? If a new State forms a constitution with a clause prohibiting slavery, and comes and asks admission into the Union with such an organic law, it must be sent back with a mandate to strike out the prohibitory clause, as being contrary to the Federal Constitution. This has at last been settled by the highest judicial tribunal in the land. And it is a mystery to President Buchanan how any one ever could doubt it. Under this doctrine, carried to its logical results, no more free States could ever be added to the Union. Proh pudor! To this complexion it must come at last. To this complexion it has come already. The question now is, whether the country shall be the home of freedom or the lair of slavery; whether the despotism of the fetter and the scourge shall wield the scepter, and liberty be driven into exile.

But still further as to this property principle. If human beings are property, as is now claimed, why has Federal legislation declared the slave trade piracy? Is it piracy to go to the coast of Africa and trade in elephants' teeth, or in palm oil, or in any other article of commerce that may be produced there? If this property claim is correct, then this law is unjust, and ought to be repealed, unless it is to be considered in the light of a protective tariff to encourage and promote slave breeding at home.

More than this: how often is it that when slave owners lie down upon the death couch and look the future in the face, they emancipate their slaves? How often do they do it as a reward for some heroic achievement? Did you ever hear of men emancipating their cattle in their last will and testament? Do they ever bequeath freedom to their swine? or extend that precious boon to a Newfoundland dog that had rescued a child from a watery grave?

Besides, to whom belong all the stray cattle that are without owners in this country? There is certainly a goodly herd of them. How many millions of dollars worth I have not the means at hand of estimating accurately. Perhaps at the instance of the President the Chief Justice would enter up a judgment against them and issue a capias. They have no rights that are to be regarded. They are property, and all property ought to have an owner. They would bring a goodly sum, hard as are the times, enough to go far towards carrying Pennsylvania for a second term. But I meant to be serious, and I will.

I have no patience with these abhorrent assumptions, for I cannot call them arguments, which claim property in man. Such claims are an insult to the intelligence, the Christianity, and the civilization of the age.

I have a final objection to urge against slavery, and much more against its expansion. It lies across our country's glory and destiny.

Century after century rolled over the world, nay whole decades of centuries wore wearily away in earth's history, and the dogma gained universal prevalence and belief that kings ruled by right divine. Dei gratia rex was engraven on their coin. This dogma was by education incorporated into the common faith and acquired all the strength of a religious principle and all the ardor of a devotional sentiment.

I hardly need recite the unhappy results that flowed to mankind from the prevalence of this dogma. Monarchs wielded a scepter of iron. The masses were deemed of no value, only as they could minister to the lust, power, or ambition of the ruling class. The Government was not made for them, but they for the Government. Their blood saturated the soil, and their bones enriched it. They had no rights that kings were bound to regard. But the recital of the woes and wrongs inflicted and endured under the supremacy of this notion of the Divine right of kings would be an illimitable story—it would indeed be the history of the human race during the cycles of ages that they have inhabited the globe. Heaven and earth became alike weary of this state of things. The period arrived when the Great Ruler would introduce a new theory of government. The curtain was to roll up and exhibit a new act in earth's drama. America was the theater where this manifestation was to be made. The old Pilgrim barks, borne as by a miracle over the angry ocean, came freighted with the elements of a new political life, and the germ of a new national organization. How they planted themselves at Jamestown and at Plymouth you know. How they struggled on in their colonial dependence against forest and savage, and British aggressions, you need not be told.

Then came the crisis of our fate? Our ancestors, Cavalier and Roundhead, and I bless their memory, met that crisis manfully, heroically. They came to the Revolution, and on its threshold it was that God poured that wonderful illumination over the mind of Jefferson, and inspired the utterance of those everlasting truths. How grandly majestic they come rolling down from the past, baptized in the blood that flowed from patriotic hearts. "We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This principle laid the ax at the root of the old and long dominant dogma, that one man, or race of men, was created to be kings or nobles, and another to be perpetual peasants and serfs. It placed them upon the broad level of absolute equality, so far as natural rights were concerned. It does not say all British subjects born on this side of the ocean are equal to those born on the other side of it, it does not say all English men are born equal, or all French men, or all Scotch men, or all Dutch men, or all white men, or all tawny men, or all black men, but ALL MEN. That every human being endowed with a rational existence, created in the image of his God, was equally entitled to life and liberty. It is on this principle that criminal jurisprudence rests. The law in its Divine impartiality exacts the life of the murderer, whatever his position, for that of his victim. Whatever may have been the intellectual endowments of the homicide, however exalted his social position, he must pay the forfeit of his life for slaying the most abject and idiotic of his species. And why? Because the life of the poor and debased victim was as sacred and inviolable as that of his gifted and exalted slayer. The one was equally entitled to his life as the other. So precisely with regard to liberty. To that every human being is equally entitled.

To protect these rights Governments are instituted among men. Not to bestow rights are Governments instituted among men, but to protect those which God has already given antecedent to all organic forms of government. I do not depend upon parliaments, or kings, or congresses, or majorities for my rights. I hold them direct from the Creator who formed me. So does every human being. The man, or body of men, who take away these rights without the forms of law or with the forms of law, unless forfeited by crime, are despots, tyrants and usurpers, and by the very act forfeit their own.

If a man is robbed of these rights it makes no difference whether it is done by one man called a king, or by many men called a majority. I do not subscribe to that translucent phantom of popular sovereignty when it claims the right to enslave men. In a company of a hundred men, have ninety-nine the right to rob the hundredth, provided even it is submitted to them and they have a fair election? A majority of a hundred men, of which I am one, may have the right to make rules which shall operate alike upon us all. But when they come to commend an embittered chalice to my lip, of which they will not themselves partake, then I say they have no right to do it—it is wrong.

If the people of a Territory or of a State will vote that they themselves and their children shall alike be slaves, I am content. But that a majority have the rightful power to take away the natural rights of any one single human being, I deny. Those rights, I repeat, are given and guarded by the common Father of us all. And as the parental instincts go forth with peculiar energy and jealousy toward the unfortunate and less favored member of the family circle, protecting his interests and avenging his wrongs, so the Divine Parent watches with peculiar vigilance over the rights of the weak and hapless ones of earth, and avenges their injuries with a terrible and unusual retribution. Did it never occur to you, gentlemen, that as with the individual, so with the nation? Power, elevation, rare endowment, instead of conferring privilege and prerogative, impose obligation. The All-Wise and the All-Powerful is the All-Good as well; and it is His goodness that claims our adoration. And that one expression, which we have been taught to lip in childhood, and to utter in the strength of years—"Our Father"—is the Magna Charta of human brotherhood and of human equality before God and before the law.

What now is our country's duty, destiny, and true glory? To go marauding over the territories of weaker nations like buccaneers and poltroons, to extend the area of slavery; to hunt down fugitive slaves and take them back, manacled, to bondage; to break down the dykes of freedom and let the dark and ensanguined waters of slavery rush in a destructive flood over the land? No! In the name of the fathers, in the name of the Constitution, in the name of the Declaration, in the name of our dignity and position, and in the name of God, no! The true mission of this nation, the work assigned, the trust committed, is to reduce to organic form as we have already done, and now to illustrate before the world, the great and ever-enduring truths that I have recited, and thus to exemplify before the nations of the earth the principles of civil and religious freedom and equality, and so teach them that their monarchies and despotisms are usurpations. I never read that Declaration but with new admiration and delight. So comprehensive, yet so full. Embracing the entire Divine theory of human government in a single paragraph. All men, endowed by their Creator with an equal title to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Governments instituted among men to secure these rights, deriving all their just powers from the consent of the governed!

We hear about keeping step to the music of the Union. Sir, go build a huge organ on the shelving sides of the Rocky Mountains, and let the angel of liberty strike its keys and chant forth that sublime and grand old anthem of universal freedom; and then, as its notes roll over the land, solemn and majestic, in God's name, sir, I will keep step to the music of the Union. It is a divine symphony. But when you call upon me to keep step to the sound of clanking chains, and of human manacles, to the wild shriek of human agony and suffering, I cannot do it. It grates upon me like the very dissonance of hell. I cannot keep step to such music.

And now, sir, why do we stand thus proudly preëminent among the nations of the earth? Why has this nation been led to a position so grand and enviable? Is it because God is any respecter of persons or of nations? Not that; but because He has a grand work for us to do—to lead the world to freedom and glory; to the conscious possession and unmolested enjoyment of rights divinely given. And why should we abandon this position? Why are we called upon to betray the high and solemn trusts committed to our care by the Most High? Why are we asked to wheel around from the van in the progress of a Christian civilization, and with muffled drum and drooping colors march back a decade of centuries into the darkness and barbarism of the past? Why should we, by our refusal to fulfill the destiny plainly marked out for us by the finger of God, yield the honor of earth's renovation to some other people? What is to reward us for all this shame, loss of position, and recreancy to heaven-confided trusts? Will the clank of human fetters on the plains of Kansas, and the wail of man's despair on the Pacific shore, compensate us for this sacrifice?

Oh, how much more noble and heroic for those who have it in their power to say, in God's name this evil must be removed. What a future then flashes on our country? In those ages to come, by a natural process of assimilation and peaceful expansion, we should conquer and possess the entire continent. The genius of Freedom, on some lofty peak of the Rocky Mountains or the Andes, should look abroad, northward and southward, eastward and westward, and behold one vast ocean of republics, bound together by the federal compact.

"Distinct like the billows, yet one like the sea."

And as the recording angel dropped a tear of sorrow on the good man's oath, and blotted it out forever; so the genius of History, when she came to trace our record, would drop a tear of regret and blot out the fact that slavery ever existed. With this result in view, the Constitution was formed.

Shades of the departed, hovering around this Hall, I bless your memories for that Constitution.

Mr. SHORTER obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. FAULKNER, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, and had instructed him to report it back to the House, with the recommendation that it be laid on the table; also, that the committee had had under consideration the bill of the House making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

The question being first upon laying the Treasury-note bill on the table, it was taken; and said bill was laid upon the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. LETCHER, the House (at five minutes before four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 18, 1859.

Prayer by Rev. J. N. HANKS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the papers of Richard Fitch, of Ohio, respecting his application for bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD. I present the petition of Henry Abram, of Richmond, Virginia; and, as it is very short, I can read it as soon as I can state the contents of it:

"I, Henry Abram, of Richmond, Virginia, do hereby petition the honorable Senate of the United States to take into its early consideration the propriety of granting to Virginia one hundred million acres of land, or an amount equal to the Northwestern Territory ceded by Virginia to the United States; said lands to be sold to actual settlers, and the moneys accruing therefrom to be applied to the purchase of the young slaves, and their migration beyond the United States."

I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, in relation to pensions to the soldiers of the revolutionary war, and of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a petition of soldiers of the war of 1812, and widows of some of those who have died, praying to be allowed pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Frank Madison, a colored man, who served as a waiter to Major Lee, in the Army, in the Seminole war in Florida, praying to be allowed bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMMOND presented a petition of the president and stockholders of the Florida Steam Packet Company, praying for compensation for the seizure and detention of the Steamer Carolina by the collector of the port of Jacksonville, in May, 1857; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN presented a petition of William F. Coolbaugh and others, citizens of Burlington, Iowa, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of railroads westward, through the Territory of Nebraska, so as to connect with the roads now located, to the eastern boundary of said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented the petition of citizens of Burlington, New Jersey, praying for the adoption of measures for the peaceful and gradual extinction of slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BIGLER presented a resolution, adopted at a meeting of the German Central Agitation Club of Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of the homestead bill now before the Senate; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the petition of Thomas Halenan, praying for indemnity for damages sustained in consequence of a change in the grade of New Jersey avenue in the city of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Mary Hopper, widow of John A. Hopper, submitted an adverse report.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of John Pickell, reported that the prayer of the memorialist ought not to be granted.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Richard E. Randolph, reported that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Anthony S. Robinson, heir of John H. Robinson, reported a bill (S. No. 158) for the relief of Anthony S. Robinson, heir and legal representative of John Hamilton Robinson; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas J. Page, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 159) for the relief of Commander Thomas J. Page, United States Navy. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas J. Page, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of Thomas J. Page. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of American shipmasters in the port of Havana, in Cuba, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 77) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, reported it without amendment. He also submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

SHELTON ISLAND.

Mr. WILSON. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to cause to be furnished to the Senate, with the papers, correspondence, &c., called for by the resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant, in the case of Philo S. Shelton and Sampson & Tappan, all the correspondence, papers, and documents, on file in the Department of State, in original or copy, relative to the cases of Lang & Delano, and Wheelwright & Cobb, respecting the island of Aves, in the Caribbean sea, not heretofore furnished by said Department.

Philo S. Shelton, Sampson & Tappan, Lang & Delano, and Wheelwright & Cobb, have all filed in the State Department claims against the Government of Venezuela for an alleged interference with the rights of the claimants, in forcibly driving them from the island of Aves, of which they had taken possession as derelict, and upon which they had established themselves under the flag of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining guano.

At the last session of Congress, on the 9th of January, Mr. BELL, of New Hampshire, introduced a resolution in the Senate calling for certain information relative to the claims of certain American citizens for their expulsion from the Aves or Bird islands by the Venezuelan Government; to which, as also to another resolution of the Senate of the 4th of the preceding August, an answer was returned and printed as Executive Document No. 25 of the Senate.

On the 18th instant, Mr. FOSTER introduced a resolution referred to in the resolution now offered, confining the call to the cases of Shelton, and Sampson & Tappan, Lang & Delano, and Wheelwright & Cobb, of Boston, have claims; and equal justice to all demands that all the papers relative to their claims should be communicated to the Senate, if any are communicated.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That for the residue of the present session, after the present week, the private bills on the Calendar shall be special orders of the day, on Friday of each week, at one o'clock, in the order in which they stand upon the Calendar.

Objection being made, the resolution lies over under the rule.

ABSENTEE OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any officers of the civil service of the United States, in the Territory of Kansas, are absent from their posts in said Territory; and if so, the reasons therefor.

Mr. BIGGS subsequently rose and moved a reconsideration of the vote by which that resolution was passed.

The motion was recorded for future action.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GREEN. A majority of the Committee on Territories, to which was referred the President's message transmitting the constitution of the State of Kansas, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to make a report, accompanied by a bill for the admission of that State.

The bill, entitled "A bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union," was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GREEN. I suppose it is hardly necessary to have the report read; it is quite long. I move that it be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Before that order is made, I desire to present a minority report. I move that it be printed with the report of the majority, together with another minority report which I understand is to be made. I ask the Senator from Missouri to modify his motion, so as to print the whole of them together.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am directed by a minority of the committee to make a report, presuming that it will be printed with the majority report.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the printing, but simply to object to calling papers which come from a minority of a committee, reports. There can be but one report from a committee, the official act of the majority of the body; but the views of the minority may be stated in a paper. I have no objection to their being so stated and printed; but they ought to be stated to be the views of the minority, and not the report of the organ of the Senate, which is the committee, under parliamentary usage.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not desire to enter into any controversy with the gentleman from Delaware in regard to the term proper to be applied to these dissenting reports. It has become a usage in common parlance to speak of the minority and the majority reports. You will find that that is our practice in nine cases out of ten. One or two Senators, I believe, in presenting dissenting reports, have conformed to the idea of taste suggested by the gentleman from Delaware, and called them "the views of the minority;" but the common parlance and common usage of the Senate, I presume, in nine cases out of ten for the last twenty years, has been to speak of such documents as minority reports. I have no particular desire on that point. Gentlemen can characterize the paper as they think best.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the honorable Senator is entirely mistaken, especially as regards the Senate. He will hardly find an instance of the printing, by the Senate, of the views of the minority of a committee fifteen years back. He will hardly find a case fifteen years, or even ten years ago, where the views of the minority were printed. I have myself, in particular circumstances, presented such a paper, and it has been called "the view of the minority." You may in common parlance call them reports, but it is not so stated on the face of the papers. It may be comparatively of little moment; yet I think adherence to parliamentary usages respecting papers of this kind is proper. There is a substantial distinction between them. One is the report of the organ of the body made by the committee to the body; the other contains the views of dissenting members. It is right that they should stand before the Senate and the country in precisely the position they occupy. I have no objection to their dissemination to the same extent as the report of the committee; but the report of the committee can be but one, I think, under parliamentary usage.

Mr. SEWARD. I beg leave to ask what is the question before the Senate? The debate is not on the printing, but upon the term or description which shall be given to these papers. Does that enter in any way upon the record? because, if it does, I have a word to say upon the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does enter upon the record.

Mr. SEWARD. The other day some members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, among whom I was one, dissenting from the majority, submitted a report which we described, if I recollect aright, as "the views of the undersigned, who dissent from the report of the majority, presented in the form of a minority report." I wish to ask if there is any objection to that?

Mr. BAYARD. It is nothing to me; it is for the Senate to decide. I think it is better to adhere to what is a distinction of substance, and require that a report shall come from that organized body, by a vote of the majority, that represents the Senate as a committee; and beyond that there is no report, in the proper parliamentary sense of the term, though it is undoubtedly proper and right to allow those who dissent in committee to present their views to the Senate, and have them disseminated in the same manner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, on this point, that the other day, on another question, he had occasion to inquire into it, and confer with the officers of the Senate on this subject, and on the practice in respect to the Journal entries. The position taken by the Senator from Delaware he supposes to be correct, that the action of the majority makes the report of the committee; the dissent of the minority is submitted as the views of the minority; and he is informed by the Secretary, that the entries have been so made on the Journal of the Senate heretofore. Therefore, if there be no objection, the Chair will put the question on printing the report of the committee and the views of the minority.

Mr. GREEN. I will modify my motion to print, so as to include these dissenting opinions; and when the reports shall be printed, and Senators have had an opportunity to read them, I give notice that at an early day I shall make a motion to set apart some particular time for the consideration of this bill. I will not now designate the time, because I wish all to have a fair opportunity to understand the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am utterly indifferent as to what title we shall give these dissenting opinions of the members of the committee. We speak of the opinion of a court—that is, the opinion of a majority of the judges. The minority of the judges style their views "dissenting opinions." In our common parlance, we speak of the report of the majority of a committee, and the report of the minority. It is simply the dissenting opinion of those members (or that member, as the case may be) who do not concur with the majority. However, I make no point on the designation to be given to the paper.

Mr. MASON. There are many instances, as we all know, where forms indicate what the law is. The honorable Senator from Illinois has just used the expression, "the report of the majority of a committee." With all possible respect for him, I beg leave to say that is inaccurate. It is the report of the committee; but, if there are any who dissent from that report, it is the usage, I believe, in all legislative bodies—a usage which I am always happy to comply with—to print the dissenting views of the dissentients. I did not know until this instant what the case was, nor would it make any difference, but I submit that it would be better to preserve the forms that show what the law is. Let the report be entered and printed as the report of the Committee on Territories, and any papers submitted by gentlemen from the committee which dissent from the report, be printed as the views of the gentlemen who dissent from the report of the committee. Take the case suggested by the honorable Senator from Illinois, who has himself been on the bench, and has illustrated, I am very happy to say, the ability of the bench of the country: if there be more than one judge, the opinion of the court is the opinion of the majority, and the views of those who dissent are entered as the opinions of those who dissent from the opinion of the court. So it is here. The report of the majority is the report of the committee; and the dissenting views are the views of the gentlemen who dissent from that report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already stated that he has no doubt in regard to the parliamentary practice, and he will put the question in the form he before announced.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am unable to say how far these are dissenting opinions, for the reason that the report of the committee has never been read in committee. We know not what it is. We have had no opportunity of knowing, because we were required to report this morning, and it was impossible to read so long a report at the meeting of the committee this morning, if the bill were to be presented to-day. Therefore, whether these be dissenting opinions, or what they are, we have no means of knowing, for no one of the minority knows what is in the report of the committee.

Mr. GREEN. I beg leave to remark that the conclusion at which the committee arrived was well known by all its members. The question was, whether we would report in favor of the admission of Kansas as a State, or against it? A majority of the committee were in favor of it, and they of course make the report and assign their own reasons for the conclusion. The minority have the same privilege. The conclusions are just as variant as it is possible for conclusions to be. Each fortifies his own conclusion by the best material at his command.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is, that the report of the Committee on Territories be printed, and also the views of the minority, as expressed in the papers submitted by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BROWN. I must ask for the yeas and nays on that motion. I am opposed to adjourning over two days every week.

Mr. SLIDELL. I think we may postpone the taking of this question until after we know whether or not we shall get through the Army bill to-day. I presume there will be no objection to adjourning to Monday, if we get through with the Army bill to-day.

Mr. ALLEN. I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew the motion, and I will give my reason for doing so. I desire to have it decided now, whether we shall adjourn over or not, so as to control my own action this afternoon in regard to going away. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WADE. I hope we shall not adjourn over. We have never touched the Private Calendar this session. There are a large number of reports from the Court of Claims before us, which ought to be acted on. Justice to the claimants requires that we should act definitely on them. There ought to be a day set apart for the consideration of those bills. I think our old rule is the right one, and that we ought to set apart at least every Friday for the consideration of private claims. The Senate has always done so at the previous sessions at which I have been a member of the body, but we have given them no kind of consideration at the present session.

Mr. CAMERON. After consultation with gentlemen I withdraw my motion.

CONSULAR COURTS IN CHINA.

Mr. FOOT. On the 15th of December last the President transmitted to the Senate a letter from the late Commissioner in China, transmitting a decree or regulation for such revision as Congress may deem expedient, pursuant to the act of the 11th of August, 1848. This message of the President and the accompanying communication were ordered to lie on the table and be printed. I move that they be taken up and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is understood, by a letter from the present Commissioner in China, that it is important this subject should be acted upon at an early day. It relates to the judicial powers of consuls.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTERS' GALLERY.

Mr. FOOT. I will call up the resolution I introduced the other day in reference to the accommodation of reporters in the front seats of the reporters' gallery, with a view to place that matter under the supervision of the Committee on the Library of this branch of Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following order:

Ordered, That the Committee on the Library consider and report a plan for the admission and accommodation of reporters in the eastern gallery, other than the reporters for the Congressional Globe.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope it will be agreed to. I misunderstood the object of the Senator the other day. It is to put this subject under regulation, instead of leaving it without regulation. I should like to see it regulated. I wish to have a report that will not leave it unregulated, as it is now.

The order was adopted.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. FOOT. Some days ago I presented to the Senate a proposition of amendment or addition to one of the rules of the Senate, which was laid over. I now call it up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the proposed amendment to the rules; which is, to add to the 11th rule:

And all motions to take up any business for consideration, or to postpone any question pending before the Senate, with a view to take up some other question indicated by the mover, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. FOOT. I have as little personal interest in this subject, perhaps, as any member of the body; but the experience of the present session, I think, has satisfied all members of the Senate of the importance of some such limitation—the less so, however, since the present Presiding Officer very properly, the other day, indicated at least, if he did not decide as a question of order, that preliminary motions to take up a subject for consideration, or to postpone a pending question, with a view to take up some other matter indicated by the mover, did not open the whole subject for discussion on its merits. I think that decision right; and if that decision were adhered to practically by the Senate, it would render the adoption of this rule less important than it would otherwise be under the practice which for a long time obtained in this body.

The experience of the present session, Mr. President, must have satisfied us all that the limitation proposed by this amendment to the rules will have the effect of greatly facilitating the dispatch of business, and simplifying the order and management of business. We have witnessed on these collateral motions a very general and irregular debate, not only upon the question proposed to be taken up, but upon the question proposed to be postponed; and not only that, but upon various other questions which different Senators think demand priority over others and the immediate consideration of the body. I therefore trust that by general consent this amendment will be adopted. I have not proposed it unadvisedly. I took occasion before I offered it, to confer with older and more experienced members of the body upon both sides of the Chamber, and it met with general concurrence—I believe without exception so far as my consultation extended.

Mr. BELL. I should like to know from the Senator how he supposes this amendment to the rules will be construed, if adopted? The provision is, that a motion to take up a question shall be decided without debate. The inquiry which I wish to make is, whether the honorable Senator from Vermont understands the meaning of that to be that no suggestions shall be permitted in regard to the reasons why one measure should be postponed to give place to another? whether it is absolute, so that when a gentleman moves to take up a measure and postpone others which have priority by the preceding orders of the Senate, he shall only be at liberty to make the motion, without being allowed to say a word in explanation of his motion?

I beg leave to say, if that is to be the construction, it will operate very inconveniently. From my observation of the proceedings of this body and the other House, I think the effect of such a rule would be to give a decided advantage to the majority, who would have in either body the power to assemble—hold a caucus, if you please—and decide on the order of business, and all the minority, one after another, might make a motion, and each one would find himself overruled by what appeared to be the unanimous vote of the majority.

Another effect I can perceive, and this is without reference to majorities or minorities, either in the House of Representatives or the Senate: it would place the business of the body—I mean not party questions, but the general business of the body—under the control of the more active managing members; and a modest gentleman who would not like to go around and electioneer beforehand, who would not feel at liberty to make appeals to members on account of personal associations, to second a motion which he desired to make, would always find himself without support for his motions. You may say this is a result that cannot be avoided, because all members ought to be active and managing in getting business under consideration which interests them and their constituents particularly, and that a member who does not do that with success, is not so well qualified for his place, and cannot discharge his duties so effectually to his constituents or to his country, as some others; but that, I think, is not a sufficient answer to the objection.

These results will follow the adoption of this amendment, in my opinion, unless it allows a succinct statement of the grounds on which a motion to take up a subject is made. The great injustice of such a regulation is to the minority. I cannot be supposed to have a great deal of interest in this question, because my term of service here is fast approaching its end; and I stand in a very small minority here. I shall probably not feel it, but I throw out these views for the consideration of the body. In the first place, this proposition gives great advantages to the majority; and next it may affect even portions of the members of the majority, and do them injustice unless they possess the peculiar qualifications to which I have alluded. Most of the rules of the body are formed with a view to protect and allow equal rights and privileges to the minority of the body, like the guarantees in the Constitution itself. Those guarantees are not for the majority. If you mean to allow a majority to do as they please, you need no rules; majorities do not need their protection; rules are for the minority.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the honorable mover of this proposition will consent to let it rest.

Mr. FOOT. I will follow an intimation from several Senators, and move that it be referred to a select committee of three members, to be appointed by the Chair. Before I sit down, however, in answer to the inquiry made by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, whether the purpose or effect of this rule would be to cut off debate altogether, I would only say that it would stand on the same footing, subject to the same restrictions, limitations, and privileges, with all other questions that are decided by our rules not to be debatable, as motions to lay on the table, for instance.

Mr. BELL. That is absolute.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the proposition be referred to a select committee of three, to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. Foot, Mr. HUNTER, and Mr. STUART were appointed the committee.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if it is his purpose to endeavor to close the bill to-day, and obtain final action?

Mr. IVERSON. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who, the Senate is informed, is sick, and unable to be in his place, the bill has to some extent, by his request and that of other members of the committee, been placed in my charge. I desire very much, as the chairman of the committee does, that the bill shall be disposed of to-day, if practicable. We must either dispose of it to-day, or sit to-morrow, because on Monday, the 22d of February, a number of Senators will be absent, and it would be unfair to decide it without a full Senate. If we do not dispose of it to-day, I shall insist that the Senate sit to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. CHANDLER, to strike out the fourth section, in these words:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That hereafter regular promotions to vacancies occurring in the regimental grades of commissioned officers of the United States Army, shall be by regiments or corps, instead of by arms of service, as now regulated and provided in certain cases.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. CLARK] is detained from the Senate by sickness to-day, and has paired off with the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 24, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Mason, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Green, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Shideell, Thompson of Kentucky, and Wright—23.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the first section of the bill by adding the following proviso:

And provided, That such reduction shall not interfere with, or operate upon, any officer in the Army at the date of the approval of this act.

So that it will read:

Provided, That within two years after the passage of this act, or sooner, if the exigencies of the public service will permit, it shall be the duty of the President to reduce the military establishment so as not to exceed the number of companies, either in officers or privates, as now authorized by existing laws: And provided, That such reduction shall not interfere with, or operate upon, any officer in the Army at the date of the approval of this act.

Mr. SEWARD. I would suggest to the mover of the amendment, that there may be a doubt whether it does not make the reduction dependent as a condition on the fact whether the reduction will affect any officers of the Army. I would suggest to him to strike out "and provided," and insert "but."

Mr. WILSON. I accept that modification. I do not wish to detain the Senate upon this motion. I think it has been clearly shown, that at the end of two years, if this bill shall be sustained, the commissions of all the company officers of the Army will be in the hands of the President; and the ninety officers now to be appointed may be retained, and ninety may be selected from the officers in the Army at the present time and thrown out. I do not suppose that, in passing a bill to raise troops for temporary purposes, it is the intention of Senators to strike at any officers now in the Army, although it is said there is a great rush for officers in the five regiments that are talked of, and that there are about two thousand applicants for the places. If the bill should be sustained, ninety officers may be selected from political partisans in the various sections of the country, and when in the service, by the section as it now stands, they may all be retained; and officers who have served the country long and faithfully, may be thrown out at the end of two years. I do not suppose the Senate wishes to do any injustice to the present officers of the Army. The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) If no further amendment be proposed to the original bill, the substitute for that bill is open to amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand the proposition now to be on the substitute that I offered in lieu of the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is now open to modification or amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I desire to make a few brief remarks in answer to some objections which have been urged to this proposition. It has been objected by some, for instance, that the substitute offered by me confines the President, in making his appointments, to particular persons, and that under the Constitution of the United States we have no such power. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the law confines all appointments of midshipmen to the Naval School at Annapolis, and all appointments of cadets to the West Point Academy, to congressional districts. If you can confine the appointment of a cadet, or midshipman, or any other appointment to be made by the President of the United States, to a district, cannot you confine him to the appointment of particular persons? If the power is clear in the one case, it is equally clear in the other.

The objection is that my substitute confines the President in his appointments of officers to particular persons—those chosen by the companies. Well, sir, in 1846, when we passed what we called the ten regiment bill, it was provided:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one additional major in each of the regiments of dragoons, artillery, infantry, and rifleman in the Army of the United States, who shall be taken from the captains in the Army."

This law confined the President, in appointing majors, to the captains then in the Army. If that was constitutional, and Congress had power in that instance to designate whom the President should appoint, how do the provisions of the substitute, confining the President in the appointment of officers to the persons indicated by the companies, battalions, and regiments, conflict with the Constitution? If you can compel him to select majors from a particular class—the captains of the Army—can you not compel the President to take as colonels, majors, and captains, the persons elected by the regiments, battalions, and companies, when organized? The power is as clear in the one case as it is in the other.

Let us see how the Constitution stands on that point, for I want this question made clear. I do not want the idea to go out to the country that this proposition has been rejected on the ground that it came in conflict with the Constitution, or invaded any power conferred on the President of the United States by the Constitution. I know that whenever you come to popularizing the institutions of this country, and especially when you come to popularizing the Army of the United States, there is always some pretext, some excuse, for interposing an objection to the exercise of power on the part of the people. Why should not the regiments, the battalions, and the companies be authorized to elect their own officers when it does not come in conflict with the Constitution of the United States?

But it has been intimated or suggested to me, that such a provision is not constitutional. I do not pretend to understand a great deal about the Constitution; but I am very much inclined to think that if it was read a little more than it is, it would be better understood by a great many of us throughout the country. We find that the Constitution provides:

"The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

We may go on and establish the office of head of a Department; he is a superior officer; but the query now comes up, cannot the head of that Department appoint the inferior officers? I say he can, and such has been the practice. The Constitution further provides in the same clause:

"But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

I should like to know if the power is not clear. Does not my substitute vest the power absolutely in the President to appoint these colonels? It is as clear as the Constitution itself. The great objection to the exercise of this power is that it is a confirmation of the will of the regiments in the selection of their officers. Let the men choose those who are to guide them in battle. Let the men choose those who are to sleep with them on the tented field. Why this great dread that you cannot get along in making these appointments unless they are taken away from the people? It is clear that the first section of the substitute is constitutional. It provides for the appointment of officers in the way pointed out by the Constitution itself, practically. It prevents delay. It does not even make it necessary to send such nominations to this body; but I shall have no objection to that if it be insisted on. These regiments can be organized, the officers commissioned, and put into the field, if the exigencies of the country require it, and whatever the Government wants to be accomplished can be accomplished at once.

I have made these remarks merely to remove the objections that have been intimated to me against the first section of the substitute.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill which the Senate has already perfected, contains a section which requires that the troops shall be discharged at the expiration of two years, or sooner, if the exigency which called them into service shall cease. On reading the substitute which has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee, I find that in the last section he provides that the volunteers whom he provides for calling out, shall be dismissed from the service whenever the exigency which called them in shall cease. In the section of the bill perfected by the Senate, there is a maximum of time. In the section of the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee, there is no maximum; there is no positive limitation. I make the suggestion to that Senator that the last section of his substitute ought to correspond with the section of the bill which the Senate has already perfected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I shall offer this amendment, to be added to the last section of the substitute:

And in no case shall the force created by this act continue in service more than two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. The question now before the Senate is on striking out the original bill, and substituting for it a proposition, as I understand it—for it has not been printed—to enable the President to call out four thousand volunteers, with their full complement of officers. That measure comes into competition with the bill, which, as now amended, proposes to add only thirty companies to the regular Army, and that for a temporary period. Both provide for a temporary exigency. According to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, we are to have four thousand volunteers for two years, or a less time, if the exigencies in Utah should allow of their being disbanded. According to the proposition of the committee as it now stands, we are to have the addition of thirty companies, consisting, as I understand from the gentleman who is acting as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVERSON,] of between twenty-two hundred and twenty-three hundred men, with no officers higher than the rank of captain.

It has been objected to the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, that there may be a difficulty in disbanding them at the end of two years; that these officers being incorporated with the great mass of the Army, a sympathy would be felt for them, and therefore Congress would be induced to repeal that provision which requires them to be disbanded. In order to carry out the manifest intention of the Senate, without exposing any future Congress to difficulties in the way of carrying it out, I have prepared an amendment, which I have given notice that I shall offer, in the event of the failure of the pending substitute. The object of the amendment which I have prepared is simply to carry out what seems to me to have been, so far, the declared will of the Senate; that is, that there shall be a temporary addition merely, and a temporary addition of only some twenty-two hundred or twenty-three hundred men.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. With the permission of the Senator from Virginia, I wish to make a suggestion to him. The basis of his argument is, that his proposition will incur a less expenditure than the one now pending before the Senate. When we turn to the first section of the substitute I have offered, we see it provides that the President may receive into the service any number of volunteers not exceeding four thousand. If it shall so turn out that no men will be wanted, he need not receive any. If he shall simply want one company, he can receive one company and no more. This power is to be exercised at the discretion of the President. It may turn out that he will want but one thousand or five hundred men, or none at all.

Mr. HUNTER. We all understand this. We all know from the Department that they want five regiments. We all know they will be called out. I do not suppose the Senator from Tennessee doubts that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. This substitute proceeds on the idea that they shall be called out, if at all, for the Utah service—for the Mormon war, if we may so denominate it.

Mr. HUNTER. This amendment proposes to leave it at the discretion of the President, who has already declared the number he will probably want. I say, therefore, so far as expense is concerned, it is right to compare this amendment, as if it provided for four thousand volunteers, with the expense that would be occasioned by the proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs, as now amended by the Senate. The amendment which I intend to offer is one which is designed to carry out strictly the intention of the Senate to make this force temporary, not to increase the number of your officers, and also to put it in the power of the President to disband them at the end of two years without exposing Congress or the country to any difficulty. It proposes to place it in such a situation that they must be disbanded unless Congress shall interfere by positive legislation to prevent it. I propose that this temporary force shall be kept separate; that it shall be raised as the ten regiments were raised during the Mexican war, with precisely the same provision which existed in that case in regard to disbanding them, under which they were disbanded, and returned to the bosom of civil society.

The propositions, then, as they stand, (for it must be remembered that both are temporary,) present a choice between four thousand men with a full corps of officers, field officers and all, and twenty-two or twenty-four hundred men, with no new officers higher than the grade of captain. In other words, the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee is to raise something like sixteen hundred men more than the Senate have already declared they think to be necessary. We are thus to raise not only sixteen hundred men additional, but to raise them in that form in which it has been proved the Army is most expensive; that is to say, we are to furnish volunteers, who, as has been shown by the whole experience of the War Department, which, surely, is worth something, and as has been shown by the reasoning of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which upon that head cannot be answered, are far more expensive than the troops proposed to be raised by the bill of the committee.

The Senator from Tennessee made us an admirable speech in regard to the necessity of economy. I concur in most of what he said in regard to that. I am glad to find that we are to have such a champion on this floor in the great cause of economy; but I could have wished that his practice had conformed more nearly to his precept. We are, by his amendment, to add some sixteen or eighteen hundred men more than the committee propose, who are to cost more per man than the regular soldiers. He tells us that the expense is to be $1,600 a year per man. He takes that assumption of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] I do not indorse that assertion, that the soldiers are to cost $1,600 a man; but suppose it to be so: then his amendment proposes to add an expense of something like two million dollars annually over and above what is proposed by the bill. Not only two millions annually, so far as the troops are concerned, but he proposes to make a much larger addition to the officers than the bill contemplates; to add a much more expensive character and description of force than that which the bill proposes; and it is to be followed by bounty lands, pensions, horse claims, and all that; and it will take a whole bureau of officers, whose business it will be for years to settle the claims for the horses of these volunteers.

It seems to me that when the Senate come to compare these two propositions, they cannot and ought not to fail to vote down that which provides for four thousand volunteers. I know that there are certain descriptions of military service for which the volunteer is better fitted than the regular soldier. There are certain great exigencies in which the question is not so much the expense as the pressing demand for immediate military assistance, when it is necessary to call out volunteers and militia; but I submit that this is not one of them. This is a case in which the regular will perform the service more cheaply; and here is a competition between the two propositions, one of which increases the Army by a small addition of officers, and comparatively by a small addition of troops, and a much smaller expenditure of public money than the other. Why the Senate should be called upon to make this large and extravagant vote, I cannot imagine, especially when the appeal was made to us in the name of economy. I trust it will be voted down.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think the gentleman's argument, with due respect to him, has but very little in it. In the first instance, he presses his proposition on the ground of economy; and he seemed to congratulate himself and the country that there was so able a champion here in advocacy of the cause of economy; but he says he would have preferred to see my practice conform to my precepts. Let us take the Senator's argument and see if my practice does not conform to my precepts.

What was the proposition reported by the Committee on Military Affairs? It was to make a permanent addition to the standing Army, which was variously estimated here to cost from five to seven million dollars. The honorable chairman told us two or three times in his speech that he did not expect to live to see the day when the Army would be reduced; that the proposed addition was to be permanent. Then what is the issue? Between the original proposition and the one which I have offered. But the gentleman sees great expense in that, and he comes forward with a favorite idea of his own; and what is it? He says his proposition is to make a certain increase of the forces of the United States to the extent of some twenty-four or twenty-five hundred men—that is certain. Then what is the proposition with which he contrasts it? What do I propose? It leaves the number to be raised at the discretion of the President and the War Department, it is true, but it is not to exceed four thousand men. If the gentleman's twenty-five hundred men will answer the purpose of the Government—will be sufficient, and no more than needed, will he impugn the President and Secretary of War by saying that if we confer this discretion they will call more men into service than are required? That is the issue he makes: his issue is with them that they will abuse this privilege. They say they may want four thousand, and the issue is with the Secretary of War and the President, not with me. The Senator's idea is that they cannot be trusted as to the number of men it will be necessary to raise to meet the emergency which may take place, or may not take place in Utah.

But again, the substitute I have offered proceeds on the idea that if troops are not necessary for service in Utah, the President is not to raise a man; and that if he does call out any, the number shall be in proportion to the wants of the Government; but he is not to go beyond the maximum of four thousand. Will the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance deny the President and Secretary of War the discretion of calling out what they may deem sufficient between four thousand and the amount suggested by him, or not calling out any to meet the emergency? Is he not willing to trust them that far?

Mr. HUNTER. Let me ask the Senator if he is not willing to trust them so far as to give them the five regiments which the Secretary asks? Will he limit their discretion in that regard?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do limit them; my proposition limits them. They may raise any number of men from one to four thousand. If there is no Utah war or difficulty, they need not raise any. That is my proposition. Your proposition is to raise some twenty-five hundred or three thousand men certainly. Do you not make a certain addition to the Army?

Mr. HUNTER. I have stated that it is a temporary addition, like the other.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Exactly; the other is a temporary addition. So I meet you on that point; and mine may not make any addition whatever. We understand that. I proceed more on the idea that these men will not be needed at all. I do not believe there will be any Utah war. I believe that these people will submit to the laws of the United States; and that there will be no necessity for this Government to shed the blood of what we conceive to be a misguided and deluded people; for when it is understood that the President has sufficient military force placed at his discretion to quell and subdue any resistance they may make, I believe they will desist; and especially so if the President of the United States proceeds on that humane and parental feeling which was pursued by General Washington when he issued two proclamations urging the whisky boys to submission to the laws of the United States. I think it meets the precise case.

The gentleman says this force is to cost more than an addition to the regular Army. The substitute provides that they shall receive the same pay and allowances; that they shall be subject to the rules and articles of war; that they shall receive the same clothing as regulars, and that they shall be equipped at the expense of the Government. There will be no claim for volunteers' horses—the horses are to be furnished. If these men are to enter the service of the United States and receive the same pay that the regulars do, will it cost any more to transport them than to transport regular soldiers? In many instances they can be raised almost in sight of the place; from the neighboring State you can send the men into the service of the Government. The substitute provides that they shall receive the same pay; and will transportation cost any more for volunteers than for regular soldiers?

What then becomes of the gentleman's argument about economy? The issue is made up as to the difference between precept and practice. I am glad that the honorable chairman has embraced the theory. I trust and hope we shall have many evidences, before the close of this session of Congress, of the theory being reduced to practice, so far as he and others are concerned. I repeat here, I will go with him in retrenching the expenditures and reforming the abuses of this Government, as far as he who goes furthest. I am glad that I have such a leader, such a captain in the cause of economy; and I give him the assurance that I shall never shrink while he stands to his post.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am pleased to see the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Virginia; not because I expect to vote for it, but because it is the first demonstration representing the views of the Administration since I made my humble efforts in their behalf some days since. [Laughter.] The honorable Senator from Tennessee read from the President's annual message to show what the views of the Administration were. I read from a later and a more authentic document when I represented the Administration—the Washington Union, of the very date of the day on which I spoke; and that paper said, that the reason why we had gone so wrong was, that not one in twenty of the Senate had reflected on the subject. It is not parliamentary, I know, to speak of the other House, and I shall not do it; but I shall suppose a case in the British Parliament, where the Administration are represented on the floor. The House of Lords sustain the Administration, and the House of Commons have become a little insubordinate, and by about three majority have shown a disposition to inaugurate a policy adverse to the Administration. Well, sir, the Administration have an Army bill in the House of Lords, ostensibly to put down rebellion in India. [Laughter.] They have before them a bill to increase the military establishment of England, so as to put down insubordination in India. The House of Commons manifest an insubordination quite equal to that in India, and the Administration want to put that down, too. When the editor said we had not reflected, he had reference undoubtedly to the insubordination in the other branch of the English Parliament—the House of Commons. We want the men to put down the insubordination in Utah, and the officers to put down insubordination in the Commons—that is it, sir.

The objectionable feature of the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, in this view of the subject, is that it does not repose so much confidence in the intelligence and discrimination of the Executive as it does in the people, and it undertakes to introduce democracy into the Army. If the Senator had ever read Captain Marryatt's "Midshipman Easy," he would have seen what was the result of introducing democracy into the Navy, and he will find that it will be about as easy to introduce it into the Army. It will not do. Democracy is very good to talk about and make speeches on; but when you come to apply it as a practical thing, and actually give the people the right of choosing their own officers, it assumes a different phase. I say we ought to submit to the censures of the Administration, when it tells us that we have not reflected. We cannot have reflected. Who is to choose these officers? How are they to be selected? Is this "cheap material," this "rabble," to come together, and in the exercise of its discretion, choose officers for the regiments? No, sir; I am compelled, in behalf of the Administration, to protest against it. True, they have not requested me to do so, [laughter,] but I stand up for those that have no friends, anywhere and everywhere. [Laughter.] That is what made me an anti-slavery man, because the slaves had nobody to speak for them. The Administration have nobody to speak for them here, and I would say, for them, we do not want this volunteer bill; we want the whole or nothing; we want the regiments with the right of appointing all the officers—"lieutenants, captains, majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels." I tell you, these plumes and epaulets will do more to quell insubordination than the bayonets; and they will quell it in the right place, where it is a great deal more difficult to deal with than it is in Utah or India.

For these reasons, while I am glad that the honorable Senator from Virginia has introduced his proposition, I cannot go for it. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, but I shall only vote for it as an amendment. If it be adopted, and it shall come up on its passage as the bill, I shall vote against it, because I believe with him, this whole movement is unnecessary—utterly so. I believe with him, that there will be no war in Utah. I would send a schoolmaster there instead of an army. I would send a commissioner there instead of an armed force. It is not wanted. You may read the history of the world, from the beginning of time down to this moment, and you will find in that history that fanaticism, of whatever kind it may be, to use the classical phrase of my friend from New York, however "leprous" it may be, has never been put down by the sword. It never has been, it never will be, and it never can be put down by arms. That is not what is wanted in Utah.

I must protest again before the Senate and before the country against the argument which is repeated so many times, that if gentlemen do not satisfy anybody else they will by-and-by satisfy themselves that they are in earnest when they talk about this increase of the Army being wanted for the present emergency. What emergency? Has not the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who represents—no, sir; he ordinarily represents the Administration, but he does not on this occasion—has he not told you that they do not want it for an emergency. They do not want it for a temporary purpose. They want it for all coming time, and for that reason I am opposed to every amendment. I hope somebody will go with me; but if not, I will go alone—it will not be the first time. I am opposed to every amendment which undertakes to fix limitations on this bill, telling the country that it is only to be used for two years. If the amendment of the honorable Senator from Virginia be adopted, I will go against that, because I know it is illisitory and deceptive. I do not mean that the Senator is deceptive. I know that he could not practice deception if he tried to do so, such is the integrity and the straightforwardness of his character; but the measure is deceptive. It will go out to the country to quiet their distrust against an increase of the standing Army, and in that way may lull the public suspicion and disarm the public jealousy against this obstinate and persevering attempt to increase the standing Army of the United States. I tell you these amendments are not worth the paper on which they are written. Vote three regiments now, and when the time comes to disband them, they will ask for three more; and if there is no emergency, people will get up and talk of an emergency just as if one actually existed.

Let us meet this question fairly. If we must persist in the illusion, the deception, the legislative fraud, of saying that there is an emergency requiring an increase of the military force of the country at this time, let us adopt the measure of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, which treats it as an emergency, and looks at it as an emergency. But, sir, do not let us, under any such appeals, be led into the support of this measure, which, if it be not a permanent increase of the standing Army of this country, would not have been asked for—would not have been presented; and we should not have been here to-day debating it, if it was only a temporary emergency that was looked for. It is no such thing; and I am grieved and surprised that gentlemen will insist upon calling it and treating it as an emergency, when they are told, over and over again, that that is not it. There is no emergency. True there are Indians in our Territories, and there always have been; there are fanatics—

Mr. TOOMBS. They are on the decrease.

Mr. HALE. My friend from Georgia says they are on the decrease. Well, take it at that, and show your faith by your works. Show that you believe fanaticism is on the decrease. Combat it as fanaticism ever ought to be combated, by reason, and argument, and persuasion.

Now, sir, I say that this attempt to send out an army to put down Mormonism in Utah makes the crusades of the middle ages a prudent and sagacious expedition. Then all Christendom turned out to redeem the holy sepulcher from the profanation of the infidel; and that was a prudent and wise measure compared with the attempt of this country, at this time, to raise an army of six or seven or four or five thousand men to be marched over the mountains and plains of the western wilderness to put down this fanaticism in Utah. We are insisting upon it that that is the object, when the Administration tells us all the time, when the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs tells us always, that that is not what they want it for. We are dealing with the Administration as a conceited quack would deal with a healthy man, trying to persuade him that he is sick of a certain complaint, and that we have an excellent nostrum to cure him, when he says all the time, "I am not sick, and want none of your medicine." So the Administration, speaking through their organ on this floor, tell us that they do not recognize the existence of an emergency in Utah calling for an increase of the Army; but we tell them, "Very well; we will give it to you, and you may keep it until after the emergency is over." It is over now; it is over this minute; it was over before you began to talk.

But it said "just let these Mormons know that the President has a force sufficient to put them down, and they will listen to reason." Good Heaven! do they not know it now? Do they not know that the President has the whole Army and Navy at his command? Do they not know that he has all the money of the nation at his command, and all that you can borrow besides? Do they not know that he has an organized Army to-day of fifteen thousand men? Do they not know that the whole gigantic power of this nation may be wielded against them? If they do not know that, if they have not read it by what lies patent upon the face of the world, are you, by the passage of this act, recognizing an emergency going to convince them that there is a great military power which can put them down, notwithstanding they have not found it out yet? It might be said, as was said in olden time, that if they hear not Moses and the Prophets, they will not be convinced though you vote that there is an emergency.

For these reasons I shall vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Tennessee as an amendment, and then go against the bill, let it be amended as it may.

Mr. GWIN. Some days ago I offered as an amendment to this bill a substitute to add five regiments to the regular Army. My object was to ascertain whether or not the Senate preferred the proposition of the Secretary of War, as embodied in the substitute I offered, or the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. If my substitute had been adopted, I should have moved various modifications, as it was the bill sent to the Military Committee by the Secretary of War. I was not in favor of increasing the Army as had been proposed by the Secretary of War in the form that he wished it to be increased. I do not believe the military force of the United States, as it is organized at present, is adapted to the wants of those sections of the Confederacy where their services are most needed. I do not believe that the present military establishment, extensive as it is, meets the wants and emergencies of the section of the country where those Indians are located whom they are intended to keep in subordination. If the proposition I moved had been sustained I should have offered a further amendment to make three of the five regiments mounted rangers, as proposed by the Senator from Texas, for the purpose of having that kind of force which is adapted to Indian warfare in his State and on the Pacific coast. I have no doubt, carrying out the statement of the Senator from Texas, that if we could have two thousand such troops as he suggested, commanded by such men as General Joe Lane and Jack Hayes, the whole Army might be withdrawn from that coast, with the exception of artillerymen from the fortifications. Give Lane and Hayes the selection of their officers for two such regiments, and you would have in the saddle such a force as never has been seen in this country, taking into consideration their numbers and the efficient service they would perform.

The Senator from New Hampshire thinks there is no emergency for raising any troops, volunteers or regulars. It is well known that we have a large force in Utah already. There certainly is an emergency to relieve that force. It is not of sufficient strength to meet the Mormons if they intend war. They cannot be conquered with such a force. It is utterly impossible for the United States to retreat from its position; and that is to bring the Mormons to subordination to the laws of the United States. The latest intelligence we have is, that they are in open collision with the authorities of this Government, and it is impossible for the President to retreat from his present position without disgrace and dishonor. The emergency exists. We have a portion of our Army there, and they must be relieved. The President must go on, unless Congress, by refusing to give him the proper aid, puts it out of his power to progress in bringing the Mormons to subordination.

I am in favor of giving the President this aid; but I prefer to give volunteers according to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, instead of the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, which will presently be offered as an amendment. My reason is that we ought to relieve Colonel Johnston in the speediest manner that is possible. I know that we cannot get soldiers to enlist in the regular Army in the State I represent. The people of that State will not enlist, but they will respond to a call for volunteers. The President ought to have power to call out a force of either volunteers or regulars. We ought to give him the power, or censure him for sending that portion of the Army now in Utah to that Territory. I think a volunteer force would be more efficient, for the reason that if you intend to relieve Colonel Johnston, you must do it in the most speedy manner; and I believe by raising volunteers nearest to the country where those troops are, and marching them expeditiously, you will sooner bring the war to a conclusion.

I have made some examinations in regard to the manner of approaching this Utah Territory, and I have made comparisons from official documents to show that you can get from the Pacific coast to Salt Lake forty-five days sooner than you can by starting from Fort Leavenworth. All the troops on this side have to meet at that point and march from there. I have official documents to prove this fact; and hence I say we ought to have volunteers who can be called into the field with more rapidity, and relieve the Army now in Utah more speedily, if mustered into service from the Pacific coast, than by any regular troops or volunteers marched from this side of the Continent. I base this statement upon the following facts, carefully compiled from official documents.

Hitherto all troops that have been sent into and through this Territory, have been assembled from the departments of the East and West, at Fort Leavenworth on the Missouri, and begun their march from that post. Prior to the present year, two marches of this kind have been executed, one by the rifle regiment in 1849; the other by a command under Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Steptoe in 1854-55. The route of the former diverged at Green river to the northward, and entered Oregon by the way of Fort Hall and the Snake river; that of the latter was from Fort Leavenworth three hundred and eleven miles, twenty-one days, to Fort Kearny; thence three hundred and thirty-six miles, twenty-three days, to Fort Laramie; thence two hundred and ninety miles, twenty-four days, to Pacific Springs, the west extremity of South Pass of the Rocky Mountains; and thence two hundred and thirty-two miles, twenty days, to Great Salt Lake City.

The command left Fort Leavenworth 1st June, and arrived at Salt Lake City 31st August, 1854. It is believed that the stoppages were no more than necessary to accomplish this march of one thousand one hundred and sixty-nine miles in ninety-two days, without breaking down men and animals; and that this is a pretty fair measure of the minimum time in practice that it would be proper to spend on so long a march, over a similar country by a body of troops of a respectable number. It seems to me that the actual number of marching days was sixty-four, making the average distance per marching day a little more than eighteen miles, or if we include the stoppages to rest, twelve and two third miles per day from the beginning to the end of the march.

Now, this rate of marching, which was in the department of the West, being applied to the department of the Pacific, will give us the times for the marches, including stoppages to rest the command, as follows: From Sacramento to Salt Lake City, forty-seven days; from San Pedro to Salt Lake City, fifty-four days.

It takes twenty-five days to transport a regiment by steam from New York, and twenty-two days from New Orleans, via Panama, to San Francisco; thence one day to Sacramento and two days to San Pedro, including all necessary delays for transhipment; and it is obvious the regiment could be assembled from various posts in or east of the valley of the Mississippi, at New York or New Orleans quite as expeditiously as at Fort Leavenworth.

Hence, if it be an object with the War Department to dispatch troops in the least possible time from posts so located, regardless of other considerations, to Salt Lake City, the quickest way is to assemble them either at New York or New Orleans, and embark them by steam for San Francisco; thence to Sacramento, and from there march them to Salt Lake City. If embarked from New York, the saving would be nineteen days; if New Orleans, twenty-two days, in the time that would be consumed in marching them from Fort Leavenworth to the same point. If sent by steam from San Francisco to San Pedro, and marched thence to Salt Lake City, the saving would be eleven or fourteen days in the time required to march them from Fort Leavenworth.

From the journal kept by Major C. Cross of the quartermaster's department, of the march of the rifle regiment from Fort Leavenworth, via South Pass and Fort Hall, to Fort Dallas on the Columbia, in 1849, I am enabled to present some practical information in reference to the march of a command, if required, from northern Oregon to great Salt Lake City.

From Fort Dallas to south extremity of Grand Rond Prairie, the march would be one hundred and eighty-seven miles, which could be accomplished in fourteen days; from Grand Rond to Fort Boise, one hundred and thirty miles, in ten days; from Fort Boise to Fort Hall, two hundred and sixty-eight miles, in twenty-two days; from Fort Hall to great Salt Lake City, one hundred and eighty-three miles, in fifteen days.

A regiment leaving Fort Dallas with its train, could reach Salt Lake City in sixty-one days; the proper time for starting would be from the 1st to 15th of June.

A regiment could be dispatched from New Orleans, by steamer, via Panama, and conveyed to San Francisco in twenty-three days; thence to Fort Dallas in seven days; thence, if the train were held in readiness there to start immediately, the same regiment could start the following day, and march to Salt Lake City in sixty-one days, after arriving at Fort Dallas, making ninety-one days from New Orleans, by the way of the Atlantic, the Pacific, and Columbia river, to great Salt Lake City.

Lieutenant Colonel Steptoe's command were ninety-two days marching from Fort Leavenworth to Salt Lake City in 1854.

This is assuming that the regular troops are to be sent from New York; but if volunteers are raised on the Pacific coast, there will be a difference of forty-five days in favor of the advance from that coast, and you can march troops thence to Utah every day in the year. I am utterly opposed to shipping troops to California. I was told by an officer of one of the regiments sent to Oregon that the transportation cost $450,000. The expense of sending regular troops on this, the most expeditious route, to relieve Colonel Johnston, would be enormous, when, by calling out volunteers on that coast, you would save this expense of transportation, and have equal dispatch in relieving Colonel Johnston. From California is the most expeditious and shortest route to Utah, and it can be approached by the San Pedro route at every season of the year with facility. There is no snow nor mountain passes near Salt Lake on that route that can obstruct the march of an army of relief to Colonel Johnston. And by the time this bill can pass Congress, the route from Sacramento city (the shortest) will be clear of snow, and volunteers could be immediately raised, and, with such regular troops as could be spared on the Pacific coast, would reach Colonel Johnston's camp weeks, and perhaps months, before such relief could reach him from the Atlantic States.

I believe there is an emergency calling for an increase of the Army, either by regulars or volunteers, though the Senator from New Hampshire thinks otherwise. The President has dispatched troops to Utah, and they must be sustained and supported. He must carry out his policy; but he cannot do it unless an addition is made to the military establishment of the country. Give him power to call out volunteers. When it is known on the Pacific coast that he can exercise that power, where there are two hundred thousand persons who have emigrated over the plains, and one hundred and fifty thousand through the Salt Lake country, who know all the difficulties they will have to encounter on the march, he can get a force of one thousand or four thousand men to march to the relief of Colonel Johnston. I do not believe there will be war, because then the Mormons will cease to resist the authority of this Government with such a force in the field; but if you do not give the President the power to put down this insurrection, there may be war, and a bloody one. I think the better plan is to give the President discretion to call out volunteers to meet this emergency; and if we intend to increase the Army permanently, as the Secretary of War recommends, let us take it up at a time when there is no such necessity like the present, and deliberately ascertain whether or not we cannot so change the force now in use in the Army of the United States as to better adapt it to service in the border States. For these reasons, I am in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, and shall vote for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, which is now before the Senate, requires some amendment; and I wish to ask him whether he will be willing to accept a modification reducing the number of men proposed to be raised from four thousand men to three regiments—the same number proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. I name three regiments, because I presume these men, under the volunteer system, are to be mustered into the service by regiments.

Mr. WILSON. Companies, battalions, or regiments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, say not exceeding three regiments, as the proposition of the Senator from Virginia is for the regular Army, and I think these troops cannot cost more than those under his measure. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will accept the modification which I suggest.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island on one condition; and that is, that the Senator from Virginia shall support my proposition as thus amended. I understand, from what the Senator from Virginia has said, that with him this is only a question of economy. He is opposed to the proposition I have presented, because it leaves it discretionary with the President to call out more troops than his proposition contemplates. I will accept the modification of the Senator from Rhode Island, on condition that the Senator from Virginia will vote for my amendment as thus modified.

Mr. HUNTER. Why should the Senator suppose that I will vote for it, when I have just told him that I believe that volunteer troops are more expensive than regulars?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am aware that the gentleman told me so; but I had supposed that the facts to the contrary would have satisfied him.

Mr. HUNTER. I trust more to the facts presented by the War Department than those presented by the Senator from Tennessee. I think they have more experience and knowledge on such subjects.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rely on the same sources of information.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the real objection to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee be a pecuniary one, I suggest to him whether it would not be proper to so modify it as to entirely remove that objection. I cannot, for my life, see how the Senator from Virginia can make it out that volunteers will cost more than the same number of regular troops under a bill which says they shall receive precisely the same pay, rations, and allowances as the regular Army.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator had attended to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs—the Senator from Mississippi—when he referred to documents and reports of persons who had experience, he would have seen.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did attend to all that.

Mr. HUNTER. He would have found that a great many reasons for this were given. One is, that, according to the statistics of mortality, a much larger number of the volunteers sicken and die than of regulars, and thus their ranks must be filled oftener. It is found that volunteers do not take the same care of their property, arms, and clothing, as the regulars. Then there is a difference in their equipments. However, I shall not go into that subject. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVERSON] is prepared on it, and I think can satisfy the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand that the Senator from Tennessee is willing to accept the modification suggested by me without the condition that the Senator from Virginia shall vote for his amendment, as thus modified? I suppose he is satisfied now that there is no modification of his proposition which can get the vote of the Senator from Virginia; but certainly it might place others in a position to vote for his amendment if they could see clearly to their satisfaction that it would not involve the expenditure of more money than would be the cost of the same number of regulars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that this proposition having already been amended, is entirely in the possession of the Senate, and is not in the control of the mover so far as to accept any modification without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, sir, I shall draw up an amendment to the effect I have suggested, and offer it at the proper time. I have a word or two to say, however, on the question of expenditures. When the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs was talking about the greater cost of volunteers over regulars, I supposed he was speaking of the expense of a regular army which had been disciplined and in service for a long period of time, so that the men knew how to take care of their arms and munitions; but I should like to ask any man what difference there can be, in this respect, between volunteers for two years and regulars enlisted for two years? They would be raw recruits, whether called by either name. A volunteer, if he is a more intelligent man, will learn more quickly than the lower material about whom the chairman of the committee spoke. No one can make me believe that men enlisted for two years, and called regulars, are more intelligent and more capable of taking care of their arms and munitions than volunteers enlisted for two years; but I agree, if you have them in service for a long time, if you insure them to discipline for ten or fifteen years, you may drill them into such habits that they will work like automats, and do what you please; but you cannot do that with any kind of human beings I ever saw without some training. In my opinion, there will not be a dollar's difference in the expense of the troops now proposed to be raised for two years, whether you enlist them as regulars or as volunteers.

Mr. IVERSON. I had not expected to make any additional remarks on this bill; for my views were presented some two or three weeks ago on the general merits of the proposition contained in the bill before the Senate. I feel it incumbent on me, however, to say something to-day on this question, inasmuch as the chairman of the committee is absent, and the charge of the bill is, to some extent, put on my shoulders, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] made a very desperate onslaught on this bill yesterday—no, not on this bill; I take that back; not upon the bill now under the consideration of the Senate, but upon the bill which was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. That is the bill which he fought. It is a very easy matter for a gentleman to build up a man of straw, to show his prowess and skill in knocking him down. The bill, as first presented by the committee, is very different from the bill now under consideration; because the committee agreed to strike out what seemed to be the most obnoxious feature, which was pointed out by Senators who opposed the bill. That was the second section, which proposed to increase the rank and file of the companies in the field, and at distant posts, to ninety-six men; and if all the companies in the Army were filled up to that maximum number, there would be an addition of about six or seven thousand men to the present military establishment. That section, however, has been stricken out, and now the bill provides simply for adding thirty companies to the existing regiments; these companies to be organized with the number now regulated by law—that is, fifty-two when in certain positions, and not more than seventy-four when they are in the field, or stationed at distant frontier posts.

The whole increase at present authorized by the bill, as well as by the substitute of the Senator from Virginia—for the three regiments which he proposes to add are equivalent to thirty companies—is but two thousand two hundred and twenty men. This is the whole addition to the rank and file of the Army proposed by the bill, upon the presumption that every one of the thirty companies will be in the field, or at distant posts, and be kept filled up to the maximum number of seventy-four. That, however, is an impracticability. That never has existed since the formation of your Army. There never has been a time in the history of this Government, and probably never will be, when the companies have been filled to the maximum number. From causes which every gentleman understands, although a company may be filled up to-day, it becomes lessened in the course of a few months by desertions, by deaths, by discharges from one cause and another. As a general rule, the companies never contain more than two thirds of the maximum number authorized, under any circumstances. I presume that the addition of thirty companies, with the ordinary number of men composing them, will not increase the Army more than two thousand men. That is the ultimate limit. I venture to assert that the thirty companies, if they last from now to the day of judgment, will never have more than two thousand men in them. That is the whole increase of the Army which the bill proposes to make.
